MONDAY, MARCH 7, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to call, at 10 a. m., Hon. Augustine B. Kelley (chairman) presiding.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will please be in order.

This is the initial hearing on H. R. 2032, a bill to repeal the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, and to reenact the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, and for other purposes.

[H. R. 2032, 81st Cong., 1st sess.]

A BILL To repeal the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, to reenact the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, and for other purposes

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That this Act may be cited as the "National Labor Relations Act of 1949".

TITLE I—REPEAL OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, 1947, AND REENACTMENT OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1935

REPEAL OF LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, 1947

SEC. 101. The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947 (Public Law Numbered 101, Eightieth Congress) is hereby repealed.

REENACTMENT OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT

SEC. 102. The National Labor Relations Act of 1935 (49 Stat. 449), as it existed prior to the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, is hereby reenacted.

MEMBERSHIP OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

SEC. 103. Subsections (a) and (b) of section 3 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 are amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 3. (a) The National Labor Relations Board (hereinafter called the 'Board') is hereby continued as an agency of the United States. The Board shall consist of five members, appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The terms of office of the members of the board in office on the date of enactment of the National Labor Relations Act of 1949 shall expire as provided by law at the time of their appointment. Members appointed after such date of enactment shall be appointed for terms of five years each, excepting that any individual chosen to fill a vacancy shall be appointed only for the unexpired term of the member whom he shall succeed. The President shall designate one member to serve as Chairman of the Board. Any member of the Board may be removed by the President, upon notice and hearing, for neglect of duty or malfeasance in office, but for no other cause.

"(b) The Board is authorized to delegate to any group of three or more members any or all of the powers which it may itself exercise. A vacancy in the Board shall not impair the right of the remaining members to exercise all of the powers of the Board, and three members of the Board shall, at all times, constitute a quorum of the Board, except that two members shall constitute a quorum of any group designated pursuant to the first sentence hereof. The Board shall have an official seal which shall be judicially noticed."

SEC. 104. (a) Subsection (a) of section 4 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 4. (a) Each member of the Board shall receive a salary of $17,500 a year, shall be eligible for reappointment, and shall not engage in any other business, vocation, or employment. The Board shall appoint such employees as it may from time to time find necessary for the proper performance of its duties. Any arbitrators appointed by the Board under section 9 (d) may be appointed in the manner authorized by section 15 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (5 U. S. C. 55a) at per diem rates to be determined by the Board but not exceeding $100, and shall be entitled to traveling expenses as authorized by section 5 of such Act (5 U. S. C. 73b–2) for persons so employed. The Board may establish or utilize such regional, local, or other agencies, and utilize such voluntary and uncompensated services, as may from time to time be needed. Attorneys appointed under this section may, at the direction of the Board, appear for and represent the Board in any case in court. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to authorize the Board to appoint individuals for the purpose of conciliation or mediation (or for statistical work), where such service may be obtained from the Department of Labor."

(b) Section 4 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by striking out subsection (b) thereof and by relettering the succeeding subsection "(b)".

BAR TO CERTAIN PROCEEDINGS

SEC. 105. Notwithstanding the provisions of the Act of February 25, 1871 (16 Stat. 432), neither the Board nor any court of the United States shall have jurisdiction to entertain, process, make, impose, or enforce any petition, complaint, order, liability, or punishment under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, with respect to any act or omission occurring prior to the date of enactment of this Act, unless such petition, complaint, order, liability, or punishment could be entertained, processed, made, imposed, or enforced under the National Labor Relations Act with respect to a like act or omission occurring after the date of enactment of this Act. No complaint shall hereafter be issued by the National Labor Relations Board based upon any unfair labor practice occurring prior to August 22, 1947, unless charges with respect thereto were pending before the Board on January 1, 1949.

UNJUSTIFIABLE SECONDARY BOYCOTTS AND JURISDICTIONAL DISPUTES

SEC. 106. (a) Section 1 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by inserting after the third paragraph thereof the following new paragraph:

"Experience has further demonstrated that certain unjustifiable conflicts between or among labor organizations lead to strikes and other forms of industrial strife which substantially burden or obstruct commerce, and that the failure of employers to maintain a neutral position aggravates and prolongs these conflicts. The public interest requires abatement of such industrial strife through just, peaceable, and final settlement."

(b) Section 2 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by striking out paragraph (11) thereof and by adding two new paragraphs (11) and (12), to read as follows:

"(11) The term 'secondary boycott' means a concerted refusal in the course of employment by employees of one employer to produce, manufacture, transport, distribute, or otherwise work on articles, materials, goods, or commodities because they have been or are to be manufactured, produced, or distributed by another employer.

"(12) The term 'jurisdictional dispute' means a dispute between two or more labor organizations (not established, maintained, or assisted by any employer action defined in this Act as an unfair labor practice) concerning the assignment or prospective assignment of a particular work task by an employer."

(c) Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by inserting after the figure "8" at the beginning thereof the letter "(a)" and adding at the end thereof a new paragraph (6) to read as follows:

"(6) To refuse to assign a particular work task in accordance with an award under section 9 (d) of this Act."

(d) Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by adding at the end thereof a new subsection (b) to read as follows:

"(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization—

"(1) to cause or attempt to cause employees to engage in a secondary boycott, or a concerted work stoppage, to compel an employer to bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees if—

"(a) another labor organization is the certified representative of such employees within the meaning of section 9 of this Act; or

"(b) the employer is required by an order of the Board to bargain with another labor organization; or

"(c) the employer is currently recognizing another labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any employer action defined in this Act as an unfair labor practice) and has executed a collective-bargaining agreement with such other labor organization, and a question concerning representation may not appropriately be raised under section 9 of this Act;

"(2) to cause or attempt to cause employees to engage in a secondary boycott, or a concerted work stoppage, in furtherance of a jurisdictional dispute in such labor organization is seeking to compel an employer to assign a particular work task contrary to an award made under section 9 (d) of this Act."

(e) Section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by inserting between subsections (c) and (d) thereof a new subsection (d) to read as follows:

"(d) Whenever a jurisdictional dispute results in or threatens to result in a concerted work stoppage, or a secondary boycott, affecting commerce, the Board may hear and determine, or appoint an arbitrator to hear and determine, the dispute, and issue an award, first affording the labor organizations involved in the dispute a reasonable opportunity to settle their controversy between or among themselves. In determining the dispute, the Board or the arbitrator, as the case may be, may consider any prior Board certification under which any such labor organization claims the right to represent employees who are or may be hired or assigned to perform the work tasks in dispute, any union charters or intermunion agreements purporting to define areas of jurisdiction between or among the contending labor organizations, the decisions of any agency established by unions to consider such disputes, the past work history of the organizations involved in the dispute, and the policies of this Act. If an arbitrator is appointed to hear and determine a dispute, he shall proceed in accordance with such rules and regulations as the Board may prescribe; and his award determining the dispute shall have the same effect as an award of the Board. In any proceeding under this section, the employer whose assignment or prospective assignment of a particular work task is in controversy shall have an opportunity to be heard in any hearing conducted by the Board, or an arbitrator, as the case may be. If at any stage of the proceeding it shall appear to the Board that the dispute is in fact one concerning representation, it shall treat the case as one instituted under section 9 (c) of this Act and proceed accordingly."

(f) Subsection (d) of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is relettered "(e)" and, as relettered, is amended to read as follows:

"(e) Whenever an order of the Board made pursuant to section 10 (c) is based in whole or in part upon facts certified following an investigation pursuant to subsection (c) of this section, or upon an award made in proceedings under subsection (d) of this section, and there is a petition for the enforcement or review of such order, such certification and the record of such investigation, or such award and the record of the proceedings under subsection (d) of this section, as the case may be, shall be included in the transcript of the entire record required to be filed under subsections 10 (e) or 10 (f), and thereupon the decree of the court enforcing, modifying, or setting aside in whole or in part the order of the Board shall be made and entered upon the pleadings, testimony, and proceedings set forth in such transcript."

FREEDOM FROM RESTRICTED STATE LAWS

SEC. 107. The proviso of section 8 (a) (3) of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended to read as follows: "Provided, That nothing in this Act, or in any other statute of the United States, or in any State law, shall preclude an employer engaged in commerce, or whose activities affect commerce, from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any employer action defined in this Act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein, or from paying to such labor organization, pursuant to a collective-bargaining agreement, membership obligations or sums equivalent thereto by deduction from wages or salaries, if such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a), in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made."

NOTICE OF TERMINATION OR MODIFICATION OF COLLECTIVE BARGAINING CONTRACTS

SEC. 108. Section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 is amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"(c) It shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer or a labor organization to terminate or modify a collective-bargaining contract covering employees in an industry affecting commerce, unless the party desiring such termination or modification notifies the United States Conciliation Service of the proposed termination or modification at least thirty days prior to the expiration date of the contract, or thirty days prior to the time it is proposed to make such termination or modification, whichever is earlier."

TITLE II—MEDIATION AND ARBITRATION

THE UNITED STATES CONCILIATION SERVICE

SEC. 201. (a) The United States Conciliation Service is hereby reestablished in the Department of Labor; and the functions transferred to the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service by section 202 (d) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, are hereby restored to the Secretary of Labor. The Service shall be under the direction of a Director of Conciliation (hereinafter called the "Director"), who shall be appointed by the President by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. The Director shall receive compensation at the rate of $15,000 per annum.

(b) The personnel, records, property, and unobligated balances of appropriations, allocations, or other funds of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service are hereby transferred to the Department of Labor. Such transfer shall not affect any proceedings pending before the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service or any rule or regulation heretofore made by it or by the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Director.

(c) The United States Conciliation Service shall be administered under the general direction and supervision of the Secretary of Labor. General policies and standards for the operation of the Service shall be formulated and promulgated by the Director of Conciliation, with the approval of the Secretary of Labor.

(d) The Secretary is authorized, subject to the civil-service laws, to appoint such clerical and other personnel as may be necessary for the execution of the funtions of the Service, and shall fix their compensation in accordance with the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, and may, without regard to the provisions of the civil-service laws and the Classification Act of 1923, as amended, appoint and fix the compensation of such conciliators, mediators and arbitrators as may be necessary to carry out the functions of the Service.

FUNCTIONS OF THE SERVICE

SEC. 202. (a) The United States Conciliation Service (hereinafter called the "Service") shall assist labor and management in settling disputes through the processes of free collective bargaining. The Director shall have authority to proffer the facilities of the Service in any labor dispute in any industry affecting commerce either upon his own motion or upon the request of one or more of the parties to the dispute whenever, in his judgment, the facilities of the Service will assist the parties in settling the dispute.

(b) Upon request of the parties to the dispute, the Service shall cooperate in formulating an agreement for the arbitration of the dispute, in selecting an arbitrator or arbitrators, and in making such other arrangements and in taking such other action as may be necessary.

(c) The Service shall furnish to employer, employees, and other public and private agencies, information concerning the practicabiilty and desirability of establishing suitable agencies and methods to aid in the settlement of labor disputes by mediation, conciliation, arbitration, and other peaceful means, and to promote and encourage the uses and procedures of sound collective bargaining. The Director is authorized to establish suitable procedures for cooperation with State and local mediation agencies and to enter into agreements with such State and local mediation agencies relating to the mediation of labor disputes whose effects are predominantly local in character.

(d) Through conferences and such other methods as it deems appropriate, the Service shall seek to improve relations between employers and the representatives of their employees for the purpose of avoiding labor disputes and preventing such disputes as might occur from developing into stoppages of operations which might affect commerce or develop consequences injurious to the general welfare.

CONDUCT OF CONCILIATION OFFICERS

SEC. 203. The Director and the Service shall be impartial. They shall respect the confidence of the parties to any dispute. Commissioners of Conciliation shall not engage in arbitration while serving as Commissioners and they shall not participate in cases in which they have a pecuniary or personal interest.

DUTIES OF EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES

SEC. 204. In order to prevent or minimize labor disputes affecting the free flow of commerce or threatening consequences injurious to the general welfare, it shall be the duty of employers and employees, and their representatives to—

(a) exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain collective-bargaining agreements for definite periods of time, concerning (1) rates of pay, hours, and terms and conditions of work; (2) adequate notice of desire to terminate or change such agreements; (3) absention from strikes, lockouts, or other acts of economic coercion in violation of such agreements; and (4) procedures for the peaceful settlement of disputes involving the interpretation or application of such agreements;

(b) participate fully and promptly in such meetings as may be undertaken by the Service for the purpose of aiding in a settlement of any dispute to which they are parties.

INTERPRETATION OF EXISTING AGREEMENTS

SEC. 205. It is the public policy of the United States that any collective-bargaining agreement in an industry affecting commerce shall provide procedures by which either party to such agreement may refer disputes growing out of the interpretation or application of the agreement to final and binding arbitration. The Service is authorized and directed to assist employers and labor organizations in—

(a) developing such procedures;

(b) applying such procedures to individual cases, including assistance in framing the issues in dispute and the terms and conditions under which the arbitration proceedings shall be conducted, including methods for the selection of the arbitrator or arbitrators; and

(c) selecting an arbitrator or arbitrators, including making available to the parties a roster of names from which the parties may choose one or more arbitrators and, if the parties so desire, designating one or more arbitrators.

LABOR-MANAGEMENT ADVISORY COMMITTEES

SEC. 206. (a) The Secretary of Labor shall appoint such labor-management advisory committees as he deems necessary or appropriate in the administration of this title. The membership of each such committee shall consist of equal numbers of labor and management representatives, and one or more public members. The Secretary shall designate a public member as chairman. Members of such advisory committees shall serve without compensation, but shall receive transportation, and per diem in lieu of subsistence at a rate of $25 a day, as authorized by section 5 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (5 U. S. C. 73b–2), for persons so serving. Such committees shall have authority to adopt, amend, or rescind such rules and regulations as may be necessary to the performance of their functions.

(b) Such advisory committees shall advise the Secretary on questions of policy and administration affecting the work of the Service and shall perform such other functions to help in achieving the purposes of this title as the Secretary may request.

TITLE III—NATIONAL EMERGENCIES

DECLARATION OF NATIONAL EMERGENCY

SEC. 301. Whenever the President finds that a national emergency is threatened or exists because a stoppage of work has resulted or threatens to result from a labor dispute (including the expiration of a collective-bargaining agreement) in a vital industry which affects the public interest, he shall issue a proclamation to that effect and call upon the parties to the dispute to refrain from a stoppage of work, or if such stoppage has occurred, to resume work and operations in the public interest.

EMERGENCY BOARDS

SEC. 302. (a) After issuing such a proclamation, the President shall promptly appoint a board to be known as an "emergency board".

(c) After a Presidential proclamation has been issued under section 301, and until five days have elapsed after the report has been made by the board appointed under this section, the parties to the dispute shall continue or resume work and operations under the terms and conditions of employment which were in effect immediately prior to the beginning of the dispute unless a change therein is agreed to by the parties.

POWERS OF EMERGENCY BOARDS

SEC. 303. (a) A separate emergency board shall be appointed pursuant to section 302 for each dispute and shall be composed of such number of persons as the President may deem appropriate, none of whom shall be pecuniarily or otherwise interested in any organizations of employees or in any employer involved in the dispute. The provisions of section 11 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by this Act (relating to the investigatory powers of the National Labor Relations Board) shall be applicable with respect to any board appointed under this section, and its members and agents, and with respect to the exercise of their functions, in the same manner that such provisions are applicable with respect to the National Labor Relations Board. Any board appointed under this section may prescribe or adopt such rules and regulations as it deems necessary to govern its functions. Members of emergency boards shall receive compensation, at rates determined by the President, when actually employed, and travel expenses as authorized by section 5 of the Act of August 2, 1946 (5 U. S. C. 73b–2), for persons so employed. When a board appointed under this section has been dissolved, its records shall be transferred to the Secretary of Labor.

TITLE IV—MISCELLANEOUS PROVISIONS

APPLICATION OF ANTI-INJUNCTION STATUTES

SEC. 401. The Act entitled "An Act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes" (Norris-LaGuardia Act), approved March 24, 1932 (U. S. C., title 29, secs. 101–115), and sections 6 and 20 of the Act entitled "An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes" (Clayton Act) approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 17, and title 29, sec. 52), are continued in full force and effect in accordance with the provisions of such Act; except that the provisions of such Act and such sections shall not be construed to be applicable with respect to section 10 of the National Labor Relations Act.

POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS

SEC. 402. Section 610 of title 18 of the United States Code (Public Law 772, Eightieth Congress, second session), is amended to read as follows:

"SEC. 610. It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution in connection with any election to any political office, or for any corporation whatever to make a contribution in connection with any election to any political office, or for any corporation whatever to make a contribution in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to, Congress are to be voted for, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section. Every corporation which makes any contribution in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $5,000; and every officer or director of any corporation who consents to any contribution by the corporation in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $1,000, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both."

DEFINITIONS

SEC. 403. When used in this Act—

(1) The term "industry affecting commerce" means any industry or activity in commerce or in which a labor dispute would burden or obstruct commerce or tend to burden or obstruct commerce or the free flow of commerce.

(2) The terms "commerce", "affecting commerce", "labor dispute", "employer", "employee", "labor organization", and "person" shall have the same meaning as when used in the National Labor Relations Act as reenacted by title I of this Act.

SAVING PROVISION

SEC. 404. Nothing in this Act shall be construed to require an individual employee to render labor or service without his consent, nor shall anything in this Act be construed to make the quitting of his labor by an individual employee an illegal act; nor shall any court issue any process to compel the performance by an individual employee of such labor or service, without his consent; nor shall the quitting of labor by an employee or employees in good faith because of abnormally dangerous conditions for work at the place of employment of such employee or employees be deemed a strike under this Act.

EXEMPTION OF RAILWAY LABOR ACT

SEC. 405. The provisions of titles II and III of this Act shall not be applicable with respect to any matter which is subject to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act, as amended.

SEPARABILITY

SEC. 406. If any provision of this Act, or the application thereof to any person or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of this Act, or the application of such provision to other persons or circumstances, shall not be affected thereby.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I move you call the roll to ascertain if there is a quorum present.

Mr. POWELL. I second the motion.

Mr. KELLEY. The clerk will call the roll.

(The roll call was taken by the clerk.)

Mr. KELLEY. Ten members are present, which is a quorum.

I wish to call the attention of the members to the fact that those rules of procedure which we adopted several days ago are going to be carried out explicitly, and I hope that the members will cooperate with the chairman. I do not want to be placed in the embarassing position of having to call your attention to a violation of the rules.

The first witness this morning is the Hon. Peter W. Rodino, Jr.

Mr. Rodino, you represent the Tenth New Jersey District?

Mr. RODINO. Yes, sir; I come from the Tenth New Jersey District, the district which was formerly represtented by Fred A. Hartley, Jr.

Mr. KELLEY. By Mr. Hartley?

Mr. RODINO. That is right, sir, the person who was the co-author of the Taft-Hartley law.

TESTIMONY OF HON. PETER W. RODINO, JR., A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW JERSEY

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say at the outset that I have a committee meeting to attend in about 45 minutes, and if the Chairman will take that into cognizance, I would like to be excused after I am through with my questioning.

Mr. KELLEY. I think that we should be able to expedite our hearings in sufficient time. I think 45 minutes is plenty of time.

Mr. RODINO. Mr. Chairman, my purpose in appearing here this morning is that I would like to make known to the members of this committee how the people of my district feel about the Taft-Hartley law. I am not a constitutional lawyer nor an expert in labor law, but I believe that as a representative of the people of the Tenth District of New Jersey, I am qualified to speak for them.

I urge the members of this committee to act with all possible speed to report favorably H. R. 2032, which was introduced by the chairman of this committee, providing for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reenactment of the Wagner Act, with certain necessary amendments.

Probably the most important contribution that I can make to your deliberations is to say emphatically that the people of my district want to see this act repealed. I believe that the reason why Mr. Hartley did not choose to run is that he could not have won on the issue of the Taft-Hartley Act. I may say that because, as a Representative of the Tenth District of New Jersey, I know the pulse and the sentiments of those people.

I would like to go back to a period of time, 1946, when there were strikes and there were labor disputes. These strikes took place after the war when the workers' take-home pay dropped because of overtime and premium pay stopping. And on top of that, prices of those things that the workers and their families had to have to live on were going up while the take-home pay was going down. I do not believe that they could have done anything else. The people tried to negotiate and in some cases—and I refer back to the General Motors strike, the union offered to arbitrate—reduced their demands to whatever the General Motors Corp. could pay without either increasing prices or reducing profits below a very generous yield on net worth.

The union went into hearings of a fact-finding board which was set up by the President, but the corporation walked out and refused to cooperate. Then when the fact-finding board made its recommendations, the union accepted, but the corporation refused, and the strike went on all through the winter of 1946.

I can attest to that. I know how it struck home, because my father was one of those persons who was employed by the Hyatt Roller Bearing Co. of General Motors.

In that case, I would like to ask, Who was being cooperative and who was being uncooperative? Who was considering the public welfare, not to speak of the welfare of the wage-earners and their families? Who was telling the public welfare to be damned for the sake of profits in an attempt to try to beat the General Motors workers to their knees? I say, thank God the General Motors workers held out and got a settlement for the amount that had been recommended by the fact-finding board. It was a good strike and a necessary strike because of the attitude of this great corporation that was trying to set a pattern for postwar America: a pattern of behavior in which the American wage-earners, who had turned out the greatest production in the history of the world, were going to be put through the economic wringer and have their unions weakened and maybe broken by vast corporate power.

After that, there was the steel strike. And I feel that that was necessary because of the attitude of the United States Steel Corp. I remember it became a matter of public record at that time that those big gilt-edged corporations held a secret meeting in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel in the winter of 1946 in which they discussed the matter of a labor policy. It is all a matter of record in the hearings before the Senate Labor Committee, I believe, and any member of this committee can look it up. C. E. Wilson, of General Electric, told about it on the stand, and later, another C. E. Wilson, of General Motors, testifying in a National Labor Relations Board hearing in Detroit on an unfair-labor charge filed against the corporation, explained that he had met there with the representatives of the other corporations because "we were all looking down the barrel of the same gun." He went on to tell the examiner, who, by the way, was the same Gerard Reilly, then a member of the National Labor Relations Board, who is now on the General Motors pay roll at $3,000 a month, as a Washington lobbyist, I believe, that it was a pity that those men—meaning the management representatives meeting secretly in the Waldorf-Astoria Hotel—could not "make the decisions for the country."

That, of course, was the prevailing atmosphere in 1946. And later in the year, price control was weakened and finally killed, and the National Association of Manufacturers and the Chamber of Commerce stampeded the American people with full-page ads into voting for candidates who promised to take off price control altogether on the understanding that we would have such a flood of goods that prices would come down. You know whether they did or not. I do not have to tell you.

Then in 1947, instead of blaming the profiteers who were cashing in millions of profits on the people's need for goods, the Eightieth Congress, adopted the Taft-Hartley bill. I, of course, was not here at that time when the bill was being considered. Probably some of you gentlemen on the committee were here and know a good deal more about what went on than I do. But I read some of the statements concerning the meetings, and I recall that Representative Klein of New York, who was then a member of the House Labor Committee, speaking in the House on February 15, 1947, had this to say:

> The bill was * * * actually written with the help of * * * the National Association of Manufacturers and the United States Chamber of Commerce. Some of the most valuable assistance came from William Ingles, who * * * represents Allis-Chambers Co., Fruehauf Trailer Co. J. I. Case Co., the Falk Corp., and Inland Steel Co. * * * Patrioteer Theodore R. Isserman put aside his rich Chrysler law practice for 2 full weeks to help out the House Labor Committee.

Then on the following day, Representative Karsten of Missouri filled in the broad intent by making this statement:

> The authors of this bill are clearly not interested in pushing the American economy steadily uphill to higher living standards. They are bent upon establishing monopoly control over the roller coaster and taking the American people for a dangerous ride.

Then later on, when the bill got over into the Senate, Senator George D. Aiken said during the debate on May 12, 1947:

Mr. President, the leaders of industry who gave the committee members all kinds of advice were for the most part vindictive, and it was clear to me, at least, from their attitude that their principal desire was to destroy labor organizations completely. * * * We have been subjected to the most intensive, expensive, and vicious propaganda campaign that any Congress has ever been subjected to.

Then, later on, on June 5, 1947, Senator Morse of Oregon had this to say:

I supported the Senate committee bill, which was a fair, reasonable, constructive, and enforceable bill, and I opposed the amendments that were made on the floor of the Senate because they seemed to me to strike serious blows at the rights of labor and to impair the efficient administration of the law. The amendments which have been made in conference not only infinitely aggravate and multiply every serious vice of the Senate amendments, but they add such restrictive and administratively unfeasible provisions of their own that even if I believed the bill we passed was sound and helpful, I would be compelled to vote against the conference bill, because of the inevitably disastrous effects I am sure it will have on industrial peace in this country. I say with every emphasis at my command that this bill will be causative, not preventive, of labor difficulties.

That was Senator Morse speaking on June 5, 1947.

Then, gentlemen of the committee, on December 18, 1948, Business Week, a publication of repute among businessmen, stated that—

Few [businessmen] are wasting time deploring the imminent doom of the Taft-Hartley Act.

It stated further:

What was wrong was that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far. It crossed the narrow line separating a law which aims only to regulate from one which could destroy.

Given a few million unemployed in America, given an administration in Washington which was not prounion—and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck labor movements.

These are the provisions that could do it: First, picketing can be restrained by injunction; second, employers can petition for a collective-bargaining election; third, strikers can be held ineligible to vote—while the strike replacements cast the only ballots; and, fourth, if the outcome of this is a "no-union" vote, the Government must certify and enforce it.

Any time there is a surplus labor pool from which an employer can hire at least token strike replacements, these four provisions, linked together, presumably can destroy a union.

I can go further and say that people who are considered to be manufacturers, in the Daily Labor Report of Business and National Affairs reported that the general counsel of the Illinois Manufacturers Association told an audience of employers that the employers would suffer no great loss but would gain in some respects from a repeal of at least seven provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. These are: First, union security; second, suability; third, multiplicity of elections; fourth, 60-days' notice; fifth, injunctions; sixth, financial statements and, seventh, anti-Communist affidavits.

In June 1947 Senator Morse had warned his party, the Republican Party, in these words:

If you pass a piece of labor legislation as unfair as the Taft-Hartley bill you will hear about it at the ballot boxes, because millions of independent voters—yes, and Republican voters—will not in 1948 support a party which passes such a bill.

And on March 1, the same Senator Morse, speaking in the Senate, cited his earlier warnings and remarked that the voters in 1948 did not support a party which passed such a bill. He said:

> In 1948 we lost not only millions of independent voters, but we lost several million Republican voters, because of the serious mistake the Congress made in passing the Taft-Hartley bill. * * *
> In my opinion, there were men sitting in the United States Senate in 1947 and men sitting in the House of Representatives in 1947 on the Republican side, who still would be in the Congress had we not passed the Taft-Hartley bill. The leaders in my party can rationalize that election all they please, but I think it is perfectly obvious that we lost a large number of seats in the Senate and in the House because of the passage of the Taft-Hartley law.

I believe that Senator Morse in all of these statements has indicated what the effect of the Taft-Hartley law has been, and I think he makes good sense, and the Senator from Oregon has been proved a good prophet.

I might interject a remark here. Although the man whom I succeeded—Fred Hartley—did not choose to run, the person who was my opponent during the election of 1948 stated emphatically in his polite form that he was going to take up where Hartley left off. And, gentlemen, I leave it for you to judge. That man is not here now. The people of my district returned me and one of the principal issues of my campaign was repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

Considering all that Senator Morse has said and what the general counsel for the Illinois Manufacturers has stated and what happened during the elections of 1948 to some of the former Members of Congress, I think at the risk of a smaller majority in 1950, I urge upon this committee and the House that counsel given by Senator Morse, of Oregon, and I express the hope that there may be bipartisan support of H. R. 2032, repealing the act sponsored by my predecessor and reenacting the Wagner Act, with amendments.

In New Jersey, our feeling is that the act was, as Senator Aiken indicated during debate on the Hill, conceived, written, and passed in an atmosphere of vindictiveness and unfairness to the organized wage earners of this country. Labor, which was already one of the principal victims of run-away inflation, was being put in a strait jacket and kicked around under the Taft-Hartley Act. Employers who wanted to continue peaceful industrial relations were also put in a strait-jacket. However, that backfired because this, to my mind, is still a free country, and because the American people just cannot support a law that creates division, bad feeling, and controversy.

That has been the effect of the Taft-Hartley Act. The people of my district and the people of New Jersey and the people of the United States do not like this law and would like to see it repealed.

I feel that the district which I represent has a fair cross section of America within it. After having gone up and down that district during two campaigns I believe I can attest to certain facts. In 1946, when I ran against Fred A. Hartley before he coauthored the act, he did beat me. But after the law had been enacted I won on the merits of working against the Taft-Hartley Act. I would like to state that this act has had a serious impact right in New Jersey, and I would like to cite certain of the cases that I know of first-hand.

To my mind, it has been over a year and a half now since that law has been enacted, and the experience which I seem to have found has been that the trade-unions have been unable to bargain collectively, and as a result they have been hard hit. In short, I feel that the Taft-Hartley law has inspired employers who are still not willing to accept collective bargaining as a permanent fixture in our economic system to invoke Government aid in furthering opposition to the legitimate functions of trade-unions. It has encouraged employer resistance to the justifiable union activities and it has provided antiunion employers with a weapon possessing the potential destructive power to legislate the trade-union movement into obscurity and oblivion.

I would like to cite how the Taft-Hartley law has completely destroyed one union in New Jersey. The collective-bargaining agent for 2,100 employees of the New Jersey Bell Telephone Co. in its accounting and general departments had been the Communications Workers of America, Accounting Division No. 64. This local participated in the national telephone strike in 1947, and had engaged the company in arbitration proceedings under the New Jersey State compulsory arbitration law.

During the summer of 1948, the company challenged the majority status of the union. On September 17, 1948, arrangements were completed between the company and the union for a consent election under the auspices of the New Jersey State Mediation Board. Three days later, however, the company announced it was granting additional wage increases of $4 a week.

This was done without consultation with the union and on a completely unilateral basis.

On September 22, 1948, the union filed charges of unfair labor practices against the company, charging violations of section 7, section 8 (a) (1), and section 8 (a) (5). The union asked the board to proceed under section 10 of the act asking for an injunction to restrain the company from giving wage increases until an election could be held in an atmosphere free from interference from the company's bald attempt to influence the employees in the exercise of their rights to self-organization, and manipulating a no-union vote in the election.

The papers presented to Robert N. Denham, general counsel of the Taft-Hartley National Labor Relations Board, charged that the company was attempting to circumvent the New Jersey statute calling for compulsory arbitration of labor disputes affecting public utilities; that the company had saved almost $100,000 in retroactive payments alone, and was also endeavoring to get away from its obligation to mediate and arbitrate some 23 issues which the union had presented to the State mediation board for several months previous.

In spite of the company's flagrant violation of the law, the general counsel refused to act, stating that he did not believe the law had been violated, and that he only proceeded by injunction in cases that had serious implications and involved large numbers of people.

The National Labor Relations Board has ruled in a large number of cases that attempts by employers to impose unilateral increases while representative elections were pending were violation of the law.

The general counsel himself had instituted injunctive proceedings against unions where only 10 or 15 people were involved. Yet, here were 2,100 New Jersey Bell Telephone employees directly concerned, and 20,000 additional New Jersey and 500,000 other employees of the A. T. & T. indirectly affected, and the injunction proceedings were not used.

The refusal of the general counsel to prevent a violation of the law in this instance, compared with the haste and speed with which he had acted against trade-unions in other cases, seems to be first-hand evidence of the fact that the Taft-Hartley law is being administered in such a fashion as to bring about the destruction of the trade-union movement or to impede union organization. And the attorney for the union in this instance summed up all in a letter to the general counsel by saying:

> In the circumstances, I have been instructed by my client to withdraw the charges of unfair labor practice. It would be an idle ceremony to process the charge, wait a year or two for its disposition and wind up with a slap on the company's wrist in the form of a cease-and-desist order.

In another case, the case of the CIO United Automobile Workers representing the 20 employees of the Harnishfeger Corp., in Newark, we might also see the impact of the Taft-Hartley law. In a flagrant display of what I think are dictatorial tactics, the company informed the local union that it would not bargain unless the union's president had been replaced. This attempt to dictate not only wages and conditions for the workers, but also to hand-pick suitable union representatives was a typical maneuver of the company. The action becomes even more odious when it is realized that the company's objection to the president of the local was predicated solely upon the fact that he was a Negro.

The union president offered to resign in his desire to avoid a disastrous strike. However, the local's members stood shoulder to shoulder in a masterful display of union solidarity and insisted that the democratically elected officers of the union be permitted to carry out the functions for which they were chosen.

On the basis of the company's refusal to bargain with the Negro president, the union was forced to call a strike. The company, intent upon breaking the union, invoked the Taft-Hartley law, and succeeded in securing an injunction restraining the union from picketing. The intention of the injunction soon became obvious. An advertisement was placed in a newspaper from a nearby town offering employment to veterans at attractive rates of pay, but specifically ignoring all mention of the labor dispute.

The company picked up the veterans at a central point, herded them into cars, drove them to the plant and then attempted to spirit them past the token picket line. It is obvious to my mind that the company employed the injunction restricting picketing to facilitate the transportation of strikebreakers into the plant.

I would like to add here, however, with a justifiable feeling of pride, that when the veterans came upon the scene, and realized that they had been unwittingly drawn into a strike situation as prospective strikebreakers, they refused to take any part in the proceedings and returned to their homes.

Today the plant is closed and the 200 workers have been forced to seek employment elsewhere. The case is just another example where the Taft-Hartley law has served to thwart the processes of collective bargaining and has resulted in a demise of the local union.

I might cite other cases that have occurred in New Jersey. I know that particularly one of the unions in the Eastern Tool Co., where there are 800 employees, has indicated their desire to join the United Steelworkers. However, because of fear of reprisals of the Taft-Hartley law and because the employers refused to bargain, the men of the Eastern Tool Co. just cannot get together into a union organization.

I cite these cases because I have seen them first-hand; I have received letters from many of these people of my district who have cited many of these instances to me. I have investigated some of them personally, and I have had various discussions with the people affected. In all of these instances, gentlemen of the committee, I have been able to find that the voice of the people of the Tenth District of New Jersey lends itself to the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Powell, have you any questions?

Mr. POWELL. I just want to get this very clear. Our colleague from New Jersey ran on the platform advocating, if elected, the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. RODINO. That is right.

Mr. POWELL. And he ran in Mr. Hartley's former district?

Mr. RODINO. That is right. And I might add, Mr. Powell, that the town of Kearny, which had been Republican for 80 years, which, incidentally, is Fred Hartley's old home town, went Democratic for the first time when I ran in 1948, and I campaigned vigorously there, and one of the general principal issues was the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. POWELL. Do you know what Mr. Hartley's present occupation is?

Mr. RODINO. I read a statement in the newspaper, and I know that he is now presently the president of the National Tool Owners Union. If I recollect in reading the hearings, I believe that the National Tool Owners Union was an organization that appeared during the hearings on the Taft-Hartley bill, urging stronger control of unions while restricting their rights.

Mr. POWELL. That is right.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Congressman Rodino, I have observed in your testimony that you say you represent the Tenth District of New Jersey.

Mr. RODINO. That is right, Mr. Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. You have also testified that that is the district formerly represented by Congressman Hartley?

Mr. RODINO. That is right, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. One of the authors of the Taft-Hartley labor legislation?

Mr. RODINO. Yes, sir. I have his book here from which I would like to read something.

Mr. BAILEY. You have also just testified that Mr. Hartley is now connected in an official capacity with the Tool Owners Union?

Mr. RODINO. Yes, sir. I have a newspaper clipping from the Kearny Observer, from his very town, which cites that.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I have before me a certified copy of the decision of the New York Board of Standards and Appeals of the New York Department of Labor, made by this board on the application of the Tool Owners Union for certification in the State of New York. This decision is certified by Francis J. Wazeler, counsel of the board.

I would like to read into the record at this point, Mr. Chairman, if I have permission to do so, some excerpts from the finding of the board.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Chairman, is Fred Hartley on trial here this morning?

Mr. KELLEY. It is the Tool Owners Union. It is perfectly in order.

Mr. BAILEY. The Tool Owners Union.

Mr. KELLEY. They appeared before the committee on behalf of the Taft-Hartley bill 2 years ago.

Mr. BAILEY (reading):

State of New York, department of labor, board of standards and appeals, Albany, N. Y.; in the matter of application for approval of certificate of authority of Tool Owners Union; case No. CI-37-46.

Reading from the decision:

On February 26, 1946, the secretary of the State of Delaware received for filing the certificate of incorporation of the Tool Owners Union. As of that date, Tool Owners Union became a Delaware corporation, authorized by said certificate to have "offices or places where the activities of this corporation may be carried on in all States of the United States, the District of Columbia, or in Territories or in colonies of the United States."

I read further from the decision, Mr. Chairman:

In keeping with the board's duty, a very careful study has been made to determine whether or not the purposes of this foreign corporation are in all respects consistent with public policy and the labor law of the State of New York.

I read from page 4 of the board's decision a reference to the membership of this Tool Owners Union. It consists of life members, who make one contribution of $1,000; subscribing members, who contribute annually $100; sustaining members, who contribute annually $50; supporting members, who contribute annually $10; contributing members, who contribute annually $5; and regular members, who contribute annually the sum of $1.

It is repeated in the bylaws that

None of the above six classes of members, life members, subscribing members, sustaining members, supporting members, contributing members, and regular members, shall have the right to vote on any question or issue of whatsoever kind, nature, and description affecting the organization or its activities and affairs nor have they the right to manage or control the union or its board of founders in any manner or to any extent whatsoever.

Quoting again, Mr. Chairman, from page 8 in the decision of the Board:

This organization is a pressure group.

The Tool Owners Union at different times during crucial strikes in 1946, advertised in both local and nationally read papers in the United States * * * It is natural to assume that the reader would react favorably to these advertisements. Tool Owners Union in preparing these advertisements certainly expected to obtain a favorable reaction. Readers were urged to join. Prominently displayed in these advertisements were seven classes of membership. * * * But the joiner or subscriber does not learn from these announcements that he is giving financial aid and moral support to an organization in which he will have no share in the determination of its policies or the means by which those policies would be effected. * * *

The use of the expression "Regular members" would make the joiner feel that he would have the right that regular members of organizations to which he has belonged, enjoy. * * *

"The first board of founders, to quote the bylaws: "shall be elected at the first meeting of the incorporators." * * * Now, who are the incorporators? Allen W. Rucker and Elsie M. Rucker, his wife, and Fred H. Nickels, Mr. Rucker's partner in the advertising business.

Again I quote:

Whatever the reasons Mr. Rucker made certain that the destinies of this corporation and 50,000,000 people whom he hoped to attract to the same would be controlled by himself. The incorporators were he, his wife, and his partner. He was safe here because his wife could be expected to side with him as against his partner, if his partner did not agree.

Quoting from page 12 of the findings of this board:

No more fascistic organization with all the potentiality for undemocratic action and danger to our way of life has yet come before the official attention of this board. * * *

We do not want this to happen in America. It might happen here. It might be that Mr. Rucker and his associates have only the most laudable, unselfish and charitable devotion to the welfare of all Americans and the principles of democracy. We do not intend any word in this decision to be construed otherwise but because of what took place in Germany and Japan and what is appearing today in Russia and Poland and other dictator-dominated countries might take place here we must be ever on our guard.

The board in its final decision has the following to say:

To guard the public and generally the union worker against this confusion, section 9–a of the general corporation law and section 11, subdivision 1–a, of the membership corporation law were enacted and later amended. Organized labor and the workingman who looks to his union for leadership have the right to protect their use of the word "union."

The board therefore regards it to be its duty on this additional and independent ground to refuse its approval to the certificate of authority of this foreign corporation.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has one minute left.

Mr. BAILEY. (Continuing reading):

Wherefore, considering the certificate of authority, the certificate of incorporation, its bylaws and all the evidence offered for and against this Delaware corporation, the board concludes that approval of the certificate of authority of Tool Owners Union is contrary to public policy and adopts the following resolution:

"Be it resolved, That the certificate of authority of Tool Owners Union, a Delaware corporation, acknowledged by the subscribers on February 20, 1946, and filed with the board on September 9, 1946, be and hereby is disapproved. * * *"

It is signed by William H. Roberts, chairman; Raymond M. Fisher, a member; and H. Myron Lewis, a member, dated New York, February 27, 1947.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving.

Mr. IRVING. Congressman, are you familiar with the strike or lock-out that is going on in New York, or has been going on in the baking industry?

Mr. RODINO. No, sir, I am not familiar with that.

Mr. IRVING. I understand that there is one baking company which is having a labor dispute there and that 5 or 6 of the other large baking companies shut down their plants, which, of course, is a lock-out. I just wonder if this is not some kind of reverse boycott proposition and if it is entirely in the public interest and welfare of this country to shut down 6 or 7 of the major bakeries supplying New York City without regard to where the people are going to get their daily bread.

Would you care to comment on such a situation?

Mr. RODINO. No. I said that I am not familiar presently with that; so I will not comment. I do not know all the implications of it.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you very much. That is all I have to say at this time.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. No questions

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I listened very carefully to the outline given by Congressman Bailey, but I failed to catch, if you will yield, Mr. Bailey, as to who is eligible for membership in this Tool Owners Union. Who is eligible to membership?

Mr. BAILEY. Any citizen of the United States or any of its possessions.

Mr. WIER. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Howell?

Mr. HOWELL. I had a couple of questions, but I know the Congressman has to get to a committee meeting; so I will defer.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Chairman, I am not going to ask any questions of the witness, but I have been rather amazed at the turn of events so far of these hearings. I thought we were to consider the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law and consider what changes should be made and where they have caused trouble, and so on. So far, it seems the hearings have been devoted to Mr. Fred Hartley and the Tool Owners Union. I know nothing about the Tool Owners Union. They testified here last year, and many other people and organizations have testified for and against the Taft-Hartley law.

If our committee is going to spend its time investigating the character and type of every witness and every organization that testified for or against the Taft-Hartley law, we will be here for a few months. I do not know what we are seeking to prove, but I think it would be more helpful if in the future we devoted ourselves to provisions pro and con of the Taft-Hartley law.

As to Mr. Hartley's not choosing to run again, Mr. Hartley himself told me right at the beginning of the Eightieth Congress that he had stated publicly in his district that he was not going to run. As far as I know, his failure to run denoted a sticking to his original intention of not planning to run for another term.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MCCONNELL. No. I do not yield. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Irving asked you about a lock-out of the bakers, and you said you did not know anything about them.

Mr. RODINO. I do not know all the implications of it. I am not conversant with it.

Mr. SMITH. Do you know anything about the implications of the cemetery strike in New York at the moment?

Mr. RODINO. I have read of the cemetery strike in the newspapers, yes.

Mr. SMITH. You said in your statement with respect to the General Motors strike, "It was a good strike." Do you think the cemetery strike in New York is a good strike?

Mr. RODINO. I am not qualified to say without delving into all the implications of it. These cases that I mentioned, I am familiar with, and I investigated them personally. I know of them because they struck home. Where I am not qualified, I will not speak.

Mr. SMITH. You would not say that the cemetery strike did not strike home, would you, to the people that have bodies waiting to be buried?

Mr. RODINO. I would not say one way or the other at this time. If you are asking me the question, I still do not know all the implications of it.

Mr. SMITH. In the first part of your statement, you devoted a great deal of your time to quoting Senator Morse, and you said that he was a very fine prophet.

Mr. RODINO. I believe he is.

Mr. SMITH. What do you think about his prophecy that the Taft-Hartley Act would not be repealed?

Mr. RODINO. I am merely a spokesman of the people of my district, and I would like to say here that I feel that in taking up the time of the committee, it has been solely to inform the committee of the thoughts of the people of my district. And I merely want to bring to them at least the thoughts of those people whom I feel I know rather well, and their thoughts, it would seem to me, would be that the Taft-Hartley law should be repealed. Whether it is done or not, I do not know. That is for you gentlemen and the Members of Congress to decide.

Mr. SMITH. You say the Taft-Hartley Act is a most terrible law, restrictive on unions, and unions cannot operate. How do you account for the fact that union membership has increased during the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. RODINO. I believe I have something here which is entirely to the contrary. I believe that Senator Morse, again, who I feel is qualified to speak on this—although I do not say that the gentleman himself is not—says that a great fallacy is being muttered in America today about the effect of the Taft-Hartley law on unions. Statistics are advanced to show that there has been no increase in union membership. The union election provision is chiefly responsible for that. It boomeranged against the proponent of the bill. The real test is what has happened to the creation of new locals. That is a test as to whether or not unionization in America is really advancing. The sad fact is that the Taft-Hartley law has been a great impediment to organizational drives in this country.

So it would seem to me that that is rather inconsistent with the gentleman's statement.

Mr. SMITH. You have also quoted Senator Morse as saying that this would bring about industrial unrest. Now, what are your statistics as to whether or not there have been more strikes since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act or in the period of 18 months previously?

Mr. RODINO. Sir, I do not have the statistics, but I can say this, speaking as one who has milled around the people who are directly involved, that there is unrest amongst them. They feel that there has been an impediment to collective bargaining, and they feel that unless this act is repealed so that they may be able to sit across the table and bargain as they should in the fair American custom, there will continue to be a labor unrest.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Velde?

Mr. VELDE. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Morton?

Mr. MORTON. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Rodino.

I wish to say this, and I want all the members to hear it. The Chair thinks it is perfectly in order to question the validity of the testimony of any witnesses or those who are actively in support or against the Taft-Hartley law. But I wish to call the attention of the members to this fact, that with respect to all witnesses, all questioning must be confined to H. R. 2032, and any questions outside of that will be considered out of order.

The Chair wishes to say that Congressman Rich, who was here, had to leave for another meeting, and he wishes to request that his statement be submitted in the record.

Without objection, it will be so ordered.

(The statement is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF HON. ROBERT F. RICH, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Gentlemen, I appear before you today for the purpose of making a statement relative to the proposed changes in the Taft-Hartley law. In so doing I am most interested that any changes in the law should be in the best interest of this country and its people.

Telegrams and letters have been sent me from practically all the labor unions in my congressional district, especially the CIO and United Mine Workers of America locals, urging the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. Some called it "infamous" and others an "un-American piece of legislation." I replied to each, asking that they analyze the law section by section and point out to me their objections. To date I have not received one reply to my request.

Some days ago a representative of the United Electrical, Radio and Machine Workers of America delivered to my office petitions signed by residents of my congressional district, petitioning the repeal of the Taft Hartley "antiunion act." I put forth the same above question to this representative and asked that the local unions send me an analysis of their objections, which has not been forthcoming.

In addition I have received from residents of my district many questionnaires, listing 18 and 19 questions, respectively, all of which have been answered substantially as the attached, which I wish to make a part of the record, as it reflects the results of these two polls.

"HOW WOULD YOU REVISE OUR LABOR LAWS?

"1. Do you believe that labor laws should, in general, preserve the employee's right to strike? Yes.

"2. Do you believe labor laws should give the President of the United States the right to seek, through courts of law, to delay a strike that would cause a national emergency endangering the health and safety of the entire country? Yes.

"3. When two or more unions are fighting each other over who shall do a job or who shall represent the employees, and a strike is called to compel an employer to give to the members of one union the work or recognition being given to the other unions—that is a jurisdictional strike. Should labor laws prohibit such strikes? Yes.

"4. Should labor laws prohibit secondary boycotts—that is, prevent an employer and his employees, where there is no labor dispute, from being damaged by a union seeking to coerce another employer having a labor dispute? Yes.

"5. Should labor laws provide that an employer cannot deduct union dues or assessments from wages unless the employee gives his personal O. K.? Yes.

"6. Do you believe labor laws should see to it that both employers and unions be required to bargain in good faith? Yes.

"7. Should labor laws give to both employees and employers the freedom to express their own points of view on employee relations problems—provided such views, or arguments, or opinions do not promise bribes or threaten reprisals? Yes.

"8. Should labor laws protect the employee against unfair practices by unions and management? Yes.

"9. Do you believe that labor laws should require both union officials and company officials to swear they are not Communists or Fascists or members of any party or organization which plans to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence? Yes.

"10. Do you believe labor laws should require unions to make appropriate reports to members and government as to handling of funds—just as companies are required to make appropriate reports to owners and government? Yes.

"11. Should labor laws make it clear that a collective-bargaining contract must be honored by both parties? And that each has an equal right to sue the other for breaking the contract? Yes.

"12. Do you believe labor laws should make it unlawful for a union to compel an employer to engage in feather bedding; that is, to pay money for work which hasn't been done or won't be done? Yes.

"13. Should labor laws permit the forcing of an employer to hire only workers who belong to a given union? No.

"14. Do you believe it should be unlawful for an employee to be prevented from working by the use of violence, force, or intimidation? Yes.

"15. Do you believe foremen and other supervisors could properly perform their management duties of serving the balanced best interests of employees, customers and owners alike, if bargaining for supervisors by unions should be included in the labor laws? No.

"16. Do you believe labor laws should protect individual workers in the right to join or not to join a union—to remain or not to remain members—just as they individually wish? Yes.

"18. Should labor laws provide that a striker who has been replaced in the course of an economic strike—not involving any unfair labor practice—be permitted to vote in an election to choose a bargaining agent at the conclusion of the strike? No."

I submit also two letters for the record. One is from the Bovaird & Seyfang Manufacturing Co., of Bradford, Pa., expressing the sentiment of those engaged in business and employing labor, toward any changes in the present law. The same applies to the second letter, from the Kendall Refining Co., of Bradford, Pa., and signed by J. B. Fisher, president, which states one man's views on revising the Taft-Hartley law.

BOVAIRD & SEYFANG MANUFACTURING CO.,
Bradford, Pa., March 4, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT F. RICH,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

MY DEAR REPRESENTATIVE: We at Bovaird & Seyfang Manufacturing Co. believe that the hearings before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, dealing with contemplated changes in existing labor legislation, and subsequent action which will be taken by the Congress are so important, particularly as they may lead to legislation which will affect all segments of our economic society, that we feel it our duty to present to you our views regarding such labor legislation.

We think it will be of interest to you to know that our collective-bargaining experience under the Labor-Management Relations Act has been definitely improved over that of previous years. In our opinion, this improvement has been beneficial to the union, the employees, the company, and the public.

On the strength of our first-hand experience and on the firm conviction that collective bargaining cannot be conducted without harmful and lasting injury to all interested parties unless there are well-defined rules of fair play, we respectfully request your full consideration of our viewpoint that any new labor legislation should be based upon four fundamental considerations, which are as follows:

1. Individual employees should be provided with adequate protection;
2. The public interest should be protected;
3. A reasonable equality of position between labor and management; and
4. Administration of the law should be fair and impartial.

The law should provide employees with adequate protection as follows:

1. Individuals should be protected in their rights to refrain from, as well as engage in, collective activities.
2. The individual should be protected from coercion from all sources, employer and union.

3. The individual should be protected against discrimination by employer and union.

4. Closed shops should be outlawed.

5. The individual should not be deprived of his job except for nonpayment of reasonable financial obligations when a union shop exists.

6. Individual employees authorization for a check-off of dues should be required.

7. Employees should be permitted to request decertifications of unions.

8. Employees should be protected from Communist-dominated unions.

In order to keep a fair and impartial administration of the law, it should contain:

1. A requirement that the Board apply the same rules to independent unions as applied to national unions.

2. A requirement that run-off elections be between the two top choices.

3. A statute of limitations of filing unfair labor practices.

4. The separation of the functions of the general counsel from those of the Board.

In the interest of providing equality in the relationship between labor and management, the proposed bill should provide:

1. An equal responsibility of union and management for their contractual obligations.

2. An equal obligation of union and management to bargain in good faith.

3. An equal responsibility upon the union and management for the acts of their agents.

4. Freedom of speech for both employer and the union.

5. A prohibition against featherbedding practices.

6. The exclusion of supervisors from the law.

In consideration of the rights of the public, the proposed bill should contain:

1. The prohibition against strikes by Government employees.

2. Protection of State laws regulating union security.

3. Adequate provisions to prevent national emergency strikes.

4. An independent Mediation and Conciliation Service.

Very truly yours,

BOYAIRD & SEYFANG MANUFACTURING CO.,
B. V. EDRIDGE, Controller.

KENDALL REFINING CO.,
Bradford, Pa., March 3, 1949.

Hon. ROBERT F. RICH,
Member of Congress, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. RICH: I attach herewith a résumé of my views in regard to the way our labor laws should be revised.

I believe that the degree of prosperity which this country will enjoy in 1949 is closely linked with the wisdom with which our labor laws are revised. I am writing my views not because of any pressure from any organization, but simply out of a sense of duty to let you know the considered opinion of one of your constituents. My views may be unorthodox in some respects, but they are thoroughly sincere and honestly arrived at.

Yours is a great responsibility, and I know that you will devote a great deal of time and thought in an attempt to arrive at the best solution of this important problem. I sincerely hope that the revision, as finally voted, will prove to have been in the best interests of our country.

Very truly yours,

J. B. FISHER, President.

"ONE MAN'S OPINIONS ON REVISING OUR LABOR LAWS

"(1) The union shop should be permitted without the necessity of the members of the union holding a special election granting authority to their leaders to negotiate a union contract.

"(2) The new labor laws should not outlaw the closed shop. I am against a closed shop, but I believe that this is a matter for collective bargaining between labor and management.

"(3) Employees should have the right to strike, except Government employees who should not have the right to strike.

"(4) Foremen and other supervisors, who are a part of management, should not be permitted to bargain collectively with management.

"(5) The Communist affidavit should be signed by the employer as well as union officials.

"(6) The Conciliation Service should be maintained as an independent agency and not returned to the Labor Department.

"(7) The President of the United States should have the authority, through injunction, to delay strikes affecting public safety and health.

"(8) The employer should continue to have the right of free speech in expressing his point of view to his employees, provided the employer does so without coercion or promises.

"(9) Union coercion through mass picketing and physical violence should not be permitted.

"(10) Unions should be made responsible before the courts in the event of breach of contract.

"(11) Jurisdictional disputes and secondary boycotts should be prohibited."

This brief résumé reflects the consensus of opinion of the people of the Fifteenth Congressional District of Pennsylvania relative to labor and management. I suggest to the committee that it not be hasty in changing any labor law so as not to be in the position of favoring one segment of our population to the detriment of the greater number of our people. May you in your judgment be wise and judicious, charitable and understanding, and may you act for the best interest of our country after due and careful deliberation.

Mr. KELLEY. Congressman Madden.

TESTIMONY OF HON. RAY J. MADDEN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF INDIANA

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I represent the First District of Indiana.

The Eighty-first Congress should move rapidly ahead to carry out the mandate which the American people decreed on November 2, 1948.

The repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act will maintain the stability of our national economy, and strengthen America's hand in our quest for peace in the world.

The Wagner Act for the first time struck a sound, fair balance between the economic power of labor and management. It permitted labor and management to meet on equal footing and tackle their problems with the friendly assistance of government. It secured for labor the right of collective bargaining, which is the cornerstone of union organization. Thus working people were able to obtain, in a short time, the highest standard of living in history.

H. R. 2032 seeks to restore this atmosphere to the field of labor-management relations.

In returning to the philosophy of the Wagner Act in our national labor policy, it will be necessary, of course, to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act. This act was produced in 1947 and it sought to destroy the bargaining power of labor and to deprive working people of their full economic rights. It interjected the Government into the field of labor relations and bound negotiations in a maze of red tape and unnecessary litigation. The Taft-Hartley law was not conceived with the view of equalizing and stabilizing the conditions under which labor and management meet. Rather it was a punitive measure, and a restrictive measure.

What are some of the unfair and unwholesome effects of this law which we are committed to remove under H. R. 2032?

The closed shop was one major victim of the Taft-Hartley law. Closed-shop agreements had provided a satisfactory method for hiring of workers throughout the history of the American labor movement. Outlawing it was a futile action, since the Taft-Hartley law provided that the union shop, on the other hand, was legal. Workers chose the union shop in 97 percent of elections held under the law. If the architects of the Taft-Hartley law believed that a ban on the closed shop was desired by the workers, they were proved to be sadly mistaken.

The attitude of the publishing industry concerning the closed shop was summed up by Mr. John O'Keefe, secretary of the Chicago Newspaper Publishers' Association, testifying on December 22, 1947, before a subcommittee of the Committee on Education and Labor of the House of Representatives inquiring into the causes of the Chicago newspaper strike as follows:

Congressman KERSTEN. Up until now and for a great many years past you had a closed-shop agreement, didn't you?

Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, we did.

Mr. KERSTEN. How did that feature work out in your previous contracts, so far as your closed-shop provision of the contract was concerned?

Mr. O'KEEFE. We never even discussed it. It had been there for years and it has remained there.

Mr. KERSTEN. Did you have any real difficulty with it, so far as your union [the ITU] is concerned?

Mr. O'KEEFE. We did not. * * * As a matter of fact most of the Chicago publishers, or all of the Chicago publishers, I would say, would prefer to continue a closed shop if it were legal.

Mr. KERSTEN. The reason for that is that this particular union has been a long-term institution that has a certain amount of tradition behind it, a considerable amount and it is a responsible union, and under those conditions a closed shop has worked out so far as the Chicago publishers are concerned, is that right?

Mr. O'KEEFE. Yes, it has.

As another example, the National Labor Relations Board was forced to seek injunctions against unions to prevent secondary boycotts, even those for legitimate objectives, such as the protection of labor standards. Yet there was no rule requiring the NLRB to ask for injunctions against employers who were guilty of unfair labor practices.

Removal of the United States Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor and the creation of a new, independent agency, was completely unjustified. For 34 years before enactment of the Taft-Hartley law, the Conciliation Service of the Department of Labor has settled at least 100,000 cases in which there were serious disputes. Immediately before this transfer of functions, the Conciliation Service was settling, without work stoppages, more than 90 percent of cases in which no work stoppage had occurred at the time a conciliator was named.

One of the significant features of this new labor bill is that the conciliation service will be restored to the Department—where it belongs.

The Taft-Hartley law's establishment of the general counsel as independent from the National Labor Relations Board itself was contrary to sound administrative policy. As President Truman predicted in his veto message, this caused conflict between the Board and its general counsel. Under the Taft-Hartley law the counsel, not the Board, was allowed to decide which charges were to be heard by the NLRB and which orders of the Board were to be referred to the courts. Under the new bill, the NLRB will no longer be the only agency of the Government with this unworkable separation of functions.

Procedure for the numerous elections required by the Taft-Hartley law was apparently designed to keep unsettled the relations between employers and unions. Denial of voting rights to strikers in representation elections, while granting such a vote to strike-breakers, is a discrimination which would permit the employer to hire nonunion replacements—enough of them to eject the union from the plant.

Under the Taft-Hartley law, by the simple expedient of petitioning for a choice of bargaining representatives—even when not faced with conflicting claims for recognition—the employer can win a year's freedom from union organization.

Welfare funds for protecting the health and well-being of employees were made the subject of stringent regulations—and despite the terms of the Norris-LaGuardia Act, injunctions for violations may be sought.

The prohibition of political activity by unions was an undemocratic provision of the Taft-Hartley law. Labor organizations, alone among voluntary associations, are forbidden to participate in political affairs, under that act.

The Federal courts have become burdened with damage suits allowed by the Taft-Hartley Act. Administrative agencies more properly should determine the complicated questions arising from the evils of unjustifiable secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes—since Federal court dockets are already overcrowded.

All secondary boycotts, whether justifiable or not, are outlawed by the Taft-Hartley Act. Many such types of boycotts have been long held reasonable by the courts where the existence of the union itself, or the gains made in genuine collective bargaining were at stake.

The bill under consideration contemplates removal of all these objectionable features from our basic national labor policy through repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The proposed law strengthens the provisions of the Wagner Act with the following amendments:

The three-men National Labor Relations Board of the original act will consist of five members, and this can be divided into three-member panels to expedite work.

Certain types of jurisdictional disputes and secondary boycotts will be termed unfair labor practices, if engaged in by a union. Those prohibited are defined specifically in the new bill; the Taft-Hartley Act failed in this definition. Failure to file 30 days' notice of proposed contract changes or termination is made an unfair practice on the part of either labor or management.

Employers and unions in interstate commerce may make agreements for the closed shop or other forms of union security, even though State laws are in conflict. Uniform rules on these phases of collective bargaining are thus made applicable.

The bill further provides for settlement of grievance disputes without resort to economic force—and with a minimum of Government intervention. This would be accomplished through the Conciliation Service, which is authorized to assist the parties in formulating arbitration agreements and in selecting arbitrators. Employers and unions are thus encouraged to develop effective arbitration procedures on their own, and the evils of compulsory arbitration are avoided.

Under the terms of the new act, the President is authorized to proclaim a national emergency when he finds that one exists, and to appoint an emergency board to investigate, seek to induce a settlement, and make a report of its recommendations.

Twenty-five days following the President's proclamation is the deadline for this report. During this period and for 5 days after the report is issued, the parties shall continue to operate under conditions of the disputed agreement.

It is anticipated that such disputes can be settled during the waiting period through the affirmative assistance of the emergency board and the operation of public opinion.

This procedure is a simple one—and it is established on the theory that free collective bargaining is to be encouraged, not forced through the use of Government injunction.

Senator Taft has already made known his opposition to this method for dealing with the few cases which involve a serious emergency.

However, the New York Herald-Tribune concedes that the new bill offers an improvement over the Taft-Hartley provision for similar cases.

The bill for readjustment of the Nation's labor policy should receive a high priority in the program of the Eighty-first Congress.

In the first place, there was an articulate mandate for repeal of the Taft-Hartley law—a mandate that should be carried out at once.

Opposition spokesmen have resorted to all kinds of mathematical juggling to prove there really wasn't any mandate.

One hundred and three Representatives and 17 Senators are missing from the Eighty-first Congress because they voted for the Taft-Hartley Act. They can testify, from bitter experience, what the people think about the Taft-Hartley Act.

A second reason for the importance attached to the administration labor bill is this: Labor-management peace is essential to a stable, productive economy in the days ahead.

Due to this fact, it is imperative that H. R. 2032 gain immediate passage in this Congress.

Thank you, members of the committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you, Mr. Madden. That was a fine statement.

Mr. Powell?

Mr. POWELL. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. No questions, but I want to compliment the gentleman on his excellent presentation.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Madden, I listened to your discussion with interest, and you covered quite a few things in the Taft-Hartley law to which you objected.

I did not hear anything about the non-Communist affidavits. What is your position regarding that?

Mr. MADDEN. If you remember, 2 years ago when this was up before the committee, I thought that if they were going to put in the non-

Communist affidavits they should have them in there for management as well as the employees, but I think that under the present set-up of the non-Communist affidavits it is unfair, and it is class legislation, and furthermore I do think that in a great number of instances it is pointing the finger at a great number of labor leaders and labor officials who are as much anti-Communist as you and I.

Mr. McConnell. Suppose we made it applicable to both management and labor?

Mr. Madden. That would be eliminating the classifications and I do not see where it means a thing. We have an FBI and we have a Department of Justice that is doing a great job as far as the Communists are concerned. In fact, Mr. Clark, the Attorney General, is deserving of special commendation on what he did in New York last Saturday.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, you would be opposed to the non-Communist affidavits for both management and labor?

Mr. Madden. I do not see the necessity of it. Unions have done a good job, eliminating the Communists.

Mr. McConnell. My only thought is this: They are a production team, and in case of any trouble in the United States we want to be sure that that team is composed of loyal men, do we not?

Mr. Madden. You will find, I think, Congressman McConnell, that when employment gets just a little worse than it is now that an obstinate employer will use the non-Communist affidavit in digging up some union official out in California, or any other State, who failed to sign, and then use it as a technical excuse to tie up a union in his own plant. To my mind, it could be used by an obstinate employer to take advantage by this trick provision, and there are plenty of tricks and loopholes in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. McConnell. Do you think the entire act is bad?

Mr. Madden. I think, and I would have to clarify this statement—I think the entire act is bad. Speaker Rayburn was one Member of Congress who made the speech on the floor of the House after all the debates just before we voted on it 2 years ago, and he said:

> There is a lot in this law I do not know anything about, and the majority of the Members of Congress do not know what is in the law.

And if you remember, I asked our friend, Congressman Gwinn, who was and still is a member of this committee, when he was talking on the floor of the House, why it was that, after 5 weeks of public hearings held by this committee 2 years ago, and the majority of the members of this committee went into secret session, six or seven of us were not invited behind the iron curtain. After 10 days we were called into session on a Thursday, and the Taft-Hartley Act was laid before us, and then Chairman Hartley asked us to vote that afternoon on the sections of the Taft-Hartley Act, and I moved that the members who did not sit in on the sessions be given an opportunity to read the Taft-Hartley Act before we were called on to vote.

And the next morning the Taft-Hartley Act was rammed down our throats, and we did not even know what was in the act. We only had the bill about 4 hours.

I asked Congressman Gwinn, on the floor of the House, if it was not a fact that Theodore Isserman, attorney for Chrysler Corp., did not sit in on these closed sessions, and Congressman Gwinn said, "Yes, we consulted with Mr. Isserman, and he did sit in with us."

Now, when corporation attorneys like that draw up a bill, I think a lot of Members of Congress do not know what is in the bill.

Mr. McCONNELL. Mr. Madden, you are touching on a subject which has a very recent history, but I do not care to go into that. We could have had the same experience regarding the Fair Labor Standards Act. Secret sessions were held by the majority group to consider the provisions, and we were not invited, either; so I guess that is rather general.

Mr. MADDEN. I just wanted to find out what was going on, and I did not have the opportunity.

Mr. McCONNELL. Do you think the Taft-Hartley Act, then, is entirely bad?

Mr. MADDEN. I would say that it is 95 percent bad. I do not know, but I think when you study the hidden booby-traps and many technicalities, I would say it is all bad. Of course, it is an easy matter, like Mr. Wilson, of the General Electric said, it is easy to pick out certain lines and send it out and say, "Are you for this?" It is just like the case of the man who is asked if he has stopped beating his wife, and if he says "Yes," he is in bad; and if he says, "No," he is in bad.

These questions of the General Electric which are being sent out are dishonest, because it is not giving the man who signs these blanks a fair opportunity to study each paragraph.

Mr. McCONNELL. Would you be in favor of repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and reenactment of the Wagner Act?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I would; and then follow out President Truman's request of 2 years ago. Appoint a Commission from the Congress and from labor and from management to make a study of labor-management relations, and see if they can find some legislation that would improve the act.

Mr. McCONNELL. You think the Wagner Act should be changed somewhat, do you not?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the Congress should appoint some kind of a committee like the President recommended 2 years ago.

Mr. McCONNELL. Are you in favor of H. R. 2032?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes; I am in favor of it.

Mr. McCONNELL. Yet, that changes the Wagner Act.

Mr. MADDEN. I am in favor of those changes, yes.

Mr. McCONNELL. Then you are not in favor of repealing the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MADDEN. I say the Wagner Act could be improved upon.

Mr. McCONNELL. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. In reference to the questionnaire the General Electric sent out—have you seen them?

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. How many of those would you put in the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. I think practically all of them are trick questions. Congressman Jacobs answered Mr. Wilson in a 17-page letter, and as I understand it, Mr. Wilson has yet to answer Congressman Jacobs on those same questions he sent out.

Have you read Congressman Jacobs' letter?

Mr. SMITH. No, I have not.

Mr. MADDEN. You should read it. It is 17 pages, and is a magnificent work, in which he asks Mr. Wilson to state his opinion on what really is in those paragraphs that Mr. Wilson's attorney picked out of the different paragraphs, in order to confuse the people who are called upon to sign them.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith, will you yield?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wilson has been requested to appear before this committee.

Mr. MADDEN. I think that is a good move.

Mr. JACOBS. I insist upon his appearing before this committee.

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe the union should file financial statements?

Mr. MADDEN. Most of the unions in my district do, and have been for years, and I believe I have talked to a number of employees in my district—I mean union members—in my district, and they never seem to have any difficulty. I think they should let the members know what they are going to do with the finances, just the same as employers or corporations.

Mr. SMITH. And you would be in favor of having a financial statement?

Mr. MADDEN. I would be in favor of letting the unions run their own business.

Mr. SMITH. You do not think Congress should legislate on that?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not think so.

Mr. SMITH. If you were writing a bill by yourself, you would not put in the requirement of a financial statement?

Mr. MADDEN. I think the unions are able to handle their own organization, just the same as corporations.

Mr. SMITH. You believe that corporations should be required to file financial statements?

Mr. MADDEN. They do it.

Mr. SMITH. They have to file them, by law.

Mr. MADDEN. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Do you believe that Congress should legislate on the matter of secondary boycott?

Mr. MADDEN. When you talk of secondary boycott, no doubt there are some cases of secondary boycott that are unfair, but if I remember, one of the reasons the Taft-Hartley legislated on secondary boycott, the witnesses who were brought in before the committee, in the main, would always pick out some isolated case that was bad, and in most of those cases there were provisions that could handle those secondary boycotts through collective bargaining and what not.

If I remember right, 2 years ago, 98 percent of the employers who testified before the committee never made any honest effort to abide by the Wagner Act; they never cooperated with the Wagner Act. We brought it out on cross-examination with a number of the employers who testified 2 years ago.

I come from one of the biggest industrial areas in the country, and we did not have a single one from our area come in and ask for the Taft-Hartley Act.

You talk about certain isolated cases; why, certainly, we have bad situations among union relations and employee relations with management, and I think you could go ahead if you wanted to, and elaborate on the other side, with what were the situations that existed during the war. Let us put the shoe on the other foot. When the boys were over fighting to win the war there were certain ones who did not wish to abide by the provisions of the law, but all management should not be condemned because of certain actions during the war. There should not be a law regulating all management on that score.

Mr. SMITH. I take it from your statement you do not think they should legislate on secondary boycott?

Mr. MADDEN. No.

Mr. SMITH. Neither on jurisdiction?

Mr. MADDEN. I believe the Congress should select from the labor-management, and follow out President Truman's recommendation of 2 years ago, which the Eightieth Congress failed to comply with, and if that is done, and there is some legislation that should be enacted as to secondary boycott, I will go along with it.

Mr. KELLEY. Will you yield, Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. That sort of a bill is before this committee now.

Mr. SMITH. You have the same feeling about jurisdictional strikes?

Mr. MADDEN. I think that could be handled in the same way, yes. The jurisdictional strikes under the Taft-Hartley Act was a secret weapon to destroy unions.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think, then, we should pay any attention to isolated cases?

Mr. MADDEN. You are going to have isolated cases no matter what kind of law you pass.

Mr. SMITH. In the First World War you heard the expression "All quiet on the western front," but if you were in the trenches and somebody was shooting at you, you did not think much of the statement?

Mr. MADDEN. That is true, but there were a lot of facts on both sides which get into that picture.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Madden, you made the remark you were in favor of the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. I take it that you believe that is true because of the various statements made during the campaign by President Truman: is that correct?

Mr. MADDEN. Not only true by reason of his statements, but it is also true by reason of the millions of voters who went to the polls and voted to have it repealed.

Mr. WERDEL. And do you still believe that we should place a lot of confidence in that vote, even in the face of your remark that in your opinion the Members of the Congress in the Eightieth Congress did not even know what the Taft-Hartley Act provided for?

Mr. MADDEN. I said that Speaker Rayburn, just before the vote was taken, said there was a lot of things in the law he did not know about, and he said he thought a lot of Members of Congress were in the same fix.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you think the majority of the people who voted for President Truman did not know what was in the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Congressman Halleck, who was majority leader of the Eightieth Congress, made a speech in June, and he challenged President Truman and the Democratic Party to make the Taft-Hartley Act an issue. I know President Truman, in every speech I heard him make—not every speech, but it was his theme-song, so to speak—to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act, and he is our President today.

Mr. WERDEL. But my question to you is, if you believe that Speaker Rayburn is right in saying that he did not understand all the provisions of the bill, and he did not think the Congressmen did, whether or not you think the people did have a mandate we can place confidence in?

Mr. MADDEN. The people knew it was not working right. I agree with you, the great mass of the people do not know what is in the Taft-Hartley Act. Somebody else mentioned here a while ago, has the union membership increased since the Taft-Hartley Act was enacted? I remember back in 1933, out in my district in 1934 and 1935, we had the greatest attendance in the unions they have ever had, and that was before the Wagner Act; and one of the reasons for union membership increasing is the fact that most of the big employers stampeded immediately before the Taft-Hartley Act went into law and signed contracts. Under those new contracts they signed, when the Taft-Hartley Act went into effect, naturally they were not going to find much union trouble for the first year and a half, or 2 years.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you believe on November 2 the American people understood the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MADDEN. They knew it was a bad law, and it was going to ruin organized labor.

Mr. WERDEL. You think they knew it even though Speaker Rayburn did not?

Mr. MADDEN. You are getting kind of supertechnical, now. They have learned a lot about it in the last 18 months.

Mr. WERDEL. Since when?

Mr. MADDEN. Speaker Rayburn made his statement right when the law was up for vote. The membership of unions and the wage earners in America have learned a lot about the Taft-Hartley Act since it was enacted in the summer of 1947.

Mr. WERDEL. This minority vote that you claim to be a mandate, I think we will agree, will we not, that a lot of veterans participated in that? Do you think the veterans who were not members of unions, and were returning home to work, gave us a mandate to provide a closed shop for all employment?

Mr. MADDEN. I am talking about the veterans in my district; they saw and knew and learned from the experience of their fathers 25 years ago, when they were working 12 hours a day, and sometimes 14 hours a day, 7 days a week, and they are for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, 95 percent of them.

Mr. WERDEL. How do you know that?

Mr. MADDEN. Because I have talked to hundreds of them.

Mr. WERDEL. The veterans in my district are not.

Mr. MADDEN. Do they work for a living?

Mr. WERDEL. Yes. They want to work for a living.

Speaking about campaigns and mandates, have you read the article in the present issue of the Saturday Evening Post of the Political Action Committee, on how they functioned in the November 2 election?

Mr. MADDEN. I have not read that article, but I have read how the National Association of Manufacturers functioned, and how they spent barrels of money not only in this election, but in 1946. You remember that very distinctly, and I might go back a little further in connection with what the Congressman from West Virginia, Mr. Bailey, said, and I was interested in his remarks about the tool owners' union. I remember the ads in 1946; they were published all over the country, and in this committee 2 years ago I asked Chairman Hartley to subpena—or to have the Tool Owners' Union investigated, but Chairman Hartley failed to carry out my recommendation.

Mr. WERDEL. Getting back to the Political Action Committee campaign: They set a goal, did they not, of 1,000,000 block workers?

Mr. MADDEN. They were active in the campaign, yes.

Mr. WERDEL. And they claimed they were successful in 250,000 block workers in some of their populated areas; is that not correct?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know about that.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you know whether or not the block workers undertook to advise the people of the United States of the individual rights of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. MADDEN. I hope they did. They tried to tell the people in my district what the legislation would do to them if it was not repealed.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you believe they fully informed the people of their rights?

Mr. MADDEN. I would not say fully, but they did a good job.

Mr. WERDEL. You are aware, are you not, that there are certain unions that we call captive unions in the United States?

Mr. MADDEN. I do not know.

Mr. WERDEL. Where memberships do not elect their officers?

Mr. MADDEN. I have heard lots of charges back and forth over the air, but in checking into some of the charges I find that they were merely carrying out the thoughts of their sponsors, or some secret sponsors, and so I do not believe all I hear on the air or read in the newspapers.

Mr. WERDEL. I do not, either, and I do not believe you or I should agree that people who are misinformed 3,000 miles away should be giving the final word on legislation, should people who are 3,000 miles away from those who hear the arguments control the vote?

Mr. MADDEN. Distance does not make very much difference nowadays.

Mr. KELLY. You have on minute left.

Mr. WERDEL. Are you going to hold me to that rule?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes; you and everyone else.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you think the people gave a mandate in the last election that it was proper politics to accuse the minority in government of listening only to the merchants' associations and manufacturers' associations, and then confine the hearings to 10 days, and to only that type of person in this Congress to testify on behalf of business, and confine the time to such length of time that people cannot get here from our part of the country who are affected by the act; do you think we have a mandate for that?

Mr. MADDEN. I think everybody should be heard on the legislation. If there is any Member who wants to be heard, I think he should be heard. I have volumes of our hearings of the past 2 years up in my office, and I do not know how many Members of Congress went over them, but I think anybody who wants to be heard should be heard.

Mr. WERDEL. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Madden.

TESTIMONY OF HON. DANIEL J. FLOOD, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF PENNSYLVANIA

Mr. FLOOD. I have been requested by my distinguished colleague, the gentleman from New York, Mr. John Rooney, who is now sitting as chairman of one of the subcommittees of the Appropriations Committee, to ask the indulgence of the chairman to insert a statement in opposition of the Taft-Hartley Act in the record.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The statement is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN J. ROONEY, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK, URGING REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

Mr. Chairman, and members of the Subcommittee on Labor and Management Relations, I am grateful for this opportunity to express to you my views concerning the infamous Taft-Hartley law.

Inasmuch as I represent a heavily populated working class district in the city of New York, I feel that I am qualified to speak on the problems which have arisen as the result of enactment of this vicious antilabor legislation. I have opposed the bill since it was first introduced, and the day that it became a law, over the President's veto, I committed myself to the repeal of it.

The measure was conceived in a spirit of antagonism toward labor and clause by clause written by attorneys for the labor-hating National Association of Manufacturers. While there may have been some doubts as to its harmful effect on labor-management relations on the part of some of our citizens at the time of the enactment of this legislation, I am sure we all know now that it was deliberately designed by big business to shackle and destroy the American labor movement. The law has been a complete failure and has neither increased industrial productivity nor brought harmony or stability to industrial relations. It has created resentment and bitterness on the part of labor and has become a symbol of oppression and tyranny to working men and women throughout our Nation. The effect that it has had on relations between employers and the International Typographical Union is merely one instance where this hastily conceived law has disrupted employer-employee relations which had been amiable over a period of many years.

A large portion of our businessmen now agree that the Taft-Hartley law defeated itself and is contrary to the best interests of all concerned. In that connection, I will quote from the conservative McGraw-Hill publication, Business Week, issue of December 18, 1948:

"For the Taft-Hartley Act did fail—on one of the most important grounds by which a law must be judged in a democratic society. That ground is consent. Only the police state can enforce a law which is believed to be unjust by the people it affects.

"What was wrong was that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far. It crossed the narrow line separating a law which aims only to regulate, from one which could destroy. Given a few million unemployed in America, given an administration in Washington which was not prounion—and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck the labor movement."

I trust that this committee will promptly accede to the will of the working people of America by repealing this obnoxious law. I strongly feel that such repeal is a prerequisite to cementing better understanding in labor-management relations.

Mr. FLOOD. And for myself, I appreciate this opportunity of being permitted to appear before the subcommittee of the Labor Committee, and to express my opposition to the Taft-Hartley Act, and to express the hope that this subcommittee recommend its immediate repeal.

It is my opinion that the Taft-Hartley Act had as its intent and its purpose, if not the destruction, certainly the acute and extreme limitation of the theory of collective bargaining and of the activities of organized labor.

At the moment the Taft-Hartley Act passed the demarcating line of being corrective legislation, then it became destructive legislation, and it is my conclusion that not only did the Taft-Hartley Act so pass that line, but that it was the intent and the purpose of the act at its inception. I think the act initially had that purpose.

I may say that I am not at all satisfied that legislation is necessary at this point to deal with the entire broad field of labor-management relations. I would say, although it is not before the committee, and I do not like to be presumptuous or impertinent, but I prefer the kind of legislation under the circumstances that there has to be legislation suggested by my distinguished colleague, Mr. Kelley; but that is not before us, but if there is going to be legislation, then I favor the bill that is now before this committee. I am of the impression, and it is my opinion, that the Taft-Hartley Act was created, and if it was not the deliberate intent, at least the result and the effect was to establish in this country a second-class citizenship—organized labor. There was to be a definite class distinction, and I cannot imagine any more antagonistic purposes of why we are all sitting here as Members of the House.

I am opposed to any attempt made by law which would use the weapon of injunction for the purpose of preventing picketing, and I think the act would do that, and its administration certainly executed that purpose. There is certainly that indication in the attempts to extend the law by amendments for the purpose of strengthening it as an antilabor weapon.

I believe further that insofar as the provision of this act having to do with demanding non-Communist affidavits is concerned, is one provision to which I certainly would object. There is certainly nobody in this Congress who can be identified as being more opposed to everything that communism represents than I am. I would introduce legislation, if necessary, outlawing the Communist Party. I had some doubt in my mind as to such law, and that was one of the things on which Mr. Dewey and I agreed, that should be done, that the Communist Party should not be regulated out of existence, and he gave reasons upon which I had strong reasons to agree: but I have now changed my opinion, and I would vote to outlaw the Communist Party, now that they have shown their colors and have indicated their purpose is to overthrow the Government by force and arms.

So by making my position clear as to communism I can say that I certainly would sign no affidavit declaring whether I am or am not a Communist, and I do not think any Member of the House should be requested to sign such an affidavit, and I do not see why any working man should have to do that. I think that deliberately is an unconstitutional effort on the part of the legislature to impose a burden upon a class of citizenship. I would object to any provision, and I would object to making any arrangement whereby the same condition should be asked of management. I do not think that section of the statute should exist in any law. If you are going to abolish the Communist Party, let us abolish them, period.

I am not sure, Mr. Chairman, as to the extent of my time.

Mr. KELLEY. Go ahead.

Mr. FLOOD. I might say further that I take issue with a premise about which a great deal was made and is being made, that the Taft-Hartley Act is opposed only by labor leaders, labor racketeers—big shots—and that, in the language of his enemies, "the poor laboring man"—the poor, down-trodden, dim-witted, stupid American laboring man—has not the faintest idea what this law, or its purpose, or intent, is about. Certainly the working people of America, and the average citizen does not know this statute from cover to cover. I cast no asperson upon the integrity, the hard-working ability and understanding of statutes by the Members of this House, but certainly we have reasonable cause to assume at times that even we are not conversant with the punctuation of our statutes, upon which we act. I may say that I can speak only in a limited way for my own district. I have the privilege of representing the Eleventh District of Pennsylvania, which is the very heart and center of the hard-coal industry, the anthracite coal mines. I do not believe there is any union in which the members are more conversant with their rights and privileges and duties as American citizens than the membership of our union. The members with whom I have spoken, from time to time, on the subject, are just as conversant with it as I am. I have no hesitation in making that statement. Not all of them, certainly; but a sufficient number to indicate their awareness of the intent of the act, and its bad provisions and to the same extent as I believe the average Member of this Congress is aware.

And so, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, may I inquire if I can revise and extend my remarks, or am I excluded from doing that? I request to revise and extend my remarks with reference to the same subject.

Mr. KELLEY. You will have that opportunity.

Mr. Powell?

Mr. POWELL. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. I believe, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman in his testimony referred to the injunction procedure of the Taft-Hartley Act. I am sure the gentleman is conversant with our constitutional guaranties contained in the first 10 amendments to the Constitution, and I am speaking of the right to free speech, free press, and free assembly, and particularly to the right to a trial by jury. In view of the procedures carried out under this injunction provision, the fact a number of people quite often have in the past been deprived of their right to a trial by jury, I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not feel that this injunction procedure in the Taft-Hartley legislation contravenes the average citizen's guaranty?

Mr. FLOOD. That is very interesting. I have never been of the opinion that the court of equity, keeping in mind how it was borne, is without moral violation of the constitutional provisions.

Let me say it this way: The repeal of this act, an act born in the heat of discord, an act born in a period of tension, was probably conceived, or the accouchement was brought about, may I say, in an ill-advised atmosphere.

The Norris-LaGuardia Act, on the contrary, was passed by this Congress at a prior session in a kind of an atmosphere that I believe was conducive to sound legislation.

Let us repeal the Taft-Hartley Act and return to the status quo, and then in that atmosphere of the status quo determine if this Congress, with ample opportunity for everybody to be heard, should take any further action.

I say that when the Congress in passing an act such as the Norris-LaGuardia Act——

Mr. KELLEY. Will you yield, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Did you say the Norris-LaGuardia Act was passed in the last session of Congress?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no; I said it was passed in an atmosphere that was more conducive in this kind of law.

Mr. MCCONNELL. The Norris-LaGuardia Act was passed some years ago.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Certainly to use the injunction as a weapon, as is the intent of the act, is contrary to the purpose and the reason for the very existence of the whole broad field of equity within the English common law. The injunction process under our system of jurisprudence was never meant to be appealed to, if and when there was adequate limits of the law. When that arises, there is no problem; it is academic.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I believe you stated you were opposed to the Communist-affidavits provision?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. I wonder if you agree with me that as we think of a Communist we think of a person who opposes our democratic form of Government?

Mr. FLOOD. Not only do I think that, sir, but I think the chief purpose and sole aim of communism is the destruction of Christianity, and I cannot think of anything more un-American.

Mr. PERKINS. Would you also consider the affidavit requirement, that labor and management both be required to sign affidavits before they could require the services of the NLRB, unconstitutional?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes; I do. I would say that that provision in the act is unconstitutional, and any act which contains such a provision.

Mr. PERKINS. I believe under our form of government, and especially any person who is charged with any crime, is presumed to be innocent until he is proven guilty?

Mr. FLOOD. I so believe.

Mr. PERKINS. And do you not believe this affidavit requirement puts an undue burden upon any American citizen when he is required to sign this affidavit? Do you not think that that casts some reflection upon his loyalty to his country, by putting that into law?

Mr. FLOOD. You state my position much more effectively than I do.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Flood, you are familiar, as a lawyer of course, with the Constitution as to amendments against bills of attainder?

Mr. FLOOD. I am.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you feel it might infringe upon that provision?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Can you state to us whether or not a traitor, a convicted traitor to his country, has a legal right to bring a tort against a person who has done an injury to his body?

Mr. FLOOD. If there has been a conviction the rights have been deprived. If he has lost his right of suffrage, his rights have been deprived.

Mr. JACOBS. I mean, suppose he walks across the street and a man recklessly runs him down with an automobile?

Mr. FLOOD. Oh, no; as a matter of fact, there is ample law to cover that.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, any man can be convicted of any crime in the curriculae of our statutes and he can bring an action for redress, but in the case of a union which has an officer who cannot sign an affidavit, then the union is powerless to bring unfair labor charges against the employer?

Mr. FLOOD. Absolutely.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, a Communist hanging around in the union may be pretty handy for the employer, might he not?

Mr. FLOOD. The history of labor-management relations—the relations between labor and management—down through some of the unsavory periods in the early days gave birth to many unsavory characters, and we had the stool pigeon and the labor spy; and the Communist, in my judgment, has no sense of morals whatsoever, and would lend himself to either side if he can produce chaos, which is his chief goal. Any Communist stool pigeon would willingly be a scab or labor spy for the purpose of creating any kind of disorder within this country, and I certainly do not think management as a whole would participate, or any longer thinks of participating, and I think that era has gone by the board, but there still remains some stray groups who would cooperate. A dictatorship of the right or a dictatorship of the left is equally bad and equally un-American, and if you extend the arms of dictatorship out long enough, you will finally get them together. All these green shirts and brown shirts and red shirts we went through for the last 15 years are just dirty shirts, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. JACOBS. If I understand the summary of what you said, it amounts to this: If we are going to proceed against the Communist, let us do it directly, and particularly where it, incidentally, deprives people of their normal legal rights, and even more incidentally immunizes someone in the violation of the law?

Mr. FLOOD. As I said, sir, I was undecided, and went through quite a struggle for the last year about what to do on that kind of a bill, and what I would do if somebody introduced a bill to outlaw the Communist Party, because I was afraid we might drive them underground, but Communists are underground anyway in actively trying to undermine the Government of the United States. But now, if I had any doubt in my mind, it has been erased as the result of this patent conspiracy and adherence to orders of these agents of a foreign power who are Communists. I think communism and Americanism now are a contradiction in terms.

Mr. JACOBS. But you would do it directly rather than by circumvention?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. It is a pleasure to listen to my colleague from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLOOD. Mr. McConnell.

Mr. McConnell. As I gather from listening to your discussion of the Communist-affidavit problem, it is this, that you approve of the purpose sought, but you do not like the method employed; is that not correct?

Mr. Flood. That is well said, Mr. McConnell.

Mr. McConnell. I also get the impression that you would desire to have the Government less active in the affairs of labor and management?

Mr. Flood. May I say it this way: I would like to have the Government assume a more neutral position than it must assume if it properly executes the Taft-Hartley Act. May I go a step further?

Mr. McConnell. Yes.

Mr. Flood. I am not at all satisfied that it is the province of Government to inject itself into the relationship between management and labor. I would prefer—maybe it is a panacea, I do not know—I would prefer to see management and labor, as I believe they want to be, or should be in the United States, handle their relationships between themselves. I am still a firm believer that that can be done in this year of our Lord 1949. I can see where at one time regulation against management might be necessary because of the historical developments of the Nation. I can see where perhaps legislation affecting labor, or if the pendulum swings, might be necessary for exactly the same reason; but I think labor is now mature and intelligent, and I think our great public-school system, and I think our great method of disseminating knowledge through the press and radio, and the manner in which Congress deals with the problems, has the American public conversant.

Mr. McConnell. I would generally approve of your philosophy of not too much interference of Government. It would seem to me the problem is where to stop. You do need a certain amount of law and legislation in connection with labor-management relationship, but the problem is how far to go in that matter. The Eightieth Congress did not bring the Government into labor-management relationship; it was in before the passage of the Taft-Hartley law. Whether it was in too far is a matter of argument and discussion. Whether the Taft-Hartley Act went too far is what we are trying to find out here, but somewhere there is a happy medium for the Government in labor-management relationships, and if we can work out a bill, bearing in mind the correct position, I would say——

Mr. Flood. May I interpose this, Mr. McConnell?

Mr. McConnell. Yes.

Mr. Flood. I would like to see that done, but in fairness to all parties concerned, and to get from under the cloud of being on the defensive, I beileve the Taft-Hartley Act should be repealed, period, and then we will do what you suggest: sit down and talk about it.

Mr. McConnell. What do we start with, or do we start with the Wagner Act, where the Government is in the relationships more on one side than the other?

Mr. Flood. You return to that act, and then you discuss it as to those points, and we remove this atmosphere of the Taft-Hartley Act one way or the other, and then, if and when that situation arises, and if and when the Government and labor and management and Congress feel something should be done, in the words of Mr. Justice Holmes, "When that situation arises we shall endeavor to deal with it."

Mr. McConnell. Of course, if you go back just to the Wagner Act you are bringing Government into labor relations, but mainly on one side, and there are even various labor groups who feel that way, or at least their leaders feel that way, in private conversation. I have talked to some of them before we acted on the Taft-Hartley Act, and they made some suggestions and provisions that are now in the Taft-Hartley Act itself.

Mr. Flood. I would be glad to discuss that when that situation arises.

Mr. McConnell. Getting back to this Communist matter again: is it not a fact that before any effort was made to get after Communists in labor organizations, we had examples of the existence of a great deal of communism among various labor organizations?

Mr. Flood. I could not accept the phrase, sir, "a great deal." There was evidence, but no more evidence than in other strata of society.

Mr. McConnell. Certain unions were classified that way, were they not?

Mr. Flood. "Certain unions" as opposed to many, many men and women in organized labor, and I cannot imagine any group in American society who did more to aid in the fight against communism in France and Italy in the underground, and certainly I would say that I confer upon organized labor the accolade of approval for its action against communism, rather than to censure them because of the isolated cases.

Mr. McConnell. In certain unions the union has been split virtually in two on the Communist problem?

Mr. Flood. That is right.

Mr. McConnell. And that was not a small amount?

Mr. Flood. I think they are entirely capable of handling it, and the very unions of which you speak, I understand, have met that problem head-on, and are fighting to its death against that cancer in its heart.

Mr. McConnell. That is true, but much of the aggressive action occurred after the inclusion of the non-Communist affidavit in the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. McConnell. Yes.

Mr. Burke. I quite disagree with the statement, that it was only after the Taft-Hartley Act that that movement that has been under discussion here started. I know for a fact that it had been underway for a period of 12 years prior to that.

Mr. McConnell. They must have been losing that battle, then, up to near that time, because the Communist membership in unions were increasing, and they became quite a problem. They were split right through the middle. It may have been a coincidence that it worked out at the same time, or near the same time as the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, but it did become more aggressive at that time.

Mr. Burke. It became more public, but not more aggressive.

Mr. Flood. That is what I was going to point out. This matter may have become more vocal, but certainly within the core of the bona fide union membership there is just as much antagonism, as I vehemently express here, and I do not propose to be a mouthpiece for anybody.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. Mr. Flood, I have been a member of this committee for the last 2 years, and have listened to about 9 weeks of testimony in the last Congress, and I am probably going to listen to a lot more, and I want to compliment you on your analytical reasoning on this matter, and I think I agree with you. You have analyzed it down to the province of the Government, but you should go a little bit further, and say, "Let us abolish the Wagner Act if we are going to abolish the Taft-Hartley Act," and see just how little we can get the Government into the matter of field legislation. I think you were excellent and fine in the analysis of communism, and the repealing of the Taft-Hartley Act, because there is too much Government now, but let us go to the whole way and be consistent, and say, "Let us abolish the Wagner Act, too."

Mr. FLOOD. I am sure this committee is very fortunate to have the distinguished Member from Kansas, but may I point out to my friend that the ability of labor to be in the position where it is recognized as an equal is only the result of the Wagner Act, and to repeal the Wagner Act would send us back to the Middle Ages in relation to labor and management, and then the advantage again would be with management.

I hold no brief for the Wagner Act today, and if there is anything wrong with that act—as Members have indicated there might be—then certainly that act, from cover to cover, is no more sanctimonious than is the Taft-Hartley Act from cover to cover, but it is—if I may plagiarize a phrase—for the purpose of permitting organized labor in America to sit down with a mental attitude of equality, if nothing else, and the Wagner Act is their Magna Carta: That is what organized labor thinks, and I am sure, if it is mature, as I hope and pray it is, that when you sit down and there are violations of the Bill of Rights, or of anything else in that Magna Carta, then certainly King John would be just as willing to minimize that great charter of rights as would management, and I think the barons of old would demand their rights and rest on it down through the years. So I say, sir, it may place me in the position of being illogical unless I point out that organized labor would not feel a sense of equality in discussion if you took from it its reason for sitting at the table, which is the Wagner Act, right or wrong. That is what they think; and you seem to be a very fair gentleman and would not remove from them that feeling, that hope, that confidence. You certainly would have the ability when that atmosphere exists, and that is the atmosphere, gentlemen, you must have, until labor and management feel a sense of equality. They had reached the point of saturation and something had to be done, and it was the Wagner Act, so, let us sit down with the act, and I am sure both sides in this country can do this properly.

I believe I am right when I say the union in New York City contributed to the Communist unions in both France and Italy. But that does not prove the rule. That is one rotten apple that is not going to spoil this barrel.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Your district is Ohio?

Mr. FLOOD. Pennsylvania, sir; the anthracite-coal fields.

Mr. WERDEL. And Mr. Lewis, of the miners' union, believes the Wagner Act should be repealed, as well as the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. FLOOD. John L. Lewis?

Mr. WERDEL. Yes.

Mr. FLOOD. That I do not know.

Mr. WERDEL. In your comments about communism I am not too clear that I have your reason why the affidavit should not be required in the organizations which have the power that a labor union has.

Mr. FLOOD. I do not like to sound like a 100 percent Yankee, sir, but is that not my question?

Mr. WERDEL. What do you mean?

Mr. FLOOD. Why should it be there? What right does the Congress of the United States, acting within its rights, have to put a burden on an inherent right to work? You are or are not a Communist, so why must there be a burden of proof by legislation imposed upon an inherent right? The Congress of the United States cannot place a condition upon an inherent right: Life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. It is a sacred, inherent right in a human being to work, to earn a living, and the Congress has no constitutional right to impose a condition precedent.

Mr. WERDEL. Why do you think an individual of a labor organization would object to signing a Communist affidavit?

Mr. FLOOD. My dear sir, we are in a clearing path; why should he be required to? I do not like to be impertinent, but you see it is impossible to go beyond my question.

Mr. WERDEL. You are too clever to be impertinent, Mr. Flood; you are just evasive.

Mr. FLOOD. Let me say this: I certainly have tried—let me apologize—I have tried to be very blunt and to be very clear about my position. I am very serious. I am not being cute. I say this: A leader of a union represents by a process that we recognize as a democratic process—to represent that union; now, if he has not been elected properly, and if there is some question about the democratic process within his union, that is a matter for his union. If he is a faker or a fraud, let the union clean him out and get rid of him.

Mr. WERDEL. Under the same token, would you favor modifying the court laws so we would not protect the stockholders in voting to protect their rights?

Mr. FLOOD. Are you using that as an analogy?

Mr. WERDEL. The only reason a Christian man—as I take it both you and I are—would have for not making an affidavit would be because somebody thought he might be a Communist?

Mr. FLOOD. We are now at diametric and irreconcilable opposites. I am a Roman Catholic.

Mr. WERDEL. So am I.

Mr. FLOOD. Perhaps it is not good manners to say so, and ordinarily it is not in the discussions in Congress, but I work at the trade, and I am sure you do, too; but to have somebody say to me, "Mr. Flood, before you can drive a truck, or before you can go to work, you will have to sign this affidavit that you are not a Communist"; I will starve first.

Mr. WERDEL. And why?

Mr. FLOOD. Because nobody has a right to cast an aspersion upon my Christianity; not in this country.

Mr. WERDEL. You say we have no constitutional right to do that. We have a form of government which, I believe it is generally conceded everywhere, could not possibly exist unless it were for the Christian teachings.

Mr. FLOOD. Yes.

Mr. WERDEL. The basis of our form of enforcement of law and order is that we put a person on the witness stand, and even though he is a Catholic priest, or some other clergyman, we ask him to raise his right hand and swear he will tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth.

Mr. FLOOD. That is only partly true, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Let me finish please. What is the difference between that aspersion and the one that asks a man to swear he is not a member of an organization which both you and I condemn?

Mr. FLOOD. Your premise is only partly right. A witness goes on the stand, and he is handed the Bible and he is asked to raise his right hand and swear, and every once in a while a witness stands up and says, "I am an atheist, and I do not believe in God; take your Bible away. I am an American citizen, but I am an atheist," and the court says, "Very well, do you affirm?" And that is all. He does not believe in God, but he is an American citizen; that is his right. As a Christian I do not like to introduce Voltaire, but you know his premise.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Flood, that is very fine, but as a matter of fact, when we require an affidavit our general laws also provide, as you know, as a lawyer, that if a person is not a Christian he can supply the fundamentals of the affidavit by affirming.

Mr. FLOOD. But the purpose under the English law is not the same purpose you are indicating here.

Mr. WERDEL. I realize that, but the point is your non-Christian man can satisfy the requirements of your non-Communist affidavit. You have made some enlightening remarks, but you have not set forth a distinction.

Mr. FLOOD. It is a distinction without a difference.

Mr. WERDEL. Getting back to our use of the word "injunction": You will agree, will you not, that the injunction has its place in our law of equity?

Mr. FLOOD. It is one of the keystones on which the law of equity was founded.

Mr. WERDEL. And it was applied to labor disputes prior to the Wagner Act, in which it was prohibited?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. The Wagner Act removed the restrictions so the injunction would apply when the conditions necessary for its application were found by the court to be present; is that not correct?

Mr. FLOOD. Yes, sir. I regret, sir, that your time is limited.

Mr. WERDEL. So do I, Mr. Flood; I am enjoying this.

Mr. KELLEY. The Honorable Frances Bolton, Member of Congress from Ohio.

TESTIMONY OF HON. FRANCES P. BOLTON, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF OHIO

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee: The notice from the committee clerk that Monday, March 7, has been allocated by this honorable committee "to hear such Members of the House of Representatives as wish to appear as witnesses before the Subcommittee on Labor-Management Relations" received on March 3 gave so little time for adequate detailed preparation that only a general statement is possible at this time.

Therefore, gentlemen, I would lay before you certain viewpoints on several fundamentals of what for lack of a better term, is now called labor-management relations. As preface I would remind you that never in all history has any country faced such opportunity not only to build the welfare of its own people beyond even our dreams, but also in so doing to raise the standard of living throughout the world.

The actual need of the world is so great that with wisdom, with judgment, with understanding, and with courage from our leadership, idleness and unemployment would be impossible for a period of at least 10 years.

Instead of this, we have soup kitchens right here in Washington and no day passes that we do not have news that plants are shutting down all over the country. The people of this country have a right to look to Washington for action that will bring capital out of hiding and that will create a climate in which management and labor can and will sit down together with sincerity and friendliness not only to work out their differences but to set up ways that will be for permanent benefit to all.

Concerned as you are with the relations of labor and management you are well aware that if labor continues to demand more and more pay for shorter and shorter hours of work, there will come a moment when the country will rise up. You are also aware that if this Government permits one group to become all powerful, freedom will cease to be. These things are within the bounds of possibility unless those who are responsible for labor policy today accept the restraints that sanity and freedom demand.

When capital misued the power it had developed during the years in which strong methods built this Nation, the Government put restraints upon capital. When labor leaders had so far built up their power as to have become a menace to the economical and physical welfare of the Nation as well as to have restricted the freedom of union members, what was more understandable than that this same Government should again pass legislation which restrained those who misused their power?

So much misrepresentation has been thrown out about the nature of these restraints that it is not surprising that a cloud of confusion obscured the clear sun of understanding.

As the administration made a definite part of its campaign upon a repeal of the so-called Taft-Hartley law, it is understandable that a great deal of noise must be made over the matter. But if even a small amount of wisdom becomes a part of administration deliberations the content of that much-abused act will be continued. Indeed, if the administration has any honest desire to make the lot of the manual workers of this country continuingly better it will retain the restraints which protect the worker not only from his own weakness in the hands of many power-seeking leaders, but will also keep these from running amuck and pulling the whole house down around their ears.

Mr. Chairman, no individual and no group of individuals can build constructively without restraints. Indeed, members of the committee, the strength of a nation depends upon the restraint of the people that make it up.

It is my earnest hope that this committee will consider the whole broad problem of labor-management relations with new vision. I sincerely trust that there are enough among you who will consider the matters before you from a far broader view than any so far used; the intrinsic, fundamental needs of these United States. I sincerely hope that you will remember that labor, just as much as the other groups, owes its first allegiance to the Nation, that its members are first of all citizens, with responsibility for the general welfare.

I believe so deeply in organization for those who work with their hands that I find it impossible not to protest when power-seeking leaders try to remove the first protection the workers have had against unfair domination. I sincerely hope that there are enough among you who see that discipline is not only good but necessary for those who refuse to discipline themselves. I earnestly trust that you will become aware, if you are not so already, that without restraint labor may run amuck and I suggest that these restraints are a necessary dam against the floods.

Again I say that there need be no idleness here now or for years to come. But I say also that there will be idleness and suffering unless the administration finds the courage to sit down together with labor, capital, and management and insist that each recognize first of all the need of the Nation and its citizens. So long as capital holds back, and management fails to remember that workers are just people, just human beings with the same needs and hopes and fears as themselves, and so long as labor makes ever-increasing demands without recognizing its fundamental responsibility to produce to the utmost for the world that perishes for the very things it can produce, so long—just so long, will the situation here and everywhere go from bad to worse.

But I would remind you, gentlemen, that if we are to solve the so-called labor-management problems it will be because this subcommittee is setting out in all faith and honesty to find a real solution, one which will bring about a wholly new setting in which to work out the differences that now exist, one which will have as its goal not the betterment of any one group, but which will make these United States a better place for all its citizens to live in.

In closing may I say that we live on a planet which is part of a little solar system sustaining its position through complete obedience to the restraints of the laws that govern its existence. These laws are universal and inescapable. It is when we attempt to throw restraint aside that trouble begins.

It is my earnest hope that the major part of the content of the Labor-Management Act of 1947 will be the foundation stone upon which you will write the legislation you will bring to the House for action.

Mr. KELLEY. Mrs. Bolton, I was interested in your statement that this committee should review the whole labor-management thoroughly; was that correct?

Mrs. BOLTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. The problem here is that the Congress does not have the time to do just that, and what would you think about continuing the Joint Committee of the House and the Senate, and join in with management in making a thorough and complete study, even down to the grass roots, where they could go out and investigate some of the charges that have been made at the home base, against management and labor? That will take time. What do you think about that?

Mrs. BOLTON. Mr. Chairman, I came to Washington in 1928 when my husband was elected to the Congress, and it seemed to me from the start that one of the most important things this Congress could do would be really and truly and honestly and sincerely to study this whole problem—not as a problem, but as a very real necessity to the welfare of all the citizens of this country. I can see no reason to change my viewpoint. I have had no contact with the joint committee, but I would like to insist or suggest, rather strongly, that if such a study were made, it be made without anything cluttering up the way.

Mr. KELLEY. I thoroughly agree with you in that; but it seems to me a joint committee could at least be charged in a legislation to do just that.

Mrs. BOLTON. That might well be.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Do you not represent the Twenty-Second Ohio District?

Mrs. BOLTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe you also represented this district in the Eightieth Congress?

Mrs. BOLTON. I have represented it for 9 years.

Mr. BAILEY. And I believe the record discloses you voted for the Taft-Hartley law of 1947?

Mrs. BOLTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to ask you, in view of the experience over the last 20 months in the enforcement of this act, if you still have the same opinion you had when you voted for it, as to the adoption of the act?

Mrs. BOLTON. I understand the experience has shown we have had fewer strikes. I have had a large correspondence with labor men who are deeply grateful for the protection that the Taft-Hartley law has given them. I have had no reason to change my opinion, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. BAILEY. Would you say depriving them of their constitutional rights of a trial by jury is a protection?

Mrs. BOLTON. I do not know what you refer to in the act.

Mr. BAILEY. The injunction provision in the act denies a number of persons the right of trial by jury.

Mrs. BOLTON. I do not think any act should have anything in it which does destroy that right.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think it is fair under that ex parte proceeding that somebody can go in before a court on the basis of an affidavit and get an injunction; do you not think both parties to the case should have a hearing before the injunction issues?

Mrs. BOLTON. Yes, I do.

Mr. BAILEY. That is not true in the case.

Mrs. BOLTON. May I remind the committee of something that so far as I know has been brushed aside? The very unusual part of the Taft-Hartley law, as I have understood it, is that there was created a committee to watch everything as it went along, with the understanding they were responsible for the bill and that it would be revamped every so often, and those things which had not proven advantageous to the citizenship of this country would be brought before the Congress, and such changes made as were necessary.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the committee that Chairman Kelley referred to.

Mrs. BOLTON. And I would prefer to have the injunction proceedings brought before that committee.

Mr. BAILEY. One other question: I would like to ask the Congresswoman if she believes, in the event the Taft-Hartley Act is repealed, if she believes the right necessary in the safeguard be in the Wagner Act, so it will be workable and satisfactory to both management and labor?

Mrs. BOLTON. I am not versed enough as to the Wagner Act to answer the question.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all, Mr. Chairman. I yield the rest of my time to Congressman Jacobs, if I am allowed to do so.

Mr. IRVING. I would like to say I thoroughly believe in laws to harmonize the interests of the employee and the employer, but I do not believe in laws that create dissension, confusion, and antagonism because I do not think they are good for the general welfare of the country.

You mentioned unemployment right at the start. I would like to comment on the fact that we had a tremendous amount of unemployment in this country before either the Wagner Act or the Taft-Hartley law, so-called, were enacted. I think we had some 12,000,000 unemployed, or possibly more than that. Of course, there is a bit of wonderment on my part about the small unemployment reported now as compared to the terrific amount we had previous to the enactment of this labor legislation. I also notice you say that capital is hiding. Would it not be better if no one went into hiding in this country, and we all faced the responsibilities together?

Mrs. BOLTON. Is the gentleman asking me a question?

Mr. IRVING. Yes, that is a question.

Mrs. BOLTON. The term that I used is used so frequently when there are discussions of this kind that I used it. What I mean by it is, any group with capital has a responsibility to this country just as any other group has.

Mr. IRVING. Apparently there was some anxiety and some hiding on the part of capital at the start of the war. There were many months before plants were converted to wartime production. During that time there was a great amount of bargaining at that critical time between the capitalists and financial interests as to how they were going to participate in the urgently needed production of war goods. I think I am as eager as you are that we preserve our system here, and raise our standard of living, as we have in the past, but I would like to see——

Mrs. BOLTON. Will the gentleman permit me to say I would not have said what I have said if I had not felt the committee was here for that purpose.

Mr. IRVING. I believe that sincerely. I raise that question because we want to consider all sides of it. I truly think there is a great amount of feeling that labor has been responsible for too many of these things. I would like to have all sides of it considered, and I intend to attempt to do that while I act on this committee.

Mrs. BOLTON. I agree with you.

Mr. IRVING. I thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. If I understood your conclusion, in your statement, you stated you suggested to this subcommittee that they approach the study of labor-management relations by amending the Taft-Hartley Act; is that correct?

Mrs. BOLTON. No, sir; not quite. I suggested that I hope that the basis of the legislation which you eventually bring out will contain those parts of the Taft-Hartley law which I consider very valuable, which is the major point of the law.

Mr. PERKINS. I believe it is a fact you have very little labor in your district?

Mrs. BOLTON. No, I have a great deal of labor in my district.

Mr. PERKINS. You represent one of the wealthy districts in Ohio, I believe?

Mrs. BOLTON. I represent one of the largest in the country, and I have perhaps as many of the poorest in the country as anyone else.

Mr. PERKINS. You have not had any experience with the Taft-Hartley law insofar as labor-management relations are concerned?

Mrs. BOLTON. No, not in the matter of a strike, or anything like that. I have had a very large correspondence, however.

Mr. PERKINS. Nothing of that kind has ever been called to your attention in your district?

Mrs. BOLTON. Oh, yes, it has, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to say to you at the outset, in regard to your general statements, I agree with you in regard to the specific manner in which we accomplish it. We may have some disagreements, but I want to get your views upon two matters:

You referred to certain restraints in the Taft-Hartley law which you think should be retained in the new law.

I wonder if you would particularize in regard to them?

Mrs. BOLTON. I do not have a list before me, and I am afraid my memory could not do that. As I told you in the beginning, I have not had the time to go into detail on this.

If anyone has a list of the Taft-Hartley bill I would be very glad to discuss that.

Mr. JACOBS. I might ask you in reference to specific matters which I have in mind, if you feel you would be sufficiently familiar to answer when I call it to your attention.

Mrs. BOLTON. If I am not, I will say so.

Mr. JACOBS. Take, for example, the mandatory injunction provided in the law.

Mrs. BOLTON. I have already expressed myself on that subject. That was one of the things which I would prefer to have changed.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you change it by eliminating the injunction or only by eliminating the mandatory feature of it?

Mrs. BOLTON. That I do not know, because I have not studied it.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us take, for example, the provision in regard to struck work, or secondary boycott; what is your opinion on that?

Mrs. BOLTON. I am definitely against a secondary boycott.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think it is true secondary boycott where workers refuse to work on struck work?

Mrs. BOLTON. I do not know enough about it, because I have not gone into it, as I have told you.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you know what I mean by struck work?

Mrs. BOLTON. I think so.

Mr. JACOBS. You say you understand what I mean by struck work?

Mrs. BOLTON. I think I do.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think it is a fair provision in which it says where two groups of workers are working, and one is working for A, and one is working for B, and the one working for A is on strike, the workers working for B may do their work?

Mrs. BOLTON. If the gentlemen will permit me, those are the things which you are going to study, and which you are going to bring to us in the Congress; is that not so, and I have said that I felt these things all needed very real study. I do not like the mandatory features of anything.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course that is what I am trying to do, is to get your view, because I may try to exert my influence in the framing of the law so we will get your vote when we get over there.

Mrs. BOLTON. I should love to have a bill come over for which I could vote.

Mr. JACOBS. What do you think in regard to the injunction provision, in regard to the emergency clause? Do you think they should be obtained?

Mrs. BOLTON. I think only if it involves the welfare of the United States, but absolutely as a last procedure.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, you feel it should be a pretty critical situation before it is invoked?

Mrs. BOLTON. Completely critical.

Mr. JACOBS. In regard to the Wagner Act, did I understand you to say you were or were not familiar with it?

Mrs. BOLTON. I am not familiar with the Wagner Act.

Mr. JACOBS. You are not familiar with the provisions of the Wagner Act?

Mrs. BOLTON. Not to a degree that I would care to discuss it with you.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to be fair with you.

Mrs. BOLTON. I am sure you do.

Mr. JACOBS. If you are not familiar with it, I will not even ask you about it.

Mrs. BOLTON. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I have just two or three questions, and I would like to say I want to address them to general over-all principles and reasons that were given for the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, and begin by the opposition to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act; and I believe that you made some reference to these things in your original statement.

In the first place, you said that you believed that more and more pay for shorter hours of work was an evil thing——

Mrs. BOLTON. I did not use that word, sir.

Mr. BURKE. That it was the wrong thing?

Mrs. BOLTON. What I said was that if it continues and pyramids there will come a moment when the country will rise up against it.

Mr. BURKE. Has it not continued and pyramided for 150 years in the country's existence?

Mrs. Bolton. Even so, there is always a point beyond which there is no safety, and beyond which there must be something else. That is in the evolution of man.

Mr. Burke. Has not, for hard practical purposes, this drive or instinct for more and more pay for shorter hours of work, been accelerated by better production?

Mrs. Bolton. Yes, and let me make myself clear: I do not suppose there is anyone who cares more about securing a right amount of work time, and a right amount of production, than I. I have spent a great many years of my life, which is not a short one, doing what any one individual can do in that direction, so I do not want to be misunderstood when I say that there is a stopping point for these things.

Mr. Burke. Certainly, we have not reached that stopping point yet, because we have not reached the stopping point of the improvement of our mass production methods: is that not true?

Mrs. Bolton. You know more about that than I. I would say we are nowhere near the end.

Mr. Burke. You say you have been advised by workers that they feel they need protection against their leaders, the leaders in labor; that does not seem to quite square up with facts all the way around. There are several sitting in Congress here who formerly were labor leaders, and certainly our people felt——

Mrs. Bolton. I am glad to have the opportunity to explain if I have been misunderstood. I have had a great many letters from workers expressing their great relief since the Taft-Hartley bill was put in, and it has amazed me, because I have supposed that labor, as a whole, was definitely against the Taft-Hartley measure. In spite of what some of you gentlemen think, I do have some very good friends among the labor leaders, and also among the labor men, and I have found that they, as well as some of the rest of us, resent some of the actions of some of the unions. I am just broadly covering labor leaders, but I do not mean to say they are impossible people—far from it, because they have secured for the working man a condition of work, and leisure time, which could unquestionably not have been done without them, and I have great respect for you gentlemen.

Mr. Burke. That is the point I wanted to make. What you are saying is that some of the workers may dislike some of the labor leaders?

Mrs. Bolton. Surely.

Mr. Burke. In fact, all of the workers may dislike some of the labor leaders?

Mrs. Bolton. I agree with you, and I am glad you clarified the situation.

Mr. Burke. You do not mean to infer it was solely because of labor relations that capital has gone into hiding, if it has?

Mrs. Bolton. Not at all. What I said before is that capital must appreciate its responsibility to the country, just as much as anyone else in the country.

Does that explain my view?

Mr. Burke. Yes. I am just wondering if the lack of risk capital is not pretty much a habit that has developed over the war-year period, when the money that was ordinarily furnished by risk capital for such things as developing a new plant and equipment, and the ordinary things that we consider furnished by risk capital has not become a habit, and we have not gotten out of the habit yet?

Mrs. BOLTON. It might be that, but I think some of the sources of the risk capital have been done away with, too.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Let me make one or two observations of your presentation.

In summing it up I gathered or interpreted your analysis that perhaps there can be some room for changes in the present Taft-Hartley Act; that is correct, is it not? You made some suggestions of changes?

Mrs. BOLTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. In the very beginning of your presentation you made mention of the fact, and the gentleman here just touched on it. Apparently, I gather that you meant that this reversal of labor legislation from prolabor to proemployer was a result of a very continuing demand or request of workers for more and more money? I think you used that phrase "more and more money," and you said that at some place it had to be stopped?

Mrs. BOLTON. Not exactly. I would refer the gentleman to my actual words.

Mr. WIER. I gather that was one of the prime purposes for which legislation became necessary in the way of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mrs. BOLTON. I did not mean that at all, and did not say that.

Mr. WIER. I was just going to ask you if that was your position. As of today, labor is still lagging far behind the increased cost of living.

Further down in your presentation you made some reference—and you must have looked at my remarks because you stole my stuff but I am going to repeat it, because it was not exactly as I have it here—you made comment there about the fact that the Eightieth Congress, of which you were a Member, got considerable pressure from the workers of this country for freedom of action and activity from unfair labor domination.

Mrs. BOLTON. Oh, I beg your pardon.

Mr. WIER. I think you used that word.

Mrs. BOLTON. I would like to look and see, because that is taken out of context.

Mr. WIER. Anyway, that was one of the prime battle cries in the Eightieth Congress, that the workers of this Nation wanted freedom from labor bosses; I will put it very frankly.

Mrs. BOLTON. I do not think I ever cried very loud about that.

Mr. WIER. You made some comment about unfair domination. I want to ask you, as a result of your experience, and your support of the legislation in the Eightieth Congress, do you not feel that the result of our National Labor Relations Board, under the Taft-Hartley Act, demonstrated how thoroughly wrong Congress was in using that propaganda in the framing of the Taft-Hartley Act that the workers wanted to be free; are you convinced of that today, that that was a misnomer?

Mrs. BOLTON. Not entirely.

Mr. WIER. Are you familiar with the results of all the elections, thousands and thousands of them in the 20 months in which the Taft-Hartley requires that before the workers can have a union shop that they must hold an election certified by the Labor Board, and at that election they must have 51 percent of the qualified workers of the plant vote for the union shop; is that correct?

Mrs. Bolton. Mr. Congressman, I will have to go back to what I said in the beginning, that I have not been able to go into detail on the thing, and I am sorry to come before you not having the details. I came here to bring a very definite hope to you, and that is that you, in your consideration of this thing, will look at it from the country's standpoint rather than from the bickering standpoint first of, will the workers want this, and will somebody else want that. My whole hope is that in the bill which you bring us, you will bring the kind of legislation which will make it possible for us all to sit down together.

When it comes to union shops and nonunion shops, and all that, your life has been in that, and my life has been in bringing up a family, and I am very proud of my family. I have had to put a lot of restraint on them at different stages of their development, and they are all men-children. When you bring a bill to the floor, I shall know all about it, because I do not vote until I am certain. I am sorry that I cannot answer your question in detail at this moment.

Mr. Wier. Mrs. Bolton, I cannot imagine you, as a Member of Congress, not being cognizant of one of the most important arguments in connection with the Taft-Hartley Act, which has been a bone of contention, and which it is admitted most of them are not backing it.

Mrs. Bolton. Then, may I say to you that, if that is your thought, I have not understood your question.

Mr. Wier. Do you still believe the workers want to be freed from union domination?

Mrs. Bolton. I do not believe your question is a fair question, sir.

Mr. Wier. That is the answer you have given us?

Mrs. Bolton. In your analysis of what I have said I do not think that question is a fair question. When you asked me about the union-shop matter, on that I am in agreement with the committee.

Mr. Wier. Closed shop?

Mrs. Bolton. I am in agreement with the understanding that the joint committee is working on that.

Mr. Wier. Then, let me ask you one more question: I thought you were familiar with the law that you helped to pass.

Mrs. Bolton. I am familiar with a great deal of it, but when you put the questions like that, you are disturbing to my point of view or my understanding of it.

Mr. Wier. I imagine that is possible.

Do you still believe now in the war cry of the Eightieth Congress that trade-unions should be prohibited by law from participation in the election of candidates?

Mrs. Bolton. I think they should be prohibited on the same basis that capital and management is prohibited from too much domination in its field.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. McConnell. I have no questions, but I want to thank my colleague, Mrs. Bolton, for taking the time to come before the committee, and to tell her I think she has made a very pleasing presentation.

Mrs. Bolton. Mr. Chairman, may I say this in closing: I want to thank the members, and particularly the gentleman down there at the end of your committee. It has been a very illuminating experience to me, and it has given me a new sense of the responsibility that rests upon the shoulders of your committee. I sincerely hope you will give it the time and study and action that will bring about not an aggressive spirit of trying to find trouble, but in a spirit which will create a climate where we can sit down together.

I do not have any difficulty when I sit down with my labor people at home: I do not have any difficulty in being understood, and in understanding them. They know I have worked all my life to do everything I can. I am sorry I do not know the details in ways to give quick answers to some of the questions that have been asked; but I am very deeply involved in every moment of my living with the problem of making life and the living of it not only more endurable but more constructive for those people who have not had the opportunity that I have had. Perhaps I feel the responsibility far more than those who have not had the opportunity, because to me opportunity is a stewardship, and it is something that gives one a very deep need for service, which is the only reason I am here in this Congress. So I am grateful to the gentleman for the questions asked, and for the very patient consideration that has been given my viewpoint.

Mr. KELLEY. Mrs. Bolton, I think your objective is just the same as the members of the committee. I think they realize the responsibility in this matter very keenly, and I am sure they are anxious to do the job just as you have outlined.

Mrs. BOLTON. If I had not been certain of that I would not have come this morning.

TESTIMONY OF HON. BARRATT O'HARA, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

Mr. O'HARA. I am Barratt O'Hara, a lawyer and Representative in Congress from the Second District of Illinois.

The district that I represent includes the University of Chicago, and runs as far as the steel mills, but does not include them. It is not what you would call a laboring district; yet in that district I campaigned on the issue of the immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the return to the Wagner Act. It is a district that is normally a Republican district. In that district, and on that issue, I was elected by a substantial majority. I would feel derelict in my duty if, having been elected to this Congress, with the obligation of living by my pledges made during the campaign, if I did not appear here today to say to my distinguished colleagues on this subcommittee that in a district that is not a laboring district, and in the city of Chicago, is a sentiment that the Taft-Hartley Act should be immediately repealed, if for no other reason than because it is regarded by the rank and file of the working people, as a slave law. Decent people generally do not like the idea of a law which denies to the men and women who work for a living the right of self-government in their own organizations. That certainly is not the American idea.

Today, briefly, my colleagues, I desire to address myself to the matter of the closed shop. May I go back now and say that when I was quite a young man I was elected lieutenant-governor of the State of Illinois and as lieutenant-governor I was the presiding officer of the State senate, and there was created at that time a committee to investigate the matter of wages paid the workingwomen in the State of Illinois. In Chicago we found that the women, because they were unorganized in our large department stores, were being paid a dollar and a half, two dollars, and two dollars and a half, when the employers knew at that time, and they knew from their knowledge based upon their own investigation, that no woman could support herself on less than $8 a week.

From that time, many years ago, I have been very much interested in the struggle of the workingman, as well as the workingwoman, to attain some measure of contentment and economic security in our America.

During those years, I was associated with three of the great labor leaders of America, all now gone, John Fitzpatrick, Victor Olander, and Ed Nockels, dynamic personalities in the labor movement of those years in the city of Chicago.

Early in my campaign for Congress I appeared in a great meeting of members of the Chicago Typographical Union. Duffy O'Brien and Hugh Brady had been head of that organization and they had been my close friends. They were from the most conservative union in the city of Chicago. That union is, and was at the time of the campaign last fall, on strike in protest over what seemed to them—and seemed to me—the vicious provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

I told those men at that meeting, who I think represent the sentiment of the working people of Chicago, that after retirement from public life for a decade, I was returning that I might have the opportunity in this Congress of voting for the repeal of that act.

I return now and address myself exclusively to the subject of the closed shop. The closed shop, I think, because of organs of publicized respectability, which too often are our newspapers, and through other media of propaganda, has been represented to the American people as being something which it is not. The closed shop is merely the instrumentality through which to management comes an efficiency in labor and to the workers comes the recognition of equality. Now, that is all the closed shop is.

How does that work? This is the way the closed shop operates when management is sincere with those that toil. When one is given employment, his recognition comes from labor organization. The responsibility, therefore, is the responsibility of the labor organizations to train and to select so that those that are recommended by the labor organization are qualified to do the work required of them to be done. Then to management is given this. If the one recommended be not qualified, or if he be, from an industrial viewpoint, objectionable, then management can make its objection to that worker to the labor organization, and if the objection be based upon right, that worker is discharged.

I know of no other way for management and labor to work together as a team. I might say, Mr. Chairman, that for some 4 years, beginning with that black day when the banks were closed, every night I was on the radio talking of the viewpoints of labor from the radio station WCFL, owned by the Chicago Federation of Labor. And when the Wagner Act was enacted, I think from the many, many, many messages that came to me—not from labor leaders, but from the rank and file of the workers—that they saw in that a new era, and they became filled with a new spirit; they had been taken into partnership, with this concept of the Wagner Labor Act that at the conference table management and labor could sit down as partners and work out their common problems.

Then came the Taft-Hartley Act, and hope departed.

As an attorney, I have represented labor unions, and I have never known a labor union the leaders and the rank and file of which were not willing to sit down at the conference table and deal with management over the top of the table. This has not always been true on the other side.

So, with this Taft-Hartley Act, labor fears that there are too many hidden jokers in it. A joker is something to me that is put into a law that you do not know quite what it means until you bring it to a test. I am a lawyer; I have read the Taft-Hartley Act, and I have been confused. I have never talked with a lawyer who with a certainty could say what would be, as judicially determined, the full sweep of provisions obviously inserted for a purpose.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me just common sense, whether the Taft-Hartley Act be bad, as labor believes it to be, or whether it be good, as its advocates allege they believe it to be, to view it with suspicion because it was enacted by a Congress not friendly to organized labor, at a time when the public mind was inflamed, and it seemed the opportune time to enact legislation hostile to the best interests of labor.

Now, whatever the truth might be, labor has that feeling. And since we depend so much upon labor, is it not the sensible thing—because to labor, it seems to be a bit of legislation conceived in a spirit of hatred—to repeal it and to return to the law that labor regards almost as sacred script, and, then, if there be changes needed, to discuss those changes, with management and labor getting together? And I think in that spirit, what changes may be needed could be agreed upon.

Mr. Chairman, I had no thought of talking as long as I have. I do appreciate the courtesy of this subcommittee in inviting me here, and I feel just a little bit better and a little truer to the men and women who sent me to this Congress, a little truer to the years that I have been in public places fighting for the under dog, a little clearer in conscience that I accepted this invitation, and being here, have urged upon my colleagues, so much more experienced than I, the immediate repeal of Taft-Hartley and the return of the Wagner Act.

Thank you so much.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). May I interrupt there a minute, Congressman O'Hara. There will probably be some questions that the members will want to ask.

Mr. O'HARA. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I notice you made reference in your comments to the closed shop. The Congressman well knows that the Taft-Hartley bill outlaws the closed shop and tries to set up the so-called union shop. A recent decision of the National Labor Relations Board held that people working in a plant that was struck are denied the right to vote in a National Labor Relations Board decision, but the decision gave the right to vote to the men who are brought in to take their place.

I would like to ask the Congressman if he does not think that is a pretty powerful weapon in the hands of the employer to destroy labor unions.

Mr. O'HARA. There could be no doubt about that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you have any comments or questions, Mr. Powell?

Mr. POWELL. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. No questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Just in connection with the witness' own statement, Mr. Chairman, in connection with the closed shop, I want to ask this:

You are familiar with the recent decision of the Supreme Court which held State laws banning the closed shop are not to be unconstitutional? You are familiar with that, are you not?

Mr. O'HARA. I am not here, Mr. Congressman, to discuss the opinions of the Supreme Court on State legislation.

Mr. JACOBS. I have simply this that I want to bring into the record at this time, Mr. Chairman, as part of the propaganda blitz that is being used, a statement from David Lawrence's column as follows:

> The President also has decided to ignore the latest decision of the Supreme Court of the United States which said in effect that compulsory unionization is unconstitutional.

As a lawyer, I know, and I believe most lawyers know, that that is not a correct statement of the Supreme Court decision at all. I wanted that in the record only as an example of another item in the blitz.

Mr. O'HARA. I did not wish to be discourteous when I said that I was not here to discuss the opinions of the Supreme Court. I merely had this in mind. Sometimes I disagree with the courts. And sometimes I agree with them. I was here largely today in the one matter that I am so much interested in, because I think it is so reflective upon the welfare of the people, and that is the immediate repeal of Taft-Hartley and the reenactment of the Wagner Labor Act.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I want to compliment the Congressman on his statement, particularly as it applies to the closed shop, and also to the union shop. I would like to ask this question. Is it not true that when the Taft-Hartley Act was going through Congress, when committee hearings were being held, and so on, that all throughout the country we were bombarded with a barrage of statements to the effect that workers generally wanted to be emancipated, as it were, from the tyranny that was supposed to exist in the unions? And is it not true that since the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, since the National Labor Relations Board has been holding elections on union security, that 98 percent of those voting—actual workers, not labor leaders, but actual workers in plants—have voted for security of their unions?

Mr. O'HARA. I do not know that I am familiar with present conditions, Congressman. I have been out of labor activities for some time. I do not wish to comment on anything of which I have not a personal knowledge.

Mr. BURKE. If that were true, would you not say that it certainly should be pretty good evidence that someone was wrong 2 years ago.

Mr. O'HARA. That someone was wrong 2 years ago?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. O'HARA. I think the American people gave that answer very much more strongly than I can. And, Mr. Congressman, I would not be here unless my district—my Republican district, mind you—thought that the people here 2 years ago made a very bad mistake in the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. BURKE. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No questions, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I do have a question, Mr. O'Hara.

You referred in your testimony to the Taft-Hartley Act as being full of jokers. Do you not think that this provision in the act that permits the States to ban closed shops is just one of those jokers that shows the oppressiveness of this act?

Mr. O'HARA. I think there are so many jokers, as I would call them, in the act that it would be a waste of time to discuss any one of them specifically.

Mr. PERKINS. Inasmuch as we were talking about the closed shop, that was what the Supreme Court held. They decided upon that provision the States had the right to outlaw the closed shop, under four or five sentences that were hidden away in that Taft-Hartley law. That is the reason I wanted to make that observation, and not that the closed shop itself is unconstitutional.

Mr. KELLEY (presiding). Is that all, Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. O'Hara.

Mr. O'HARA. Thank you, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I am glad you came today.

Mr. Blatnik, a Member of Congress from Minnesota.

TESTIMONY OF HON. JOHN A. BLATNIK, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MINNESOTA

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Chairman and members of the House Committee on Education and Labor, I appreciate having this opportunity to appear before your committee, and to state my position on the proposed repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. I might say that this is the opportunity for which I have waited ever since the antilabor Taft-Hartley law was enacted—it is a real pleasure to give you my honest opinion of this law, and to urge its immediate repeal.

I will speak frankly and to the point. I want the Taft-Hartley law repealed in the shortest possible time. I maintain that it is a vicious and un-American measure which was written by labor-hating corporation attorneys who were in the pay of the National Association of Manufacturers. It was adopted by the equally reactionary and now-repudiated Eightieth Congress during a period of passion and "lynch-labor" hysteria. Its one and only purpose was to shackle and eventually destroy the American labor movement.

I also want the original Wagner Act reinstated in letter and principle. This law, which was destroyed by the Taft-Hartley law, was truly the Magna Charta of labor. It was based on the obvious truth that the public welfare requires the existence of strong and free trade unions who are able to bargain on equal terms with management. It provided for a workable procedure of collective bargaining, and resulted in higher standards of living for our people. By outlawing company unions it guaranteed that labor unions should be truly free. It created the conditions for democratic control of unions, and gave status to these labor organizations in our democratic society.

I know that there are those in the Congress who take the position that although the Taft-Hartley law should be repealed, some of its features should be retained in the new labor law. I am not referring to those legislative artists who are now using every stalling device and underhanded technique to defeat repeal. I have learned from experience that it is not possible to reason with the supporters of the Taft-Hartley law. I well remember their unconcealed hatred of labor, and their steam roller methods during the 1947 debates on the Taft-Hartley measure.

Instead, I am speaking of those who say that there are some parts of the Taft-Hartley law that are good, and that such parts should be retained as amendments to the Wagner Act.

To these advocates of compromise, I say that the Taft-Hartley law is a vicious and evil measure and that there is no ground for compromise. How can one compromise with Taft-Hartleyism when the whole purpose of the law, as admitted by its sponsors during the House debate, is to cripple and handcuff labor organizations? How can one compromise when all this talk of compromise is a spurious and diversionary tactic now being used by the enemies of labor?

Those who would retain parts of the Taft-Hartley law as amendments to the Wagner Act remind me of the lunatic who drops arsenic into a glass of milk and honey—the milk and honey may be good, but the effect of the mixture is most harmful to the consumer. They remind me of the saboteur who drops a monkey wrench wrench into a smooth-working machine. Let us not poison the humanitarian Wagner Act with the arsenic of the Taft-Hartley law. Let us not drop the proverbial monkey wrench into the smooth-working labor-management relations of the Wagner Act.

The Taft-Hartley law epitomizes the era of brute force, the use of machine guns and strikebreakers in an industrial jungle. It is symbolic of the use of the court injunction as a strikebreaking technique and the utilization of Government as an agency of labor-hating employers. It must be completely wiped from the statute books.

I am not against any constructive and honest proposals to improve the Wagner Act in the interests of better labor-management relations, and any recommendations offered in good faith should be considered by the committee. Perhaps some amendments will have to be considered at some later date when the Wagner Act is again operating as the law of the land. Such deliberations will require statesmanship of the highest order, and it is my feeling that now is not the time. To inject proposals for major changes in the Wagner Act will only confuse the issue, and hamper our efforts to achieve our No. 1 task, which is to repeal the Taft-Hartley law.

During the last campaign I promised the working people of my district that I would fight for complete repeal of the Taft-Hartley law, and for a return to the original Wagner Act. I know that the workers voted for me on this basis. Today all the major organizations—the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and the Railroad Brotherhoods—are on record in support of complete repeal, and I stand with them on this issue.

I urge the committee to report favorably on the recommendation of your subcommittee's proposal for the "two package" approach and the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. You may be assured of my full support of such a proposal when it reaches the floor of the House.

At the end of my testimony I wish to include in the record a statement prepared by Mr. E. L. Slaughter, secretary of the Central Labor Political Committee of the Duluth AFL Federated Trades and Labor Assembly. This statement represents the official views of all A. F. of L. unions, and it contains concrete evidence as to the nature of the Taft-Hartley law as it has actually operated in practice.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. Blatnik, your statement of the complete repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reenactment of the Wagner Act of 1935 and then to proceed with any amendments which might be desirable for the Wagner Act is a two-package approach. Now, unfortunately this committee did vote out the two-package approach, but the full Labor Committee refused to accept it. So now we are forced to consider H. R. 2032, which is the so-called one-package approach, the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reenactment of the Wagner Act of 1935, and for other purposes. Well, the "for other purposes" means that we have to bring in the proposed amendments which are in H. R. 2032.

I agree with you that the 2-package approach is the proper way to do this.

Mr. BLATNIK. And I commend you and the committee for favorably acting on that 2-package approach.

Mr. KELLEY. But we were denied that by the full committee. So we are compelled now to work on the so-called 1-package approach, which is the bill in front of us.

Mr. Powell, do you have any questions?

Mr. POWELL. Yes.

Mr. Blatnik, there has been some attempt here today to refute the arguments that the elections of November 2 were a mandate from a majority of the people to abolish the Taft-Hartley Act. A colleague, Mr. Madden, from Indiana, said that the overwhelming number of people in his district voted to give him a mandate.

Now, in your district, for instance, just for the sake of the record, you campaigned on the basis of the abolition of the Taft-Hartley Act, did you not?

Mr. BLATNIK. Absolutely. I made that one of my strongest points in my campaign.

Mr. POWELL. And your vote was a pretty good vote, was it not?

Mr. BLATNIK. The vote was the highest vote received by a candidate. I must put in a qualifying statement. I do not mean to bring this out from the personal point.

Mr. POWELL. I want to get it in the record.

Mr. BLATNIK. But since the gentleman from New York has brought it out, the vote was the highest any candidate ever received for that office in my district, the largest plurality and the highest percentage of the total vote cast received by any candidate for either national or State office in the State of Minnesota.

Mr. POWELL. Certainly.

Mr. BLATNIK. Now, a further qualifying point. It is not a district that is overwhelmingly one-sided. It is a district that is very independent. It is a district we do not have what may be called labor bosses in control of labor voters or party-machine control over the voters. It is a district which voted overwhelmingly for that great humanitarian, Franklin D. Roosevelt, and at the same time was sending down here Republican Congressmen who had a pretty good labor backing. So it is a very independent and forthright district.

The members of organized labor alone are rather large, I would say easily 35,000 out of a population of 310,000. And when they went down to the polls, the larger number of labor people in the community gave me their vote largely because of my stand for the complete and outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley bill.

Now, these voters went to the polls, men and women, according to the dictates of their conscience, and you cannot say that they are under the control of any labor bosses, or that they are going to be free from labor racketeers and labor boses. They were fighting for their very livelihood, and they knew that the Taft-Hartley law was a serious threat to their livelihood.

Mr. POWELL. Apropos of that, I think it ought to be in the record that 103 Members of the Eightieth Congress who voted for the Taft-Hartley Act were defeated in the election last fall—103 were defeated—and I think that your testimony and that of others shows that this is a mandate from the people to abolish the Taft-Hartley Act.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, I believe the gentleman has testified that the Taft-Hartley law passed by the Eightieth Congress was written by a group of top-level attorneys.

Mr. BLATNIK. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the gentleman will agree with me that they were representing some organized groups who felt proud to call themselves rugged individualists. They are always squawking about free enterprise; yet they are perfectly willing, and showed they were willing in the Taft-Hartley bill, to interfere in the affairs of a lot of other Americans who happened to be members of organized labor. Yet they say they want the Government to keep their hands off business, but it is all right for the Government to put its hands on labor and regulate labor, but not to regulate business. Is that true?

Mr. BLATNIK. That is true; yes, sir. I agree with you.

Mr. KELLEY. Is that all, Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I pass.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. Nothing.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. No questions. I think he has done all right.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Blatnik. We are glad you came here this morning.

Mr. BLATNIK. Mr. Chairman, I thank you and the members of your subcommittee for the very fine reception and your consideration and attention. I do regret there were not more members of the opposition party from the other side of the aisle, the members of this committee who were absent. I would have enjoyed very much to have the opportunity to answer their questions.

I thank you very kindly.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you.

(The statement of Mr. Slaughter referred to by Mr. Blatnik, is as follows:)

STATEMENT BY E. L. SLAUGHTER, SECRETARY, CENTRAL LABOR POLITICAL COMMITTEE OF FEDERATED TRADES AND LABOR ASSEMBLY, DULUTH, MINN., RELATIVE TO SOME OF THE OBJECTIONABLE FEATURES OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

The purpose of this statement is to call attention to some of the specific cases where the Taft-Hartley Act has been unfair or ineffective in its operations at Duluth, Minn. No attempt is made to state all objections of American Federation of Labor unions in Duluth to this law. In general our objections are the same as those of other labor organizations throughout the State of Minnesota.

1. The Taft-Hartley law has denied certain types of employee organizations the right to organize and have protection under the act.—In Duluth there is a union of licensed tugmen who have been organized since 1900. This union has had collective-bargaining agreements with employers since 1900. The Taft-Hartley Act has denied them protection and interfered with this established collective-bargaining relationship because all the employees that this union has represented have been classified as supervisory employees by the National Board. As a result, masters, mates, and pilots who are employed on Great Lakes steamships have been denied the right to become organized and have protection under the law. The union recognizes that possibly the master or captain of a ship should be classified as a supervisor, but first, second, and third mates, and pilots were denied the right of organizing even after they excluded the master from their bargaining units. The Board ruled that all licensed officers aboard lake vessels were classified as foremen irrespective of their titles or rank. As indicated above, before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act there was no restriction on the right of this type of employee to have the protection of the Labor Act. The result is that the only way these employees can protect their economic position is to strike in order to maintain rights which they have had for nearly 50 years.

2. The Communist affidavits are ineffective.—The officers in most AFL unions in this area have signed the affidavits. There is, however, one specific case where an officer of a union refused to sign the affidavit. He was not a candidate for reelection to the office, but the executive board of the union hired him as business agent with full powers to represent the union. He was not classified as an officer in the bylaws or constitution, but as an employee he had full power to represent the union and the executive board.

3. The restrictions upon union security have operated unfairly.—In one instance there was a union shop election at the Zenith Dredge Co. where only one employee was involved. This employee had the right to vote for the union shop. He voted in favor of the union-shop clause. As a result the contract covers all future employees who were hired after the election. The international union with which the employee was affiliated was required to go to the expense of sending a representative from Cleveland, Ohio. The NLRB was required to go to the expense of making an investigation and conducting the election. The expense was possibly as great as if several hundred employees had been involved.

Another instance is the case of the Western Electric Co. in Duluth and the electrical workers union. The union petitioned the NLRB for a union-shop election after it had been certified by the Board as the collective bargaining representative. The certification election was held on the premises of the employer. The union had sufficient signatures and authorizations for the union-shop election, but the employer refused to cooperate with either the union or the Board in allowing voting booths to be set up on their property and also refused to furnish information necessary for the conduct of the election. The employer made the statement: "That, as the matter was by and between the NLRB and the union, they should hold their elections uptown, away from the company property." The location of the plant is such that it was impracticable to find another place where the election could be held. The closest place available was the city hall which is about a mile away from the plant in a congested traffic area. Although there is no doubt that a majority of the employees would vote for the union shop if given a fair opportunity, the union felt that because of the impossibility of locating a convenient voting place combined with requirement that the majority of all employees must vote for the union shop that the election could not safely be held.

4. The hardship which results to small unions from the necessity for filing complex forms and affidavits.—Many of the unions in Duluth are small. For the most part they do not have paid representatives. Since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act there has been a great deal of confusion with reference to filling out the many forms and affidavits required by the act. Without compensation, officers of these small unions have spent a great deal of time after working hours in an attempt to comply with rules and regulations which we believe to be unnecessary and unfair and which create a hardship on the members of the unions involved. The time spent on these activities should have been spent furthering the real interests of the members of the union.

5. The confusion among building-trades unions.—Under the Wagner Act building-trades unions were not considered to be covered by the law. Some courts have held that they are not covered by the Taft-Hartley Act. The general counsel for the board has taken the position that they are covered. Yet, he has failed to set up a procedure to handle elections in building-trades unions. This has resulted in confusion, uncertainty, and hardship because the members of these organizations do not know what their rights and obligations are. We understand that attempts to setup pilot procedures in the building trades and other areas failed. As a result, the members of these unions are held by the general counsel to be under the law but there is no procedure for making the provisions of the law applicable to them.

6. The prohibition against making political contributions by labor organizations operates unfairly.—Members of unions in the Duluth area are practically unanimous in recognizing the necessity for political action through the labor organizations to which they belong. Before the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act they authorized the use of union funds for this purpose and no member of a Duluth union ever objected to this procedure. It is true that during the past election, most members of unions made individual contributions. However, this required much work and took time that should have been used for other purposes. In addition, it is less expensive for individual members when general union funds can be used for legitimate political activity.

7. Objections to the secondary boycott provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.—On the water front in Duluth-Superior harbors there are approximately 24 unions who are affiliated with several international unions. They have banded together into a trade council known as the Maritime Trades Council for the purpose of bringing about uniform conditions and wages for employees doing comparable work. Before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act it was a custom of these organizations to assist one another when they were in difficulty. The Taft-Hartley Act provisions wiped out this right to help out a sister organization in distress and virtually made strikebreakers out of unions who could not help or assist another union who was in a dispute with an employer even though it was in the same or an allied industry.

8. Objections to the so-called free speech provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.—Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, although both the National Board and the United States Supreme Court had recognized the employer's constitutional right to free speech, it was illegal to a certain extent for employers to interfere with, coerce, or intimidate employees in their right to join or not to join an organization. After the passage of the Wagner Act we had no trouble with employer interference until the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act when several of the employers then wrote letters to individual employees purporting to advise them of their rights under the Taft-Hartley Act but interpreting the act with an employer's slant. Although they did not break the law, they went just as far as they possibly could without getting into trouble. This did not happen under the old law, only after the Taft-Hartley Act was passed.

9. Objections to the prohibition against guards and watchmen being members of unions that are affiliated with other organizations.—A specific example of the unfair manner in which the prohibition against the right of watchmen and guards to belong to unions that are affiliated with other organizations occurred on the water front at Duluth. For years coal docks at Duluth have employed persons who were classified as watchmen. However, part of their duties is to do work of firing boilers, janitor work, and other work of a similar nature. These employees for years had been members of and represented by the same union which represents other employees. Only a few men were involved and it would be impracticable to have a separate organization. The act provides no guide by which it could be determined whether or not these men fall under the category of guards and watchmen. A dispute over this question almost resulted in a serious controversy which has not yet been definitely settled.

Mr. KELLEY. Some of the Members of Congress were unable to appear this morning as scheduled. Now, these Members may file their statements with the committee, and without objection they will be entered in the record.

Mr. JACOBS. Will they be filed in sufficient numbers so that we may have copies of them?

Mr. KELLEY. They will all be printed in the record.

(The following statements were subsequently received and, by order of the chairman, as above stated, are made a part of the record:)

STATEMENT BY HON. ANDREW JACOBS, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF INDIANA

Gentlemen, within the next 15 minutes I hope to be able to induce you to give serious consideration to some much-needed labor legislation. This will pertain to evils which have not been heretofore covered by legislation.

We much accept the facts as they exist, recognizing that combinations of wealth or men or both possess economic power with which an individual cannot cope. Then we must acknowledge that a prime function of government is to regulate and restrain such excessive power so as to enable all men to fairly compete for their just share of what they help produce by their labor or investment. To apply this principle of government, we must do four things:

(1) Evaluate the general economic power of the usual types of combinations.

(2) Determine who is normally the object of the abuse of such combined economic power.

(3) Determine the corresponding economic power of those upon whom the first is ordinarily exerted.

(4) Regulate and restrain any abuse of such excessive economic power so as to restore competition and enable ordinarily prudent and energetic men to bargain for what they helped produce by their labor or investment.

For a half century legislative bodies recognized the inability of the employee to meet the general economic power of the employer. More than a half century ago the Federal and most State legislative bodies enacted into law the principles of the Wagner Act, only to have them stricken down or denied enforcement by the courts.

This was a strange jurisprudence, since the common law recognized and curtailed economic duress in almost every contractual matter save the labor contract. Fortunately, the principles of the Wagner Act are no longer seriously challenged. They are enacted as the first sections of the Taft-Hartley Act.

However, the opponents of, and those who did not fully understand, the Wagner Act abandoned the direct assault for a flanking attack. Though the act was left standing, its effect was largely emasculated by the Taft-Hartley Act.

Some of the detailed provisions, and an analysis thereof, are more fully set out in my response to the General Electric questionnaire, now a part of the Congressional Record; and which I request, Mr. Chairman, be made a part of the record of this hearing.

Suffice it to be recorded at this point that the most damaging effect of certain provisions of the Taft-Hartley law has now been conceded by its senior coauthor, Senator Taft, as well as by three national periodicals, which are generally accepted by business as sound reliable publications.

I hasten to say, Mr. Chairman, I do not mention Senator Taft's concession as partisan chiding of an opponent. I believe his change of mind is perfectly honest and highly commendable. The politics of this question should not concern us. I will join with, or oppose Democrat or Republican to gain a fair law. I believe a majority of this committee feels likewise.

I will not dwell longer upon either the Wagner or Taft-Hartley law, except as they may illustrate my proposals. Both of those laws will be the principal consideration before this committee including the administration provisions regarding boycotts and jurisdictional disputes, which I discuss in response to the General Electric questionnaire. Rather I come here in the capacity of a witness and urge you to consider the necessity of applying the rules I suggested to another phase of the labor problem.

The proponents of the Taft-Hartley law claimed it reduced the power of union officials. That it did. But I feel that in so reducing such power they did not "Determine who (was) normally the object of the abuse of such combined economic power." And the Taft-Hartley law did not restrain the abuse of such excessive economic power so as to relieve those who were the objects thereof.

The power of the union officer can be directed toward bargaining for wages and working conditions. But that power can also be used to oppress members and local union organizations affiliated with the national or international.

It was the former power, or the power to bargain for wages, that the Taft-Hartley law curbed, not the latter. It is the latter that is sometimes abused and concerning which I will urge legislaive restraint.

Many union people know of this, and want remedies. I urged it upon the Seventy-ninth Congress and again upon the Eightieth. I will furnish you names of witnesses, good union men, who will give you illustrations of what I want remedied. These practices are certainly not prevalent in all unions, and there should be no objections from those unions that recognize and honor democratic processes.

I will, to induce your interest, give you a relatively brief example:

A local union was held in a captive status for over 16 years. It was never permitted to elect an officer. Every officer was appointed by the international president. The same group served through the entire 16 years. Vacancies by death were filled by the international president. Petition after petition to elect officers were rejected or ignored by the international president, until finally he yielded after 16 years and permitted a partial election. But the partial election, together with ground rules laid down by the international president, left his personal appointees in full control of the local's finances.

Finally, the few newly elected officers summoned up the courage and demanded to see the books. They were gone. Suit was filed against the international president, who then produced remnants of the books. Most of them had been destroyed after a very questionable audit by a Washington accountant.

Then, in order to intimidate the local into dismissing its suit for possession of its own books and an accounting of his stewardship, the international president suspended from the union pension roll all the old members of the local who had fully paid for their pensions. I think that was one of the cruelest acts I ever saw committed by an individual who had somehow been favored with a human appearance.

Finally, after proof of embezzlement became overwhelming, he repaid the local a large sum from the international treasury, promising to recoup it by proceeding against his own agents. But, in the meantime, the local had another problem. The wage scale had lagged to 34 cents per hour less than that in an adjoining district in the same craft. This occurred while it was captive and its contracts were made by the administrator, trustee, or whatever you choose to call him (these union members had a few very choice names, which don't belong in the record).

The employers in that district had to learn collective bargaining all over again. The pretended representative of these laboring men had become a mere broker of their labor. But the scale was finally raised. How much the men lost during the captivity of their local is incapable of quick estimate, but the equalizing increase amounted to about one and a half millions per year.

Now, let's have this cleared, on the point of financial reports. The members got financial reports. But without looking at the books and behind the financial reports, the reports didn't mean aynthing. And without protection when demanding a look at the books, no one was apt to demand a look except in desperation.

This is pretty well illustrated by the next phase of the matter.

Part of the local embezzlement was concealed by items in the audit and some of the recovered books. "Special organizing" was the only explanation for items totaling $90,000. So the very term "special organizing" was suspect.

Recall the international president had obligated himself to proceed against his agents who were at least the primary, though probably not the sole defaulters in the local. Well, he dragged his feet for 8 months without commencing action. In the meantime, an international convention was called. A financial report was furnished and again up bobbed our friend "special organizing." But this time he was responsible for expenditures of over a million dollars. The local's officers announced they would press action against the defaulters of their own treasury and demand, through their delegates, to know who got the million dollars from the international and what the international got in return. Whereupon the international president intimidated the convention into expelling the four elected delegates.

I won't prolong this by outlining the method of intimidation further than to say it was implied threats of expulsion against the delegates, and requiring them, when voting, to stand long enough to be identified.

He also intimidated the convention into granting him power to revoke the local's charter. Then he put up a $700,000 bond and, without notice, recaptured the local, its treasury, offices, and functions by a mandatory injunction.

During this time, the matter was brought to the attention of one of the Senators from the State where the local was situated. He was vainly asked to sponsor legislation such as I am going to ask you to consider.

Finally, the charter was restored with autonomy, but the local's president was never again recognized as a member. He is still wandering about like a lost soul, and the Taft-Hartley law does not help him in the least. This will become apparent during these hearings.

But to return to the court that ousted the local's elected officers. That court refused to listen to the evidence of those things heretofore related. While the judge no doubt wanted to be fair, he just didn't comprehend the problem, its scope nor its effect upon the workers.

Being reduced to the utter lack of representation they had suffered for almost 17 years, the local members accepted a compromise that did not reinstate the local president: the man who had led the fight that restored its autonomy, its treasury and its wage scale. This man later obtained a civil court judgment ordering him reinstated as a member, but that was appealed and the appeal is still pending.

Now, during the same convention, the international president refused to permit nomination of candidates to run against himself and at least one of his co-officers. The same intimidating methods were employed. The delegates trying to make nominations were simply ruled out of order. The printed convention proceedings will establish these facts without verbal proof.

I have related these matters as pertaining to one case. They have their counterparts in other cases. I do not represent that they are prevalent in many unions. But that these conditions exist in a few unions is too much. We cannot in good conscience ignore them.

These abuses were offered as excuses for the Taft-Hartley Act. Thus some union officials themselves furnished ammunition which apparently justified destruction of unions. On March 12, 1947, I offered to the then chairman of this committee this information as a basis for remedial legislation. He ignored me. I hope that you gentlemen won't.

Let me assure you the case I outlined is not a single isolated instance. True, a few unions have most of the trouble. The law reports are replete with examples where these matters have reached the highest courts.

There are remedies for these abuses at common law, but they are long, delayed, tedious and too expensive for those who are thus abused. I believe a more expeditious remedy should be provided in the labor act with jurisdiction in the National Labor Relations Board. It can comprehend the problems.

Proper remedies would, in my judgment be:

(1) Provisions requiring periodical election of union officers, and a remedy for fraud or duress in such election.

(2) Provisions for any member to audit or examine the books of the local or international, and of the local and international to audit each other's books.

(3) Provisions requiring due process of law, including disinterested trial boards for violation of union laws, and a right to have a Government agency review heavy penalties, including expulsion, which are capriciously or arbitrarily imposed.

With these provisions, the abuses of the closed shop can be eliminated and the worker can again establish a single unified front to meet the unity of the corporate employer. If we treat those four matters properly in our legislation, we will contribute decency to the unions whose officers have abused their power and we will not injure any union or employer.

We will have determined the persons who are the objects of that abuse of power and protected them by eliminating the abuses rather than destroying the only instrumentality they have to protect themselves from the economic power of the employer.

Our economic system cannot function without large employers; employers whose power is too great for the employee to meet and bargain with. Hence the only hope for a free economy is that labor can organize to match the employers' economic power. Let those who preach free economy and in the same breath damn the unions find another solution. And let those who damn the unions for such abuses as I point out here come forward and help legislate union decency and not union destruction.

It is possible, even probable, that I have not made friends nor influenced people (even you gentlemen) by this statement and these recommendations. But my statement is true, and what I recommend will have to be eventually adopted.

STATEMENT BY HON. STEPHEN M. YOUNG, REPRESENTATIVE AT LARGE OF THE STATE OF OHIO

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, the fact that I am back in Congress is, in itself, evidence that the people of Ohio, like the people of the United States, have looked upon the Taft-Hartley Act and found it bad. They want it repealed and replaced by the Wagner Act with amendments such as those provided in H. R. 2032.

I have no doubt about this fact. During the campaign, speaking from one end of Ohio to the other, I made a major point of standing for repeal of this iniquitous, one-sided statute. No one who voted for me could have been in any doubt as to where I stood on the issue of continuing or repealing the so-called Labor-Management Relations Act, of which the senior Senator from Ohio was—and still is—a cosponsor and defender, though recently with many reservations and amendments.

My predecessor boasted of his support of the Taft-Hartley law and denounced union labor. He said he did not want the support of labor. Labor complied with his wishes. The record of the Eightieth Congress, including enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, was more than he could carry. The figures tell the story: The Democratic candidate for Representative at Large received 1,455,972 votes, the Republican candidate for reelection received 1,342,388 votes. He ran behind the Republican nominee for President, Governor Dewey, who had not played an active part in passing the Taft-Hartley Act and who received 1,455,684 votes in Ohio.

These figures speak for themselves, and I would only add that in Ohio eight Republican Representatives were defeated by Democratic candidates. In the last Congress, Ohio was represented by only four Democratic Congressmen. In this Congress there are 12 of us from Ohio. Throughout Ohio, for the particular reason that the coauthor of the law is a native and political leader in that State, the Taft-Hartley Act was a prime issue in the campaign and the results were an unmistakable repudiation of that statute and a clear call to the Eighty-first Congress to repeal it and replace it with a Labor Relations Act fair in purpose and equitable in the methods provided for administration to achieve the ends sought. That end, made plain in the original Wagner Act and declared constitutional by the Supreme Court, is to protect workers in organizing themselves into unions of their own choosing and to engage in peaceful collective bargaining with their employers regarding wages, hours, and conditions of work. This is what is provided in H. R. 2032, which includes also certain provisions for dealing with jurisdictional disputes and unjustifiable secondary boycotts. H. R. 2032 brings the Wagner Act up to date in the light of experience. Fairmindedness and statesmanship of leaders of organized labor is evident in the fact that this bill, with its provisions for outlawing certain forms of secondary boycotts and providing arbitration machinery for the settlement of jurisdictional disputes, is supported by organized labor.

Now, I should like to point specifically to provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which are wrong and harmful not only to workers, not only to peaceful industrial relations, but to the welfare of the Nation and to democracy itself.

The Taft-Hartley law represents the first shameful, ugly step toward fascism in this country. Attacks upon labor unions and upon farmers' and consumers' cooperatives were the first step toward fascism in Germany and Italy. The same is true in America.

If I were a laboring man instead of a professional man, I would belong to the union of my craft and sit in the front row. For a half century organized labor has battled for and won many of the proudest treasures of our American tradition and heritage—for example, free public education, the abolition of child labor, the right of self-organization and collective bargaining, the 40-hour week, workmen's compensation laws, and the highest standard of living in the world.

I have here, and I should like to have included in the record at the conclusion of my remarks, a sample of how the Taft-Hartley Act was a real issue in the campaign. It is, as you will see, a popular and, I believe, essentially accurate statement of the effect of the Taft-Hartley Act upon the workers in the Pipe Machinery Co., a plant located in my home town, the city of Cleveland. Later in my remarks I propose to describe this case.

Labor unions and the members of labor unions have helped to maintain the American way of life and those who would, by restrictive legislative enactment, destroy unions, would destroy one of the most dynamic and vital forces of our democracy.

The Taft-Hartley law effectively curtails the constitutional rights of workers to be free from employer domination. It restricts the rights of workers to bargain effectively as a group for improved wages and working conditions.

The claim has been made that the Taft-Hartley Act emancipates working men and women from the domination of unions and union bosses.

It is somewhat curious that the National Association of Manufacturers has been so interested in protecting the workers from being oppressed by unions of their own choosing and by officers whom the workers themselves have elected from their own ranks.

Collective bargaining, as we have known it under the Wagner Act, furnished labor and management a wide range of freedom in negotiating and reaching agreements.

Now the Taft-Hartley law has established an entirely new pattern. It discourages and, in practice, blocks free collective bargaining. The freedom of bargaining is eliminated and the ruling of a third party, the Government, becomes a deciding factor. Under such circumstances, it is difficult to build agreements on a foundation of trust and mutual understanding. Labor relations have been and, until this act is repealed, will continue to be embroiled in a maze of regulations and legal restrictions that make for friction, strife, and industrial chaos.

Most employers should now realize, and undoubtedly do realize, that the best way to achieve and maintain industrial peace in this free Nation is through collective bargaining. If our American way of life and free-enterprise system is to be preserved, employers and employees must solve their own problems themselves around the bargaining table. Collective bargaining must be free, not hampered by useless and punitive restrictions.

Advocates of the Taft-Hartley law had much to say regarding high union initiation fees. Many unions provide their members with unemployment benefits, retirement funds, and burial benefits, and it would seem proper to require new members, who become immediately eligible to such benefits, to pay an initiation fee to represent their share of what other members have paid. Unions are confronted with the necessity for more financial strength if they are to do an effective job of collective bargaining. The representatives must be paid for their time, legal services are required, economic research is necessary, education must be provided the members if the responsibility expected of unions is to be attained. This is not extortion. No one claims our Government should be given the power to determine initiation or entrance fees into a church or a lodge or a fraternity. Why is it necessary to give it such power over labor-union affairs?

The Taft-Hartley law requires unions to file very complete data with the Secretary of Labor. It is claimed that corporations are required to give such detailed reports to the Securities and Exchange Commission. I maintain that unions should not be run like corporations. Corporations are operated for private profit. Unions are not. They are operated to render service to their members. Furthermore, corporations operated for private profit are almost invariably run by a compact, tightly run management group. Except at the outset when security issues are floated, stockholders in corporations find it nearly impossible to learn how their corporations are run. Obviously, the only purpose of this provision is to make the operation of a union as difficult as possible.

Another objection I voice to this law is the ban against direct contributions to political parties; and the provision of the Taft-Hartley law that unions make no contributions nor expenditures in connection with any national election. It is well known that corporations, through their officers, make huge contributions to their political favorites.

Labor, organized and unorganized, is bound to oppose the act for this reason above. Those who sponsored the act sought to prohibit labor unions from publishing the congressional records of candidates in papers, circulars, or pamphlets supported in whole or in part by union dues. It sought to prohibit unions from using their funds to rent halls and hold meetings to discuss political candidates and their congressional records and to buy radio time to speak in support or opposition to any candidates.

Is this not a threat to our political freedom? Is this not an infringement upon the right of free speech? Is this not a violation of the very first amendment of our Constitution which provides, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech or of the press; or the right of the people to assemble and to petition the government for redress of grievances."

The attempt to prevent workers from effective political expression of their views regarding those who wrote and voted for the Taft-Hartley Act was too obvious to be overlooked.

One of the outstanding examples of the unfairness of the Taft-Hartley law is the method of voting for a union shop. The requirement of the law is that a majority of all eligible employees must vote "yes" in order for the union to win the election. In other words, every worker who fails to vote has his vote counted as a "no" vote. No candidate for office in the United States, no other issue on the ballot, must face such a test.

The Norris-LaGuardia Act, which was a fine forward-looking law, limited the use of injunctions. This salutary provision was repealed by the Taft-Hartley Act. When an injunction is issued in a labor dispute, it drives the parties farther apart and converts an industrial relations problem into a legal contest. A great abuse of the past was the fact that judges very frequently and very arbitrarily issued injunctions against workers and without the production of evidence to justify such high-handed proceedings. We should not, in this country, set up one set of standards for unions and another for employers. We should not promote Government interference in labor relations.

In many other respects the Taft-Hartley law, which should be repealed, sets labor and management apart and prevents teamwork and cooperation in the field of collective bargaining. There are more than 30 separate procedural items imposed before the union is entitled to ask an employer to grant a union shop. Many of these items present virtual obstacles to collective bargaining. There are about 20,000,000 American employees working under various kinds of union security contracts. It is obvious what a widespread handicap this restrictive legislation presents. If this law is construed to require elections every year, as appears to be the case, the National Labor Relations Board would require not less than 20,000,000 man-hours each year to conduct tens of thousands of elections with respect to union-shop authorization. Under the Wagner Act, with only 7,000 elections a year, even the simplest kind of representation elections were delayed for periods of 6 months or longer.

President William Green of the American Federation of Labor asserted that labor's antagonism to the law at the outset has been intensified by recent developments in the field of labor-management relations which would bear out every charge made against this restrictive and oppressive law. President Green stated that the National Labor Relations Board, a Government agency created to protect the rights of labor, has been perverted by the Taft-Hartley law into a prosecutor of labor unions.

The Taft-Hartley law, according to United States Senator Wayne Morse, Republican of Oregon, a leading liberal, is "a device for making unions so weak they cannot bargain collectively."

We must realize that labor, business, and agriculture are all interdependent and that our whole Nation cannot enjoy stable prosperity unless all groups receive their fair share of the national income. We must establish a decent standard of living as a minimum for every American, and constantly improve the distribution of our production so that all Americans benefit.

Under the Taft-Hartley law the United States Department of Labor has been weakened. This weakening in this Department of the executive branch of the Government has proved a severe blow to the workers. The separation of the Conciliation Service from that Department and a change in its basic conception has alienated the confidence of union members. Furthermore, the Wage and Hour Division has been weakened to a point where it cannot make adequate inspections of the violations of the provisions of that law. We should not stand idly by and permit the lowering of the prestige of a once great department of our Government, devoted to the welfare of the laboring men and women the country over.

An example of the chaos caused by the Taft-Hartley law is the situation of the International Typographical Union, one of the greatest and oldest unions. For 75 years this union and its members had little, if any, trouble with employers, had very few strikes, customarily arbitrated differences, negatiated wage scales, and became known as one of the great democratic trade unions of the world. Yet this situation was entirely disrupted by the Taft-Hartley Act. The union was forbidden to negotiate wage scales, working conditions, and rules in the shop by reason of the Taft-Hartley Act, and strikes resulted in various parts of the Nation. Union printers previously steadily employed walked the streets jobless. Millions of dollars were lost to both employers and employees as a result of this reactionary law.

The Taft-Hartley Act is an antilabor act. This is the judgment of Maurice J. Tobin, Secretary of Labor. The Secretary calls attention in particular to one unfair labor practice written into the law, that management can go into court and get an injunction in 24 hours, whereas in the case of an unfair labor practice by management it would take at least 12 to 18 months to get an injunction under the law.

The Taft-Hartley Act is slanted against labor and makes it extremely difficult to organize those 12 to 15 million unorganized workers in the country, many of whom today work for sweatshop wages, and the law makes it most difficult for labor unions to preserve the gains they have made and for the unorganized to organize.

Now, I want to give you briefly a case that, to my mind, proves that the Taft-Hartley Act is, in fact and in its operation, what labor has said it is, "a slave labor act," a law conceived, designed and intended to break unions, to prevent genuine collective bargaining and to bring back the days of labor relations by arbitrary injunction, company unions, and finally the open shop.

This full course has not been run already for three reasons:

(1) The loyalty of workers to the unions they have formed and the officers they have elected, as proved by the results of NLRB elections which, under the undemocratic provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, require, not a majority of those voting, but a majority of all those eligible to vote, to authorize a union shop.

(2) The fact that we have had substantially full employment resulting from an accumulated demand for goods, with the result that even antiunion employers have often preferred to keep in production rather than use all the weapons provided in the Taft-Hartley Act to weaken and break unions.

(3) Union members have taken the advice of the NLRB and the Supreme Court to seek relief from the Congress—from a new Congress, which they as citizens helped elect—and they have held their lines as members of unions. Let us repeal an act which workingmen and workingwomen believe, and with good reason, is aimed at the very life of their unions and at their own security and the welfare of their families and the Nation.

Let's look at this Pipe Machinery case to which I referred at the beginning of my remarks.

I have here a report of a case taken from page 1510, et seq., from 22 LRRM.

The report quotes this significant language from the October 13, 1948, decision of the National Labor Relations Board:

"The intervenor [International Association of Machinists] asserts that this [the application of sec. 9 (c) (3)] places such hazards upon the right to strike as to make the guarantee of that right in section 13 of the act a nullity. This contention, being directed to the desirability of the amendment contained in secion 9 (c) (3), should be directed to the Congress and not to this Board. As we pointed out in another connection, 'It is our duty to administer the law as written, not to pass upon the wisdom of its provisions.'"

This broad hint—going as far as any administrative agency might go in suggesting appeal to the Congress for relief—was made immediately after the Board had made this admission:

"* * * Section 9 (c) (3) places no limitation upon the right to strike although it may indeed discourage its exercise in some situations by denying the franchise to those strikers who lose their right to reinstatement."

How did the strikers at the Pipe Machinery Co. lose their right to reinstatement?

By the action of the employer, assisted by the Taft-Hartley Act, which allows strikebreakers to vote in NLRB elections while denying the strikers the right to vote.

Perhaps Governor Dewey had this in mind when in his labor speech at Pittsburgh last October 11 he asserted "the right of the worker to quit his job." In other words, under section 9 (c) (3) of the Taft-Hartley Act, it can happen, and it has happened, that if you strike you quit.

The workers at the Pipe Machinery Co. in Cleveland were represented by the International Association of Machinists. After trying for months by peaceful collective bargaining to negotiate a wage increase, they went on strike in February 1947—exercising a right which the Taft-Hartley Act affirms in theory in section 13 but, as the NLRB admits, denies in practice under section 9 (c) (3) as interpreted by the present Board.

The employer then hired strikebreakers and ran them into the plant, which resumed operations May 12, 1947. The strikebreakers thereupon formed an "independent" union and petitioned the NLRB for an election.

Now let's see how the strikebreakers became "permanent employees," how the strikers were held not to be entitled to reinstatement, and how, upon certification of the so-called independent union, the strike itself was transformed from a legal to an illegal strike and subject to injunctive action under section 10 (1) of the Taft-Hartley Act and the bona fide union subject to a damage suit.

I quote from the Board's decision of October 13, 1948:

"The strike began in February 1947 and the plant was closed down. It resumed operations on May 12, 1947. Thereafter it attempted to induce the strikers to return to work. On about June 9, 1947, the employer advised the strikers that if they did not return to work by June 13, new employees would be hired to fill the jobs available. It stated further that, 'Old employees who are returned to work after June 13 will not bump out newly hired employees who have been working prior to the time they ask to be returned to work.' The employer's personnel director testified that all new applicants for employment were informed that if they were hired, they would be hired as permanent and not as temporary employees.

"On August 22, 1947, the employees at work, including the replacements, were informed by the employer's vice president that they were hired as permanent employees and would not be replaced by strikers upon termination of the strike. The same assurances were given on November 17, 1947, by the employer's personnel manager to the employees then working. Of course, unilateral utterance of the word 'permanent' is not in itself determinative; the actual facts in every case must be carefully weighed. * * * Although the employer had a substantial number of applications from qualified applicants on file, only two employees were added to the pay roll between August 24, 1947, and March 7, 1948.

"There is no showing that any of the individuals currently on strike ever made an unconditional application for reinstatement.

"Under all of the above circumstances, we find that the replacement workers were hired as permanent employees, that they are eligible to vote, and that the strikers whom they replaced, as they are not entitled to reinstatement, are not eligible to vote."

Let me read again one sentence from that decision:

"There is no showing that any of the individuals currently on strike ever made an unconditional application for reinstatement."

In plain language, no member of the bona fide union, the International Association of Machinists, ever offered to become a strikebreaker. No union man ever offered to scab on his union brothers.

And yet there are men who will try to tell you that the Taft-Hartley Act is not an antilabor, antiunion, strike-breaking law in purpose and intent, in its provisions and in its application!

I tell you this law is wrong.

It is wrong in its assumption that workers are not loyal members of the unions they have formed and for which they have sacrificed much in order to establish some security on the job, some decency in working conditions, some measure of equality in bargaining power with employers, some measure of equity in the wages they receive. This has been proved by the overwhelming votes in NLRB elections, elections by secret ballot under the supervision of Federal employees of the NLRB. Members of unions again and again have been given votes of confidence and trust and burning loyalty. No one can deny that.

This law is wrong from beginning to end in attempting to substitute litigation for peaceful collective bargaining between workers and employers.

It is wrong in its premises, wrong in its methods and wrong in its results. It should be repealed.

Action for this Congress to take is to return to the Wagner Act, which has right in its premises, right in its purposes, right in its methods. Reenact that fair, just, successful law, with the amendments proposed in H. R. 2032, and we are on the road of progress, contentment, and tranquility.

STATEMENT BY HON. CHESTER C. GORSKI, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK

Although practically all segments of organized labor have demanded the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and all true students of labor relations clearly recognize that this act must be repealed, some of the real evils of the act have not been brought to the attention of the public.

Some of those which have received publicity are as follows:

(1) The section of the act which provides for the conduct of elections to determine whether a majority of the eligible employees desire to authorize their union to enter into a contract with their employer, in which union membership is a condition of continued employment. This provision is covered in section 9 (e) of the act and is commonly known as the union-shop election section. The foes of labor in the enactment of this section apparently believed that there was a major segment of union membership which was dissatisfied with their unions and if given an opportunity would vote against union shop or union-security contracts. The history of the last 2 years has proven them wrong. The records of the National Labor Relations Board show that since the enactment of this act and until September 30, 1948, the Board has conducted 25,999 elections. Of this number, the unions have been successful and the majority of eligible employees have authorized the union to enter into such contracts in 25,378 of all the elections held. Of the votes cast in such elections 2,442,354 American workmen have voted, have shown that they are behind their unions 100 percent in demanding union security as part of their collective-bargaining agreement. Of course, the money and time expended by the Board in conducting these unnecessary elections have resulted in delay and interference with the other important work of the Board. The time and delay caused by the conduct of these elections have also interfered with and delayed collective bargaining in many plants. Certainly no one can argue that we should continue this futile, empty, and time-consuming proceeding which merely harasses and delays labor in seeking its just aims.

(2) Another very controversial part of the act is section 9 (f), (g), and (h) which require officers of labor organizations to file non-Communist affidavits and certain financial statements before they can use the services of the National Labor Relations Board. Certainly this section seems to unduly discriminate against labor unions. Congress in effect has said that before we will give this great segment of our population equal rights under the law, they must have a passport of good conduct. No such requirements exist for employers when they wish to use the Board's services. Labor is not in agreement as to what should be done to this secton. Certain unions have suggested that employers should be required to file similar affidavits, and also swear that they are not members of any Fascist or Nazi or Communist group which advocates overthrow of our form of government. Other unions desire that this entire section be eliminated. Other unions point out that although this section is discriminatory, it has aided in focusing a spotlight on the small number of Communists who had infiltrated into labor unions, and has assisted the non-Communist members of such unions in their effort to clean house. An examination of the record will show that this section has been used to advantage in many situations. Unions which have not been able to purge the fellow travelers and Communists have not been able to use the services of the National Labor Relations Board and have, therefore, been at a great disadvantage when they came in conflict with unions who have filed their affidavits. Communistic-dominated unions cannot be placed on election ballots by the National Labor Relations Board. Consequently, a large number of locals and a tremendous number of individual members of unions, who have not been able to clean their house, have left such communistic unions to join unions which are in compliance with this section and can give to their members the benefits of the National Labor Relations Act and the services of the Board. Certainly in an organizing conflict between a complying and noncomplying union, the advantages all rest with the complying union since the other union cannot even participate in the election. Naturally, different unions will view this section of the law in different lights depending on the problems in their industry. This provision of the act should be amended after all segments of organized labor have had a chance to fully express their views.

The hidden gimmicks in the act—

(3) In amending the Wagner Act, the foes of labor slipped into the Taft-Hartley Act provisions which did not appear to be vicious on their face but were found in practice to be damaging to the cause of labor and to collective bargaining in general. An example of this is the rewording of section 9 (c) as it appeared in the Wagner Act. The new section prohibits the holding or directing of any election where the employer refuses to consent to an election until a full-dress hearing is held and an order issued by the Board. Under the Wagner Act, the Board interpreted section 9 (c) to mean that "prehearing" elections could be held even though the employer did not consent, if no serious questions such as the "appropriate bargaining unit" were involved. In other words, if the employer just refused to consent without any good reason, the Board went ahead and held the election and then conducted the formal hearing after the election was held. Anyone at all familiar with collective bargaining processes knows that the quickest way to kill a union-organizing campaign is by the use of delay and stalling tactics. If the Board must hold a formal hearing and then direct an election, a delay of 2 or 3 months must occur. As this section was rewritten or amended by the Taft-Hartley Act, the Board must hold a hearing before such an election could be directed. This has resulted in a number of disastrous strikes because employers were deliberately delaying the holding of such elections in any attempt to destroy a union before it could obtain legal recognition. An illustration of this occurred at the Goldblatt store located at Broadway and Fillmore, a prominent shopping area in Buffalo. The union requested the employer to agree to a consent election but the employer refused to do so. After the union had signed petitions for an election, the employer fired some of the union leaders and otherwise took advantage of the delay caused by its refusal to consent to an election, to question the employees about the union and to otheriwse attempt to intimidate or coerce the employees to get out of the union. The only course of action open to these employees in their efforts to protect their rights to collective bargaining was to go out on strike. Although the strike continued for some weeks, the employer was adamant in its refusal to consent to any election and finally the employer canceled its lease and moved its store from Buffalo. This loss of business to Buffalo, the loss of jobs to these employees, and the financial loss to the company, could all have been avoided if the Board had been empowered to conduct a prehearing election and resolve the controversy, as it could have done under the Wagner Act.

(4) The Taft-Hartley Act also prohibits the Board from conducting an election if a previous election has been held within 12 months. This prohibition to representation elections applies to section 9 (c) (3) and to union-shop elections, 9 (e) (3). It can be readily seen how much an iron-clad prohibition would work a hardship and destroy employees' rights to collective bargaining in many cases. In effect this section means that if the union is unsuccessful in an election, the employees then are prohibited from receiving the rights of collective bargaining for a 12-month period. This rule holds true even though all of the employees may decide 6 months after the election is held that they want a different union to represent them. Certainly under such circumstances, the orderly processes of the act which were designed to be used in selection of a bargaining representative should not be denied to employees since the only alternative is to strike and to fight it out on the picket line. The purpose of this section is designed to eliminate the causes of labor disputes and under the wording of the section as it was in the Wagner Act, few strikes for recognition occurred. As the section now reads, it promotes strikes for recognition rather than prevents them.

STATEMENT OF HON. VITO MARCANTONIO, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK, ON BEHALF OF THE PROGRESSIVE PARTY

The position of the Progressive Party is that the Taft-Hartley Act must be repealed in its entirety and that the Wagner Act must be restored in its entirety to our statute books if we are to have a sound labor policy in the United States.

The Progressive Party is opposed to the administration bill because it does not realize the objective of restoring the Wagner Act. The administration bill, in our opinion, is a step in the right direction but it contains certain serious amendments to the Wagner Act which, in our view, are undesirable.

1. The Wagner Act was the most important piece of legislation ever enacted in this country.—Under its protection millions of American workers were able to resist the historically antiunion powerful employers' interests in this country and form labor organizations.

With the aid of the Wagner Act, union membership which had fallen from 4,000,000 in 1929 to 3,000,000 in 1933 was enabled by 1937 to reach a high of 7,000,000. By 1939 this figure reached 9,000,000. By 1945, 15,000,000 workers were organized and almost every large open-shop citadel had been leveled.

But the Wagner Act was not merely a benefit to labor and to labor unions by promoting collective bargaining, the Wagner Act enabled union members to restore our country's economy to a healthy level and vastly increased purchasing power.

Workers through their unions made up for many of the wage losses which they had suffered during the depression.

The great gains that working people made under the Wagner Act represented, however, only a small fraction of the ground they had lost since the beginning of the century.

Between 1920 and 1931 the share of the largest 5 percent of nonfinancial corporations in our net income increased from 78 to 87 percent. During the period in which the Wagner Act was in effect this percentage went down to 84 percent and workers, through their unions, achieved a higher share of the national income.

But it is important to bear in mind that only a small percentage of our total labor force enjoyed the benefits of unionism and self-organization under the Wagner Act. This was due to a large number of reasons, but the principal reason was the fact that the powerful employer groups in this country, typified by the NAM and the National Metal Trades Association, maintained a steady fight in the Halls of Congress, in the courts, and in the public press to frustrate the law, to prevent its effective operation, and to encourage employers to evade and destroy it. The story of the fight against the Wagner Act is a story which has been indelibly impressed upon the America of the late thirties. It is the story of strikebreaking, industrial espionage, industrial munitions, company unionism, the black list, and similar practices. A part of that story is reported in the hearings and reports of the La Follette-Thomas committee.

2. The Taft-Hartley Act represents a triumph for those forces who through the years fought in vain to repeal the Wagner Act and to undermine its effective operation.—The Taft-Hartley Act was designed to make it difficult to organize the unorganized workers. Bear in mind that in this country only a fourth of the entire organizable labor force has been organized. This is the lowest percentage of any comparable country on the face of the earth.

A second purpose of the Taft-Hartley Act was to break strikes. Any number of provisions were written into the law such as the provision giving the strike-breakers the right to vote in Labor Board elections, but not strikers. To make it easier for the employers to crush a strike, the law provides for not one but three different and distinct types of injunctions to be used of course primarily against unions. To put it another way, it was the purpose of the Taft-Hartley Act to force workers to take the employers "No" for an answer by stripping them of an effective means to resist.

Third, it was the purpose of the Taft-Hartley Act to destroy the militancy of existing trade-unions, to draw their teeth, to give employers a larger share in the selection of the bargaining agent and the manner of its functioning.

This was done through special concessions to company unions through the affidavit requirements which has as their purpose the dictation by Government of the leadership of labor unions and to various provisions granting employers, directly or indirectly, access to the machinery of the Board. The Taft-Hartley Act was not written in a vacuum. It was intended to place on labor a yoke. The figures show how well its purpose was achieved.

During the period in which the Taft-Hartley Act has been in effect real wages have drastically declined. In contrast, the power of corporate monopoly waxes greater. Corporate profits after taxes increased from 5 billions in 1939 and 10 billions at the peak of the war, in 1943, to 21 billions in 1948.

In addition, the relationship of corporate profits to wages has rapidly deteriorated with an increasing percentage of the national income going to profits and a steadily smaller percentage going to wages.

The slight correction which the Wagner Act had made in this relationship as compared to the ratio which had prevailed immediately prior to the Hoover depression has been completely lost. The Taft-Hartley Act has again made possible the depletion of purchasing power and increase of profits which inevitably spells depression. The Taft-Hartley Act is a depression statute. It must be repealed as one step in an over-all program to avert a threatening depression.

3. The Progressive Party wishes to emphasize its fundamental objections to certain basic provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which form the core of the act, and concerning which compromise means surrender.—(a) The affidavits.—One of these basic provisions is section 9 (h) of the act. This provision denies to labor organizations and their members the facility to act if their officers fail to take an oath of political orthodoxy. This provision is unconstitutional because it deprives labor organizations, their officers and members, of the right of freedom of speech, thought, and assembly in violation of the first amendment.

It requires union officers to hold politically approved views if they are to remain officers. This is thought control in its purest form.

How can we boast of a free government if we refuse to recognize the right of workers and their leaders to determine their beliefs for themselves and to act on their beliefs? In a brief recently filed with the Supreme Court on behalf of the United Steelworkers and Philip Murray, its president, the characterization of this section is as follows:

"A more direct interference with the freedom of union members—freedom of speech, freedom of assembly, and freedom to engage in political activities is hard to imagine."

The brief also makes a point that this section is an unconstitutional interference with the freedom of union officers. The brief says:

"The principal purpose and effect of section 9 (h) is to prevent persons of designated political and economic views from serving as union officers. Thus the statutes strike directly at the freedom of belief, speech, and political activities of union officers. And persons who have exercised these constitutionally protected freedoms in a fashion inacceptable to Congress are, in consequence of their unorthodoxy, denied another right essential to the expression and effectuation of our beliefs—the right, if the membership agrees, to be an officer of a labor union. Thus they are excluded from the very positions in which they might give effective expression to their views—and that, of course, is why they are excluded."

This section has had the effect of inviting complying unions to raid noncomplying unions. This section does more than repress freedom of speech, thought, and assembly. It places in the lap of employers the power of determining who their employees' bargaining agent is to be by the simple device of refusing to deal with the so-called noncomplying union. An employer can throw his weight to another union which may not be the representative of the employees. He knows that in an election the noncomplying union will not appear on the ballot and he will to that extent determine for himself what union he will deal with. This grossly violates the provision of the act which purports to give employees free choice of a bargaining agent. How can there be free choice if one of the candidates is banished from the ballot?

This section also permits a violation indirectly of the ban in the statutes upon employer assistance of labor organizations. In other words, company unions. How can it be claimed that employer assistance is outlawed when by the simple act of refusing to deal with the union the employer may assist a rival organization with impunity in becoming a bargaining agent and thus foisting it upon the employees? Finally, the act fostered division and disruption in the organized labor movement. Complying unions have gained strength not from unorganized workers but from raids upon organizations which have refused to submit to the political restraints employed in section 9 (h).

Injunctions.—The so-called emergency injunction provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act are a danger to a free labor movement. Under these provisions the Government serves as an instrument of the employer in enjoining a strike for a period of 80 days. One does not have to be a labor expert to realize that this means in effect that the Government may force workers in providing industry to labor for the profit of their employers nor does one need to be a labor expert to realize that an 80-day injunction in many strike situations is as destructive as an 80-year injunction.

The plea that the injunctions may be obtained only in an emergency is a sham plea. In not one of the major strikes where injunctions were obtained, such as the longshoremen's strike, or maritime strike, or the coal strike, could it be said that a national paralysis prevailed.

The plea of emergency has always been the handmaiden of repression as the rise of fascism so well illustrates. Today we find a greater and greater resort to arguments of emergency to justify repression. At the moment we talk of cold war "emergency" and on the basis of this type of emergency we justify growing repression in the field of free speech, free press, and free assembly.

We wish to make it clear that we are also opposed to the administration bill because that bill seems to also create the basis for Presidential interference, through injunctions, with the right to strike. Any ambiguity on this score, has been clarified by Attorney General Clark's claim that the administration has the power and intends to exercise the power to obtain injunctions in so-called emergency situations. If we permit the pattern of injunctions to survive we will find that every strike will be designated in a routine manner as an emergency requiring the issuance of a strikebreaking injunction.

Employers' "free speech."—A third point which I think is important to emphasize involves the so-called employers' free-speech provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. One of the lesser known features of the Taft-Hartley Act is the manner in which it has destroyed free industrial elections.

No labor statute can work if the workers are not free in elections to decide for themselves whether they are to have a bargaining agent and what labor organization is to be that bargaining agent. To an increasing extent, powerful employers of this country have taken over the Labor Board election machinery. They have justified this usurpation on the basis of the free-speech provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. These employers do not appear to be troubled by the fact that the employees should be left free to choose their own bargaining agent. "Free speech" has become an employer weapon to alienate employees from labor unions or to influence their choice in favor of one and against another labor organization. Every day that the Taft-Hartley Act is on the books its evils multiply and its repressions become more unbearable to our workers. Speed is essential to wipe the Taft-Hartley Act off our books and to restore the Wagner Act. The modifications in the Wagner Act which the administration has proposed seriously interfere with the right to strike, the right to picket, and to engage in other concerted activity. Neither jurisdictional disputes nor secondary boycotts constitute such a national problem as to justify curtailing the basic rights of working people.

Restoration of the Wagner Act and the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act is imperative in the interest of sound labor relations. It is also imperative in the interest of a healthy economy which is even now being threatened by declining real wages and growing unemployment.

STATEMENT OF HON. JOHN E. FOGARTY, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF RHODE ISLAND

I appear before you today in a dual capacity—as a Member of Congress and as an active member of organized labor. In both capacities I earnestly plead for the immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

As a Member of Congress who ran on the Democratic platform in the last campaign I sincerely hope that we keep faith with the people who returned us to office. That platform was clear-cut in its promise to repeal the act. There has been no doubt of the decision of the people in this matter—not only in my own State of Rhode Island but throughout the entire Nation.

The greatest propaganda movement ever unleashed in this country has tried to sell the infamous Taft-Hartley law as one which would free union members from the shackles imposed upon them by their unscrupulous leaders. Through every medium possible, this falsehood has been repeated and repeated until it has worn thin. As a card-carrying member of organized labor, it gives me a great deal of pleasure to report that this program of falsity has fallen of its own weight. Labor, today, is not the gullible mass of yesteryear. Both individually and collectively it knows the real purpose of this law.

The laboring man knows that the actual intent of the Taft-Hartley law, although unpublicized and unadvertised, is the ultimate destruction of all organized labor. Born in the minds of confirmed labor haters, it was diabolically conceived to eventually relegate labor back to its old position of a commodity with no consideration for its dignity and well-being. That this must not prevail is the confirmed thought of all the American people as evidenced by their solid action in the recent election.

The time for action is now. The subject has been thoroughly discussed and analyzed for the past 2 years. Congress, itself, is guilty of procrastinating at a time when it should be taking affirmative action. There is no need for prolonged hearings or presentations. It is our duty to reflect the wishes of our people and I, for one, want the right to stand on the floor of the House and cast my vote with that thought in mind. In the light of these facts, therefore, I earnestly entreat the members of this committee to report a bill which will immediately repeal the Taft-Hartley law and reinstate the Wagner Act. Only through such action will the laboring force of this great country be assured that we have kept our trust with them.

STATEMENT OF HON. NEIL J. LINEHAN, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

THE CLOSED SHOP—ITS IMPORTANCE TO LABOR

In any discussion of the measure involving organized labor, it is inevitable that the point dwelling on the "closed shop" principle must arise. For this "closed shop" element has become over the years in the evolution of unionization, such a part and parcel, and keystone of union labor stability, that it has not only earned recognition, but further, it has merited its right to continue to exist.

It is human nature to want to have "like accompany like"; so we can easily understand the desire to union members to insist that their fellow workers be union members also, and more than that, that the fellow worker not be employed unless he comes from union ranks. The world today is too overburdened with people addicted to the "hitch-hiking" attitude. The circumstances of a person's employment are largely determined by the status battled for and won by previous employees. A person who comes along after the benefits have been achieved is certainly lacking in judgment who does not seek to maintain them. Thus when a labor union has contended mightily for betterment of hours, wages, and working conditions, is it any wonder that they should ask to have all new employees come from within their own ranks?

Unions are not alone in subscribing to the closed-shop principle; indeed by far the largest group of employers using employees from such ranks, have enjoyed amicable relations and wholehearted cooperation where such relationships were engendered. The employers there do not have the burden of procuring or training the men for specialized work; discipline is established and centralized. Lastly a closer working relationship between employer and employee inures in the industry, which is reflected in the creation of finer goods or services.

The closed shop has only appeared in industries where a preparation period is necessary to fit the workers for efficient discharge of their responsibilities. To cite a few, we might list the electricians, plumbers, bricklayers, printers, and maritime activities, etc. The professions, medical, legal, and dental, all make use of the basic principle set out here, why should not the trades be afforded the equal opportunity?

In concluding I should like to emphasize that where employer and employee would agree on contracts based on the closed-shop principle, in the United States today, they would be accused of breaking the law; yet such conduct is unlawful we declare, not because it is bad in itself, but because it serves the interests of the few who wish to undermine the trade-union movement. By the very fury of the onslaught they manifest in their attacks, these few make clear the cornerstone importance of the closed shop, and its importance to, and safeguarding of, the entire trade-union movement.

STATEMENT BY HON. EDWARD A. GARMATZ, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MARYLAND, IN SUPPORT OF H. R. 985, A BILL TO REPEAL THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

At the beginning of my testimony in support of H. R. 985, a bill to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act, I would like to thank the committee for giving me this opportunity to present my views. I shall try to make a brief statement of my position from a practical legislative viewpoint.

I believe the committee and the Congress are faced with two major problems in handling the Taft-Hartley Act: (1) Whether the Taft-Hartley Act should be repealed; and (2) what procedure should be followed in taking the appropriate legislative action.

REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

As legislators, it is our duty to comply with the mandate of the people whenever there is a clear expression of public opinion. It is my strong belief that the recent election has furnished an adequate opportunity for testing public opinion on this subject. I am not going into the statistics on votes in various districts for the purpose of presenting a statistician's judgment on this question. It is clear from any experienced legislative viewpoint that the issue of the Taft-Hartley Act was before the people both in the Presidential and the congressional elections. The answer given by the people to the question is clear. They want the Taft-Hartley Act repealed, although a measure of reasonable regulation would undoubtedly secure public support. It is my understanding that organized labor recognizes this and has indicated its willingness to go along with reasonable regulation.

I wish to add a word about the effort of certain columnists and newspaper writers to go through all the election figures for the purpose of demonstrating that what happened did not really happen. I believe those efforts, which may be intended for public consumption, sometimes have a tendency to mislead even the authors. In this connection I think it might be well to note that, ex-Congressman Fred A. Hartley Jr., in his book Our New National Labor Policy, stated that:

"After a year, however, a new fact is emerging from the confusion of politics. It is now evident that supporting the new labor law will not react politically against candidates. Actually, it now appears that candidates who voted for the Taft-Hartley Act can take credit for assisting in the development of a sane labor policy for the Nation, and will receive the approval of the electorate for that action" (pp. 131–132).

I do not cite this statement to show that Mr. Hartley's predictions were far from accurate nor do I believe that this committee should be guided in its deliberations by consideration of personal political favor or disfavor. It is the duty of this committee to recommend legislation which will be in the interest of the Nation and of all its component groups. It is also the duty of this committee to take into account the expressed will of the people and, as I have stated previously, I think we have had a clean-cut expression of the public desire to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act.

There is good reason for the expression of the public will. Even management is coming forward now with statements of displeasure with the Taft-Hartley Act. I refer in particular to the recent article in Business Week entitled "The Trend," dated December 18, 1948. The substance of the Business Week article reads as follows:

"What was wrong was that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far. It crossed the narrow line separating a law which aims only to regulate from one which could destroy.

"Given a few million unemployed in America, given an Administration in Washington which was not prounion—and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck the labor movement.

"These are the provisions that could do it: (1) Picketing can be restrained by injunction; (2) employers can petition for a collective-bargaining election; (3) strikers can be held ineligible to vote—while the strike replacements cast the only ballots; and (4) if the outcome of this is a no-union vote, the Government must certify and enforce it.

"Any time there is a surplus labor pool from which an employer can hire at least token strike replacements, these four provisions, linked together, presumably can destroy a union.

"By going that far, the law defeated itself. It was more than a pendulum swing away from the Wagner Act. As a result, not only will the potentially destructive features of the law go, but also some of its constructive aspects will be lost in the reaction."

There are many other specific reasons which can be given to illustrate the main contention that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far but I am sure you will get such detailed evidence from the experts in the labor-law field who will undoubtedly testify before the committee. As I have reviewed the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law and the experiences under it, I have come to the conclusion that the draftsmen of this law tried to do entirely too much. There were problems in the labor-law field which merited consideration by the Congress. The draftsmen, however, went far beyond these problems and took advantage of the opportunity which had been created to impose on American labor and management a most detailed system of regulation which was thoroughly inconsistent with our free-enterprise system. I have been told by many of my constituents that persons subject to the law, both on the labor and management sides, who were conscientiously interested in operating in a manner which would not violate the law, found themselves thoroughly enmeshed in legal entanglements. They could not handle even the simpler matters of day-to-day labor relationships without consulting legal counsel who, in turn, were at a loss to render definite opinions because of the intricacies and complexities of the legislation.

It has also come to my attention that the draftsmen formulated an extremely complicated legislative history of the act which has further increased its complexities. I believe that any experienced legislator who reads the conference report carefully will see what I mean. There are many references to sections of the act and previous cases decided by the Board and the courts which would have an undoubted effect on interpretations of provisions of the statute. Actually it is not possible to understand the statute without having a thorough knowledge of its complicated legislative history. As an illustration of this point, I refer to the provision of the Taft-Hartley Act relating to the "preponderance of testimony" rule. There is an interesting article in the August 1947 issue of the American Bar Association Journal written by the counsel of the Chrysler Corp. which gives an explanation of this technical subject. A point which is even of greater interest than the technicalities of this matter is the conclusion of this gentleman who, according to the journal, is charged with some responsibility for the drafting of the act, that the technical procedural provisions of the law are perhaps of "greater general importance" than any other provision of this law.

As we all know, President Truman, in his speech supporting a veto, charged that the Taft-Hartley Act was much harsher than the public had any idea. This charge has now been confirmed by the admission of Mr. Hartley in his book. I am attaching an excerpt from pages 75 to 77 of his book which sets forth his position on the matter. I want to call your special attention to that paragraph in which he states as follows:

"We had to create the general impression that most of the original Hartley bill had been discarded by the conferees in favor of the so-called milder provisions of Taft's bill."

PROCEDURE TO REPEAL THE TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

I strongly urge that the Congress make a complete departure from the legislative practices which surrounded the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law. I believe we should be open and forthright and that we should place all the cards on the table. There is no need for secrecy or complicated maneuvers. Certainly we want the public to know exactly what is being legislated.

It seems to me that the only effective way of handling the problem is to return the legislative situation to where it was before the Taft-Hartley Act became law even though reasonable amendments to the Wagner Act may be advisable. Such objective cannot be accomplished by trying to amend the Taft-Hartley Act. The complexities of this law are such that no expert could give any guaranty as to what is being left in the law and what is being taken out. Certainly the public would not be able to follow our discussions on the subject. A return of the law to the situation which existed prior to June 23, 1947, will permit us all to know exactly where we stand.

After such action has been taken we could then legislate intelligently on the few subjects which require attention. That is the reason why my bill proposes a repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and reenactment of the Wagner Act. The question of amendments can then be taken up and given proper consideration. Such procedure will have an additional advantage of eliminating the confusion which now exists for the responsible leaders of labor and management. At the present time the Taft-Hartley Act, although completely discredited by the election, is still on the books. With the imminent prospect of repeal, however, the affected parties are unable to plan their relationships on a firm foundation. They do not know whether to proceed on the assumption that the Taft-Hartley Act will be the law or whether to proceed on the opposite assumption. As the result, it is most difficult for them to handle the collective-bargaining relationships. Quick action of repeal would eliminate this confusion.

It may be urged that we cannot take the risk of removing the Taft-Hartley Act from the books before a substitute bill has been enacted into law but I do not share this view personally. It seems to me that the Nation did not founder during the many years when the Wagner Act was on the books and that we could return to that situation for the short period required to enact reasonable amendments to that act.

[Excerpt from Mr. Hartley's book, Our New National Labor Policy]

"The conference on the measure went on for three busy weeks.

"The Senate passed its version of H. R. 3020, my bill, on May 13. Three weeks later, on June 3, I reported the combined Taft-Hartley bill to the House of Representatives.

"Our strategy at that time was so simple as to be almost transparent.

"We had to retain as much of the House measure as we could without jeopardizing the final two-thirds majority in the Senate.

"As the situation developed, the conference became a battle of nerves, and more than that, a battle of public relations.

"We had to create the general impression that most of the original Hartley bill had been discarded by the conferees in favor of the so-called milder provisions of Taft's bill.

"The press of the country did an excellent job in presenting the major differences between the two measures. In contrasting the two versions an impression had been created that the Senate bill was weak, confused, and inadequate. More than one Member of the House was to approach me during the 3 weeks of conference and urge that I insist on particular provisions of the House bill 'at all costs.' Other Members took almost opposite views.

"Senator Taft was well aware of the sensitive nature of the situation in the Senate. I am convinced, as was Senator Taft at the time, that many Senators who supported the conference measure were still on the fence during the later conference and could easily have been lost to the opposition.

"The House of Representatives was proud of the Hartley bill. Its major provisions had been considered many times and represented the results of many years of effort. While I did not have the same problem as Senator Taft, it was necessary that I consider the desires of the great House majority in favor of the Hartley bill. Too many concessions to the Senate would have reduced the margin of approval for the conference bill in the House, possibly not below the two-thirds margin, but sufficiently to affect the legislative sentiment then prevalent on the Hill.

"What I wanted, and succeeded in getting, was to record ever-increasing majorities in the House as a means of encouraging our cosponsors in the Senate.

"Anticipating a certain amount of criticism when I took the conference bill to the House floor, I opened the conference session by publicly announcing that I intended to make certain concessions at once.

"This was an unusual step.

"Conference managers for the two Houses usually maintain stoutly that their versions of legislation are the better, and that they must insist on every provision approved by their respective bodies.

"The Taft-Hartley bill required unusual treatment.

"Too many weeks and months of effort by too many people had gone into its creation for the personal feelings of any of us to be considered.

"The recorded vote in the Senate against industry-wide bargaining prohibitions certainly dictated my course in this respect. Similarly, the Senate had shown clearly that it wanted no part in restoring the rights of private injunction in labor disputes. It was obvious to me that two-thirds of the Senate had no intention of approving a measure conaining those particular provisions, for this would have required many Senators to reverse announced positions. Such reversals are not easy.

"Consequently, even before the conference opened I announced that the House would not insist on the provisions banning industry-wide bargaining, nor the right of private injunctions against labor abuse.

"Criticism was immediate.

"I was pictured as abandoning the most essential sections of the House bill, and as succumbing to labor union pressures.

"Such criticism was all right with me.

"First. I had conceded nothing that wasn't already lost.

"Second. It contributed to the public impression that the seemingly milder Senate bill would determine the general outlines of the final bill.

"Third. It gave my critics time to cool off before the conference bill was to come up for its House vote.

"Since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act I have had no opportunity to discuss the conference measure and to point out how much of the House bill was retained in the act, in spite of the general impression to the contrary.

"The facts are that the Hartley bill set the general outlines of the final Taft-Hartley Act, established its scope, and dictated the final provisions in a majority of instances" (pp. 75–77).

STATEMENT BY HON. JAMES V. BUCKLEY, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF ILLINOIS

The people in America today are interested in what we as duly elected representatives in the Congress of the United States are doing. One of the most important pieces of legislation ever to come before this Congress, or any other Congress, is the bill now before a committee to replace and repeal the Taft-Hartley Act. This is one of the most important matters facing Congress today. Our entire society is connected to and will be benefited by the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. Society today senses the responsibility of good social relationships between labor annd management. The mandate of the people in the last election is evidence of their growing sense of responsibility toward the mutual problems which face labor and management today.

"A lasting national labor policy," says Secretary of Labor Tobin, "can be founded only upon understanding and justice." In order to give sense and understanding to Secretary Tobin's statement, it is necessary to restore the sound, practical, and efficient working machinery of the Wagner Act of 1935. It is the goal in this country to bring about harmonious relationships between labor and management. This can only be done by encouraging collective bargaining, and ultimately and finally, through cooperation between labor and management, which will in turn bring about peaceful relationships. This can only be done by repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. The differences between labor and management do not arise because of labor's desire to take over the job of running industry, but labor desires only an efficient management with the right of collective bargaining reserved to themselves by which they may receive the just deserts of their efforts.

Even employers and powerful industrial interests opposed the Taft-Hartley Act, and many employers refused to obey it. Labor has a right to work shoulder to shoulder with each other and to carry on relationships with management without being fettered or enslaved in any way or manner by legislation which causes or tends to cause dissension or growing unrest between labor and management. The Wagner Act was founded upon the principles that the average workman in the United States could not adequately protect himself when dealing with large powerful employers individually with respect to wages, number of hours per week to be worked, length of employment, and other conditions of employment incidental thereto. The Wagner Act was predicated upon the thesis that men would find greater freedom and security in their relationships with management if they dealt collectively with the employers by and through unions of their own choosing. The Wagner Act recognized the fact that the main reason unions were weak in the great mass production industries of the country was because most workmen were afraid to join them in fear that they would lose their place of employment. It was a common practice for years prior to 1933 for many employers to impose upon their employees the "yellow-dog contract." Under this kind of a contract, workmen were given jobs only on condition that they would not join a union or talk with union organizers. At that time, men signed these contracts because they had no alternative. They needed money badly to support their families, and rather than let their families starve, they were forced to work under these conditions. The Wagner Act attempted to remedy this. It said that it was an unfair labor practice for an employer to discriminate or discharge a worker because of his active participation or membership in a labor union. The Wagner Act further provided that if a majority of the workers chose a certain union to represent them after holding a free and fair election, that it was then the duty of management to sit down with the chosen and duly elected representatives of the workmen and bargain collectively with them, and attempt at all times by negotiation to reach an agreement. Under the Wagner Act the employers were left free to reject any and all of the unions' terms; it merely provided for negotiation to take place.

The repeal of the Taft-Hartley law is, in my opinion, as I said before, one of the most vital questions before the Congress today, because the voters in this last election were asked to choose between the principles embodied in the Wagner Act of 1935 and those of the Taft-Hartley law passed by the Eightieth Congress in 1947, and as you will remember in practically every contest in which this was an issue, the voters chose the Wagner Act and rejected the Taft-Hartley law. We who believe that elections are basic guides of public policies are trying to carry out the people's will. We are trying to do so in the face of attempts in some quarters to so confuse the voters with distinctions and technicalities that they will be unable to see what is at stake in the present Senate hearings on this labor bill. The Wagner Act gave the laboring man the right to collective bargaining, and the Taft-Hartley law upon its passage abolished those rights, depriving labor of all of its gains for the past 16 years. The Taft-Hartley law as it now stands, forbids the so-called closed shop, even though the workers want it and the employers are willing to accept. It prevents the workers from even asking for the union shop unless they had won an election permitting them to do so. The Taft-Hartley law has made it possible for employers to break unions and destroy collective bargaining. The Taft-Hartley law by outlawing all forms of secondary boycots, compells members of a union to work on struck goods coming from or destined for another plant where employees are on strike. The Taft-Hartley law also makes unions liable financially for the acts of their so-called agents, even though a union has never approved or ratified the acts in question. These are only a few of the crucial weaknesses of the Taft-Hartley law. In addition, it lays down such a series of legal requirements and prohibitions that it is impossible to determine just what the legal rights and duties of unions actually are.

Labor is entitled to and must have its full share of the profits and progress of industry. This is a system that has made America great. It is the only system which will keep us a progressive people. The unjust crippling of labor with such a law as the Taft-Hartley law retards the onward march of America.

I, as a Member of the Eighty-first Congress, am in favor of and will vote for the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley law.

STATEMENT BY HON. W. M. (DON.) WHEELER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF GEORGIA

Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for me to appear before your subcommittee to present my views on the important labor-management relations legislation now under consideration. Since this legislation has a definite effect and impact upon every man, woman, and child in the United States, I feel that it is my duty to make my views on this subject known to the committee.

It is extremely doubtful if there has ever been a perfect law enacted. No law will please everyone. However, it is up to Congress to enact a labor-management relations law that will be as perfect as human intelligence, understanding, and experience can create. It must be fair and equitable to both labor and management. If either side is given rights under this law, then it must be given the responsibility which must necessarily accompany those rights.

The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 probably isn't a perfect law, however, it is my personal opinion and observation that the basic provisions of this law are very sound, are in the best interests of the general public welfare and should certainly be incorporated into any labor-management relations legislation that wil lbe reported out by the House Committee on Education and Labor. These basic provisions are as follows:

(1) The guarantee of a union's right to strike except in strikes that would affect the health and security of the general public. It should be recognized that the strike is the only weapon a union has against the resources of management in securing an equitable work contract for its members. This right to strike should be guarded jealously and used wisely by those possessing the right to strike. However, it is my sincere conviction that the health, security, and general welfare of the public is paramount to any individual or group interest and that no union or any other group should have the right to endanger the public health or security by a strike or any other method. Therefore, it is imperative that the Government have the authority to intervene and take what steps may be necessary to provide sufficient protection for the health and security of the general public.

(2) In order to use the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board, the officers of unions must file an affidavit stating that they are not members of the Communist Party nor a party that believes in the overthrow of the United States Government. I personally don't see how any American could object to signing a statement that he is not a Communist. I had to sign such a statement and every other Government employee has to do the same. To me, it is a privilege and a pleasure to sign a statement proclaiming my loyalty to my native country. It seems that union officials should equally be delighted to express their loyalty to their Government. In order to make the law more fair and equitable, I suggest that this provision be expanded to require that the employer also be required to sign a statement that he is not a Communist or a Fascist. This suggested change should meet most union objections in this section.

(3) Jurisdictional strikes should continue to be outlawed. I can see no earthly reason why an innocent employer should be penalized simply because two unions can't get together peacefully and decide which union is to do a certain job in the employer's place of business. Mr. William Green, president of the American Federation of Labor and one of the great labor leaders of our time, couldn't justify jurisdictional strikes when he was before this committee 2 years ago.

(4) Secondary boycotts should continue to be outlawed. It is inherently unfair for a third party, not a party to the principal dispute, to be injured by the action of a union on strike for recognition or economic reasons.

(5) Management should not be compelled to bargain with supervisory employees. It is an old and fundamental axiom of law which states, "no man can serve two masters." It is readily seen that foremen or other supervisory employees cannot enforce company rules and regulations among employees and at the same time represent them at the bargaining table. Foremen are the lowest echelon of management and are in direct contact with the employees. It is absolutely necessary that management have the loyalty and integrity of the supervisory employees at all times in order to maintain efficient operations and morale.

(6) The union-shop-provision must be continued. The present law allows an employee to exercise his own personal discretion as to whether or not he wishes to join the union. It is his right as an American citizen to refrain from joining a union if he thinks it is in his best interests not to join. The closed shop of the Wagner Act did not respect this right of the employee. Joining a union should not be a prerequisite to allowing a man to go to work. Experience has shown that in many cases the closed shop has been used to interfere with political freedom, to suppress criticism of union activities, and to punish because of personal dislikes of union officials. Under the union-shop provision the worker is entitled to join the union upon payment of the regular initiation fees and dues as provided by the union constitution and he cannot be expelled from the union except for failing to pay his dues. I believe that this latter provision should be changed to allow expulsion from the union when it has been proven that the union member is a member of the Communist Party or other subversive organization. A member so expelled should have the protection of a review by a court or impartial board.

(7) Both labor and management should be obligated to bargain in good faith. To provide that one side be obligated to bargain in good faith and exempt the other is manifestly unfair. Both sides should have equal duties and obligations to settle their dispute at the bargaining table. The Wagner Act made it an unfair practice for management to refuse to bargain but imposed no such obligation on the union. Since it takes two sides to make a bargain, it is essential that both sides have the same duties and legal obligations.

(8) Both labor and management should have the right of free speech among the employees.

It is not a condition of slave labor for management to present its side of the case to its employees. The term "free speech," however, should not be confused with coercion and intimidation and any coercive or threatening action on the part of either labor or management should not be allowed.

(9) Both labor and management should live up to their contracts and should be responsible for any breaches of their contracts.

Since a work contract represents the meeting of the minds of the union members and management and conveys in writing the working conditions, hours, rate of pay, etc., it is an important instrument and one on which both sides should be able to rely with the utmost confidence. If a breach of the contract should result in injury to one of the parties to the contract, then that party should have the right to redress and damages. The present law simply makes the union equally responsible with management for living up to the terms of its contract agreements.

It is impossible for me in this short time to go into the details of the present law and I have, out of necessity, confined myself to the points of the problem now under consideration which I think are outstanding. I would like to point out that President Truman, himself, in his last State of the Union message, asked that jurisdictional strikes, secondary boycotts, and strikes affecting the public health or interests be prohibited in any labor-management legislation enacted by the Eighty-first Congress.

In doing so he recognized the fact that there are some labor practices permitted by the Wagner Act which are not conducive to the best labor-management relations.

It is my earnest belief that the Government should do everything it can to encourege collective bargaining between unions and management because there are few problems that can't be worked out around the bargaining table provided both sides are sincere in their efforts. This country needs strong labor unions and it needs good, strong, healthy management, for both are essential to our continued economic prosperity. The purpose of any labor-management relations legislation should be to prevent unfair actions by either side and to insure that neither labor nor management shall be given any arbitrary advantage over the other in its fight for economic survival.

In conclusion, I earnestly request that the committee consider carefully the points I have outlined above when reporting out a new Labor-Management Relations Act.

STATEMENT BY HON. J. FRANK WILSON, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF TEXAS

I want to take this opportunity to enter in the record of the hearings held by the House Subcommittee on Education and Labor my views on labor-management relations. My views are well known to the people of my district as I ran and was elected to the Congress of the United States on a platform which contained a six-point labor program many of which points are included in the Labor Relations Act of 1947 for which I voted.

I am a friend of the laboring man. I shall always defend his right to strike and his right to bargain collectively, which collective-bargaining contracts must be equally honored by labor as well as management.

I shall always defend the right of the American laboring man to work for the employer of his choice without fear of intimidation and without tribute to anyone.

I believe that the rights of the laboring man should be protected in that he should not be compelled to join a union in order to obtain employment and that an employer should be able to hire the necessary skilled workers and not be forced to employ those workers only who belong to a particular union.

Labor laws should not only protect the employee against unfair practices by either unions and management but employers and employees alike should be allowed freedom in the expression of their viewpoints and thoughts on employee relations problems to the end that some workable and beneficial plan can be evolved in the best interests of all concerned.

The President of the United States should have the right under law to protect the health and safety of the Nation by delaying through a court of law any strike which would cause a national emergency jeopardizing the general welfare of our country.

Under existing law, companies are required to make appropriate reports to owners and to the Government and it is only reasonable and fair to require under law that unions make appropriate reports to members and to the Government.

Union contributions to political campaigns must be limited in the same way that contributions by corporations are limited. The stockholders of a corporation deserve protection from flagrant misuse of their money and by law the American workingman should be protected from flagrant misuse of his hard-earned union dues. The American workingman deserves this greatly needed protection at least as much as do the Nation's stockholders.

Unions should be made to incorporate so that they can be held equally responsible for violations of contracts and other illegal acts. Equal rights demand equal responsibility and we cannot advance any further industrially if complete responsibility in all contracts rests entirely on one side.

Combinations of unions should be subject to the antitrust laws just like other combinations of businesses. I say that we can never have permanent industrial security in this country as long as laws permit the power of any individual or individuals to paralyze the Nation's industry on their own initiative and the only way to avoid this threat is to have unions as well as corporations made subject to the Federal antitrust laws.

Jurisdictional strikes, secondary boycotts, and "feather bedding" should be made illegal and prohibited forever by law.

It is my belief that union officials as well as company officials should be required to swear that they were not Communists or Fascists or members of any party or organization which aids or plans to overthrow the United States Government by force or violence.

It would be difficult for foremen and other supervisors, who are responsible to management as well as to the workers under them, to properly perform their duties to all if they are permitted to have unions of their own, and, therefore, I am opposed to allowing bargaining for supervisors by unions.

When a worker is out on an economic strike, one not involving any unfair labor practice, and he is replaced by another worker, it would hardly be practicable for the worker who is out on strike to be permitted to vote in an election to determine what union will represent the workers.

As I stated above, I voted for the Labor Relations Act of 1947, the so-called Taft-Hartley law, and I also voted to override the President's veto as did a large majority of the Members of Congress. I have carefully watched the operation of this law since its enactment and I believe it has worked well and that labor-management relations in this country have been at their best since its enactment. It may be that after several years some minor amendments may be necessary. If so, I would give such amendments fair and impartial consideration in the light of the facts and if I believed such revisions necessary, I would not hesitate to vote for them.

In my opinion, the Labor Relations Act of 1947 is in the best interests of the laboring man as well as the general public welfare and believing this, I cannot vote for its repeal or for the presently proposed labor legislation reported by the Committee on Education and Labor to the House of Representatives for passage.

STATEMENT OF HON. THOMAS J. LANE, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF MASSACHUSETTS, IN SUPPORT OF H. R. 2032

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I want to go on record as favoring H. R. 2032, which is a bill to repeal the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, to reenact the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, and for other purposes.

The climate most favorable to the real settlement of industrial disputes is one in which labor and management work out a compromise without interference.

This is the voluntary, mature, and responsible way, free from the heavy hand of Government.

Someday we shall have to define the limits of Government before it becomes the lord and master of all our actions and perhaps of our thoughts. We shall have to stress and encourage those voluntary groupings by which people compose their differences in order to forestall the encroachments of a Government that just grows and grows until it chokes out all freedom of compact.

A true constitution has its roots in the people, developing from their traditions and customs as they, through experience, have evolved practical ways of adjusting differences.

From this common law has come the written law of our statute books. This is the process of social organization—at least it is so, or intended to be so—in a democracy.

In a totalitarian state, by way of contrast, a constitution is imposed from above. There are forced solutions, accepted for the moment because there is no alternative.

Behind the lip service to arbitrary law, there is discontent. The people have not participated in the making of such law. It is not representative of them.

In the present discussion concerning the formulation of a labor-management relations act which will help the two principal parties of an industrial dispute to reach an understanding, a third consideration—that of the public interest—has been injected.

Neither management nor labor is without conscience. From their experience of the past 20 years, both have learned that one cannot have progress without the other, and that one cannot prosper at the expense of the other. And the good will of the public is important to both.

In our efforts as one nation to find basic security for all our people without sacrifice of our fundamental liberties we are adopting a voluntary form of collective bargaining.

To cry "havoc" at this statement is only to deceive ourselves.

Look at the various economic controls exercised by our Government today, and authorized by a Congress representative of the people.

Consider the range and meaning of the social-security program which will in our time embrace every American. To have mentioned such a possibility 25 years ago would have been considered as heresy and would have raised doubts concerning the sanity of the individual who dared to suggest such a revolutionary step.

Today it is regarded as a necessity. Both major political parties are pledged to increase the coverage and the benefits of old-age insurance and assistance.

Take another pressing problem, that of national health. It was not so long ago that the medical profession opposed voluntary health insurance. Now they warmly advocate such group cooperation to head off compulsory health insurance and Government control.

With these examples before us, we should go slowly on legislation which would lead to the compulsory arbitration of industrial disputes: If government should acquire too much power in the determination of such problems, the freedom of management and labor to negotiate would be restricted, if not eliminated. Government would be the sole judge, and we would be on the road toward the all-powerful state.

I contend that the Taft-Hartley Act is a step in that direction. I am going to vote for its repeal. My present concern is that it may be repealed by name, but that its substance may be retained in another bill which purports to be a new and different bill, but which is only a rephrasing of Taft-Hartley, couched in disarming language.

There is no basis for the argument that the Federal Government should intervene to stop a local strike by the exercise of arbitrary power. For work stoppages which constitute a national emergency, under the Taft-Hartley law, the President, after studying the report of a fact-finding board, can direct that the Government seek an injunction to block a strike, or decide against that course.

The injunction can stay in effect up to 80 days. It occurs to me that this is a one-sided restriction on labor, depriving it completely of its only recourse. There is no equivalent or balancing compulsion exerted against management.

Seeing the cards thus stacked against labor, it is likely that management, in some instances, will take advantage of it. Just by sitting tight and going through the motions of the bargaining process they can defeat labor.

When it happens once, there is injustice. When it happes several times, the whole process of collective bargaining breaks down.

Under such circumstances, the Government abandons its role of conciliator and, in effect, sides with management. Even before a dispute arises, Government says that it will bear down on labor singly and exclusively by enjoining labor's right to strike. There is no thought or expectancy of management going on strike. The provision concerning injunctions is therefore aimed at labor and labor alone.

Collective bargainng has no chance to function in such a prejudiced atmosphere.

It is a retreat from the development of that industrial democracy which is necessary if our way of life is to survive.

I maintain that we should encourage the collective-bargaining process, with a minimum of Government interference, because this is consistent with the American tradition of individual and group responsibility.

By bringing labor and management together around the conference table, mutual suspicions tend to dissolve and old habits of thought are reexamined in the light of mutual interest. No longer is management solely concerned with the welfare of the enterprise. In turn, the horizons of union leadership have widened. Both are beginning to sense that they are partners in the business. Most unions now understand that the security of their members depends upon the welfare of the business. The action of the garment workers in deciding not to seek another wage increase, is a case in point.

They realize that, under present conditions, such a move would weaken the competitive position of the clothing industry and result in unemployment.

Some management representatives believe in the continuance of management prerogatives. Others take a static view and prefer to maintain the present set-up. There are many others, however, who understand the fluid character of the collective-bargaining idea.

It is a living organism which must grow and mature to prove that democracy can make the necessary social and economic adjustments to a developing technology without reducing mankind to a machine-like existence as pawns of an all-enveloping state.

They have faith that collective bargaining will survive the passing uncertainties of its growth and develop to the point where trade unions play an increasingly important part in areas which are presently considered as the exclusive province of management.

Instances of union-management cooperation in matters relating to the advancement or survival of the enterprise in which both have a real interest have not been given the recognition they deserve.

I refer to the 500 companies which have adopted the multiple-management experiment, or the setting up of three subordinate boards of directors, one apiece for junior executives, factory workers, and sales.

Ideas agreed upon unanimously by the junior boards have to be given serious consideration by the regular board. Management gets its problems across to the workers. The workers' problems, in turn, reach the management quickly, dissolving the artificial tensions of the past where management and labor were regarded as natural antagonists, instead of partners both necessary to the success of the enterprise.

I also refer to those occasions where clothing workers' union have made financial loans to enterprises which were in difficult straits.

It is the voluntary nature of collective bargaining which develops the favorable climate of gradual understanding and cooperation without interference from a third party.

It is unfortunate that the many cases which prove this have not been given as much publicity as those instances where the parties have failed to reach an understanding.

We are fully informed concerning the sensational divorces in this country, but we are not given the positive and constructive story of the millions of marriages which are succeeding.

By way of analogy, I contend that the major and responsible virtue of the collective-bargainng process is that it provides an opportunity for the private parties immediately concerned to work out their own answers to their mutual problems.

The postwar hysteria engendered by strikes obscures the fact that the mass of union membership is a major element of the consuming public, and overlooks the concern for the broad aspects of national welfare which is to be found in the conduct of collective-bargaining negotiations and in the legislative programs put forward and diligently supported by the CIO and the AFL.

It is significant that the conduct of many negotiations has reflected public pressures. There is increasing evidence that management and labor consider the effects of their actions upon the public.

The Taft-Hartley law was brought about through the tendency of the public to place the burden for more responsible action on the unions rather than management.

To counter this, the unions conducted a broad information program, designed to correct the imbalance. It is safe to say that this changed the composition of Congress to the extent that the Taft-Hartley law is now up for repeal.

The administration bill seeks to eliminate many of its provisions, including:

The ban on the closed shop.

The right of employees to refrain from union activities and be free from union coercion.

The ban on strikes by Federal employees.

The provision relieving employers of a duty to bargain concerning foremen.

The powers of the Labor Board's general counsel to have sole charge of the investigation and prosecution of cases and to seek injunctions in unfair labor practice cases.

The non-Communist provision requiring union officers to file affidavits for access to the Labor Board.

The ban on union political spending.

And the requirement for unions to bargain in good faith.

Steps for dealing with "national emergency" strikes affecting the public welfare, under the administration bill, provide that:

1. The President would issue a proclamation saying the public interest is affected by a dispute, and asking that there be no work stoppage.

2. The President would appoint an emergency board to investigate. The Board would report its findings and recommendations in 25 days. The disputants would be asked to refrain from a work stoppage another 5 days.

3. The Government would rely on acceptance of these recommendations. There is no provision in the bill for forcing acceptance of, or for a court injunction to block a strike.

This is in line with the Wagner Act, which should be restored, an act which, in the words of Leon Keyserling, and I quote: "was pointed toward more than strengthening labor or bettering its economic position. It was founded on the proposition that the whole economy would prosper through a better distribution of the Nation's goods. It also evaluated collective bargaining as an essential attribute of a free society and as they only alternative to an intensely centralized economy in the modern industrial state."

The Wagner Act was a simple law which restricted Government intervention to a minimum. The Taft-Hartley Act covers the whole field and pushes Government right into the middle of the collective-bargaining process, where it doesn't belong.

This is dangerous. It weakens that voluntary quality without which there cannot be collective bargaining in the democratic sense of the word.

The Taft-Hartley Act, by prohibiting the closed shop, by dictating the provisions of a union shop, and by the limitation of health and welfare provisions, is an attempt to undermine progress by those who believe in feudalism.

The extensive use of injunctions, employed so often in the past to crush the labor-union movement, has the effect of giving to the National Labor Relations Board and the courts, a decisive role in the collective-bargaining process.

It must be repudiated by repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and by reenactment of the Wagner Act.

Responsive only to public opinion, labor and management need the opportunity to work out the collective-bargaining experiment to its full realization. Through this they will fashion a free people's solution to the modern industrial problems which Fascists and Communists would solve with iron controls.

The issue is not one of labor versus management.

The issue is freedom or dictatorship, with labor, management, and the public working for the American way.

STATEMENT BY HON. LOUIS B. HELLER, A REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE STATE OF NEW YORK, URGING OUTRIGHT REPEAL OF THE TAFT-HARTLEY LAW

The encouragement and promotion of genuine and free collective bargaining should be the primary objective in the formulation of a national labor policy. Mutually satisfactory bargaining arrangements are indispensable to the attainment and maintenance of an era of industrial peace. With these objectives in mind, it is my considered opinion after carefully considering the subject of employer-employee relations that the Taft-Hartley Act of 1947 should be repealed for the following reasons:

(1) The Taft-Hartley Act's ban on the closed shop has resulted in the outlawing of collective-bargaining agreements which had been mutually beneficial to both labor and management and had assisted in the maintenance of industrial peace for a period of over 100 years. We are all aware of the bitter controversy involving the International Typographical Union, which had a long history of peaceful labor relations prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act. The act has also disrupted the hiring halls which had been established by collective bargaining and had stabilized industrial relations in the maritime industry. At the time the act was passed more than 11,000,000 workers were covered by union security agreements. Not only was the closed shop outlawed, but restrictions were put upon union-shop agreements. The procedure under the Taft-Hartley law requiring the National Labor Relations Board to hold elections among employees before authorizing the consummation of union-shop agreements has proved very costly to the Government and useless. The elections have merely demonstrated the overwhelming preference of workers for this form of security. In about 97 percent of such elections the workers chose a union shop. Proponents of this section, who devised it as a method of harassing unions, have found to their chagrin that it actually resulted in a large favorable vote for the union shop. By providing for numerous elections—representation, union shop, employer's last offer—the Taft-Hartley Act keeps the relation between employers and unions in an unsettled condition, instead of on the basis of stability and confidence so necessary in assuring free collective bargaining.

(2) The Taft-Hartley Act completely outlaws peaceful picketing in many situations, even such types as have enjoyed protection of our courts for several decades. Thus, employees who picket an employer because he persists in making them work on partially finished goods produced in another plant at sweatshop wages may be found guilty of the unfair labor practice of engaging in an unlawful secondary boycott.

(3) The Taft-Hartley Act places unreasonable restraints on many aspects of collective-bargaining agreements. The check-off—a legitimate labor-management practice—has been surrounded with many unnecessary procedural requirements, violation of which carries a criminal penalty, to the detriment of harmonious relations between labor and management. The law removes from the area of free collective bargaining a subject which is a proper objective of workers—welfare funds established for the humanitarian purpose of protecting the health and security of employees. It is made a crime for employers and employees to establish such funds except under rigid rules limiting their purposes and methods of administration. Furthermore, violations may be enjoined without regard to the Clayton Act and the Norris-LaGuardia Act safeguards.

(4) Under the Taft-Hartley Act, State labor laws which contain more restrictive provisions governing union-security contracts supersede the National Labor Act. A recent line of Supreme Court cases upholding restrictive State labor laws clearly indicates that no national labor policy can be effectively administered under such circumstances. Even union shops are banned in some industries engaged in interstate commerce.

(5) The Taft-Hartley Act places special emphasis on the use of injunctions to settle labor disputes. The Board, for example, is under a mandatory duty to seek injunctions against unions in all cases involving secondary boycotts, including those for perfectly legitimate objectives, such as the protection of labor standards. In no case is it mandatory that the Board seek injunctions against employers. The increasing use of the injunction as a method of handling labor relations has aroused only hatred, suspicion, and resentment on the part of the workers and has not furthered either the interests of management or labor. The evils of the labor injunction are well known and were recognized by the Congress in the Norris-LaGuardia Act.

(6) The Taft-Hartley Act provides elaborate and inflexible procedures including boards of inquiry, an 80-day waiting period, enforced by injunction, and secret ballots which must be followed in emergency disputes. Nevertheless, as the President said in his veto message, he and his officers are deprived of their power to take effective action in securing peaceful settlement of such disputes. For example, even the boards of inquiry are deprived of authority to make recommendations for settling the dispute. In the atomic energy and longshore cases these procedures were unavailing and agreements between the parties were reached with the assistance of Government conciliation, only after the machinery provided by the law had ineffectively run its course.

(7) The Taft-Hartley Act's broad ban upon political contributions and expenditures by labor organizations is unfair and undemocratic. It is discriminatory legislation because it selects labor organizations as the only type of voluntary associations which are to be denied effective political participation.

(8) Under the Taft-Hartley Act the employer can, by petitioning for a choice of collective-bargaining representative, determine the time most advantageous for himself to call for an election, even when not faced with conflicting claims for recognition. An employer can thereby stifle and thwart organization efforts and assure a year's freedom from union organization.

(9) One of the most serious consequences of the law is the denial, not only of the right of reinstatement, as under the Wagner Act, but also of the right to vote in representation elections while granting a vote to strike-breaker replacements. The law thus permits an employer who is faced with a strike for better wages and hours in his plant, to hire sufficient nonunion replacements to outvote the members of the union and thereupon to demand an election, the result of which can well be to oust the union from the plant.

(10) The Taft-Hartley Act abandoned the uniform procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 and singled out the National Labor Relations Board as the one administrative agency in our Government which should receive different treatment. The law set up a general counsel who has broad discretionary powers and who is independent of the Board. He has final and absolute authority to determine what complaints should come before the Board. Thus a tremendous amount of power is placed in the hands of one man since he can pick and choose among the cases to be prosecuted.

The Taft-Hartley Act was passed during a period of great emotional stress, arising from abnormal disturbance and readjustments, which was an inevitable accompaniment of the return to a peacetime economy. It is true that the strikes which occurred between August 1945 and June 1947 played a large part in creating the emotional atmosphere in which a law like the Taft-Hartley Act could be passed. As stated by Secretary of Labor Maurice J. Tobin before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, on January 31 last, we should remember, however, that at the time the act was passed economic controls had been off for all practical purposes for almost a full year. In the period between June 1946 and June 1947, the Bureau of Labor Statistics Consumers' Price Index rose from 133.3 to 157.1, or 17.8 percent. During the same period average hourly earnings, exclusive of overtime, increased from $1.05 to $1.17, or 11.4 percent. Throughout the period the widening spread between wages and the cost of living caused dislocations which inevitably produced exasperation and conflict. Had the Congress been faced in the spring and summer of 1947 with writing a Federal labor law under different economic and psychological conditions, the result would have been very different from that act. Today, the balance between prices and wages is beginning to adjust itself, and economic conditions are on a more settled basis—of course, on a level of production, employment, and income substantially higher than that which prevailed in the years 1935–39. There is an opportunity now again to return to the basic principles of free collective bargaining which the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 established as the fundamental basis of our national labor policy.

Strong unions with effective power to bolster the wages of their members in terms of real buying power, through the process of collective bargaining, represent the most democratic means of preventing the boom-and-bust cycles which have plagued our economy over the past hundred years when business has fixed wages in all but a few industries without regard to the needs of their workers or to their ability as consumers to buy back the products which a constantly expanding economy was producing.

In the Wagner Act labor received its Magna Carta, its right to bargain collectively was granted. This guaranty must be preserved and protected.

The 1948 election and the special election on February 15, 1949 (when I was elected to Congress), were clear and convincing mandates from the people demanding the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. Zealous public servants should therefore carry out the will and wish of the people. Immediate repeal of this unjust, unfair, and vicious legislation is the way to do it.

Mr. KELLEY. We also requested Secretary of Labor Maurice J. Tobin to file a statement. When it is received, it will be made part of the record also.

(Mr. Tobin's statement is as follows:)

DEPARTMENT OF LABOR,
OFFICE OF THE SECRETARY,
Washington, March 21, 1949.

Hon. JOHN LESINSKI,
Chairman, Committee on Education and Labor,
House of Representatives, Washington 25, D. C.

DEAR CONGRESSMAN LESINSKI: This is with further reference to your request for my views on H. R. 2032, which you have introduced, to repeal the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, to reenact the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, and for other purposes.

H. R. 2032 is identical with the provisions of the amendment introduced by Senator Thomas of Utah, chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, as a substitute for his bill, S. 249, which the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare has voted to report favorably to the Senate. My views on this legislation were set forth in my statement before the Senate committee on January 31, 1949. I should like to request that you accept this statement as an expression of my views on H. R. 2032. A copy of my statement is attached hereto.

In my statement before the Senate committee, I enumerated 16 specific objections to the provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947. Pursuant to a request made of me during the course of the hearings before the Senate committee, there were submitted to the committee for inclusion in the record of its hearings memoranda documenting each of these objections. I am also enclosing a copy of each of these memoranda for the information of your committee.

The Bureau of the Budget advises that it has no objection to the submission of this report.

Yours very truly,

MAURICE J. TOBIN, Secretary of Labor.

(Enclosures.)

STATEMENT BY HON. MAURICE J. TOBIN, SECRETARY OF LABOR, BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, MONDAY, JANUARY 31, 1949, ON THE PROPOSED NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I am grateful for the honor which has been bestowed upon me by the chairman of the committee of being the first witness to appear before a congressional committee during the first session of the eighty-first Congress to support repeal of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. The President, in his state of the Union message, delivered on January 5, of this year, recommended that that act be repealed; that the National Labor Relations Act be reenacted; and that certain improvements, which he indicated, be made in that law. Following delivery of the message, the chairman requested me to make available to the committee the language of a bill which would carry out the recommendations of the President. The various affected departments and agencies of the Government have conferred on a bill, and a draft of such a bill has been submitted to the chairman.

This bill, as recommended by the President in his state of the Union message, proposes to restore this country's policy in the field of labor-management relations to the philosophy of the Wagner Act. This is accomplished by repealing the Labor-Management Relations Act, by reenacting the Wagner Act, and by making certain improvements in that law.

The Labor-Management Relations Act has brought confusion to the field of labor relations, has limited the scope of collective bargaining, has unnecessarily injected the Government into labor disputes, and has abridged the rights of our working men and women. It has emphasized individual bargaining as against collective bargaining. It deals with collective bargaining as if it were inimical to the public interest instead of the foundation of our national labor policy. It has unnecessarily limited the rights of workers to strike, and even in some cases compels members of the same local union to strike-break against their own fellow members by forcing them to work on struck goods.

Under the National Labor Relations Act the basic objective of our national labor policy was to promote collective bargaining. This the act accomplished by affirming and protecting the right of workers to self-organization, to form and join labor unions, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

It is the purpose of the proposed National Labor Relations Act of 1949 to return to the policy first declared in the National Labor Relations Act of 1935. The bill regulates collective bargaining only where restraints are needed and practicable and seeks to develop a system of labor relations under which both labor and management, with the friendly assistance of Government, can live together and solve their own problems.

I should like to summarize for you at this time some of the important reasons why I believe the Taft-Hartley Act should be repealed.[1]

[1] The reasons for repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act summarized here by Secretary Tobin are printed in full following his statement.

(1) The Taft-Hartley Act's ban upon the closed shop has resulted in the outlawing of collective bargaining agreements which had been mutually beneficial to both labor and management and had assisted in the maintenance of industrial peace for a period of over 100 years. At the time the act was passed more than 11,000,000 workers were covered by union security agreements. Not only was the closed shop outlawed, but restrictions were put upon union-shop agreements. The elections called before union-shop contracts can be consummated are wasteful and useless. They have merely demonstrated the overwhelming preference of workers for this form of security. In about 97 percent of such elections the workers chose a union shop.

(2) The Taft-Hartley Act places special emphasis on the use of injunctions to settle labor disputes. The evils of the labor injunction were recognized by the Congress in the Norris-LaGuardia Act. It is unnecessary for me to repeat here what has so often been said concerning the abuses which arose in the past from the frequent use of labor injunctions. Under the Taft-Hartley law, for example, the Board is under a mandatory duty to seek injunctions against unions in all cases involving secondary boycotts, including those for perfectly legitimate objectives, such as the protection of labor standards. In no case is it mandatory that the board seek injunctions against employers.

(3) The Labor-Management Relations Act removed the United States Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor, where it had functioned for 34 years. It created a new Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service as an independent agency. This was a completely unjustified dismemberment of the Department of Labor. During the 34 years of its existence in the Department, the Conciliation Service successfully settled more than 100,000 cases where serious disputes had arisen. Just before the Service was transferred from the Department it was settling without a work stoppage over 90 percent of those cases in which no stoppage existed at the time a conciliator was assigned to the case. This record could not have been achieved unless the Service was operating successfully, efficiently and fairly and had the confidence of both management and labor.

The exercise of concilation functions outside the Labor Department is inconsistent with principle, which I have often stated, that labor functions must be centralized in a Cabinet department. This centralization is necessary to achieve coherence in the formulation of national labor policies and in the administration of our labor laws.

The Service was removed from the Department by the Taft-Hartley Act on the announced ground that it could not be impartial so long as it was within the Department of Labor. I cannot state too strongly that I, as Secretary of Labor, consider myself to represent the more than 140,000,000 American people and every segment of our economy.

Conciliation functions must be exercised impartially if they are to be successful, and the record of the Department during the 34 years it had the Conciliation Service shows this was done and can be done in the Department of Labor.

This is not my opinion alone. The President's labor-management conference in November 1945 recommended that the United States Conciliation Service "be established as an effective and completely impartial agency within the Department of Labor." Mr. Ira Mosher, chairman of the executive committee, and Mr. Raymond Smethurst, general counsel of the National Association of Manufacturers, and Mr. Eric Johnston for the Committee for Economic Development, together with all the major labor organizations, testified in hearings held during the Eightieth Congress before this committee that no new agency should be created for handling conciliation functions outside the Department of Labor. If their point of view, that it was not desirable to remove the Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor was sound then, it is sound now to restore the Service to the Department of Labor.

(4) The Taft-Hartley Act abandoned the uniform procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 and singled out the National Labor Relations Board as the one administrative agency in our Government which should receive different treatment. The law set up a general counsel who has broad discretionary powers and who is independent of the Board. This is an unwise and unnecessary division of the Board's functions.

The administrative procedures established under the original National Labor Relations Act, which would be restored under this bill, provided for the internal separation of the judicial and prosecuting functions of the Board in accordance with the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act. There is no reason why any additional separation should be required.

Furthermore, the duty of the general counsel, under the Taft-Hartley Act, to determine what complaints should come before the Board places a tremendous amount of power in the hands of one man since it can be used to control policy in enforcing the act. The division of authority between the Board and the general counsel keeps the Board from considering issues vital and germane to its decisions.

The President in his veto message of June 20, 1947, predicted that the separation of power between the General Counsel and the Board—

"* * * would invite conflict between the National Labor Relations Board and its general counsel, since the general counsel would decide, without any right of appeal by employers and employees, whether charges were to be heard by the Board, and whether orders of the Board were to be referred to the Court for enforcement. By virtue of this unlimited authority, a single administrative official might usurp the Board's responsibility for establishing policy under the act."

This warning, like others contained in that veto message, has proved to be strikingly accurate.

(5) By providing for numerous elections—representation, union shop, employer's last offer—the Taft-Hartley Act keeps the relation between employers and unions in an unsettled condition, instead of on the basis of stability and confidence so necessary in assuring free collective bargaining. The provision that permits union-shop elections once each year could, under changed economic conditions, be used to harass and even crush unions.

(6) The Taft-Hartley Act completely outlaws peaceful picketing in many situations, even such types as have enjoyed protection of our courts for several decades. Thus, employees who picket an employer because he persists in making them work on partially finished goods produced in another plant at sweatshop wages may be found guilty of the unfair labor practice of engaging in an unlawful secondary boycott.

(7) The Taft-Hartley Act places unreasonable restraints on many aspects of collective bargaining agreements. The check-off—a legitimate labor-management practice—has been surrounded with many unnecessary procedural requirements, violation of which carries a criminal penalty, to the detriment of harmonious relations between labor and management.

(8) One of the most serious consequences of the law is the denial to "economic" strikers, not only of the right to reinstatement, as under the Wagner Act, but also of the right to vote in representation elections while granting a vote to strike-breaker replacements. The law thus permits an employer who is faced with a strike to improve wages and hours in his plant, to hire sufficient nonunion replacements to outvote the members of the union and thereupon to demand an election, the result of which can well be to oust the union from the plant.

(9) Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, the employer can, by petitioning for a choice of collective bargaining representative, determine the time most advantageous for himself to call for an election, even when not faced with conflicting claims for recognition. The employer can thereby stifle and thwart organization efforts and assure a year's freedom from union organization.

(10) The law removes from the area of free collective bargaining a subject which all must agree is a proper objective of workers—welfare funds established for the humanitarian purpose of protecting the health and security of employees. It is made a crime for employers and employees to establish such funds except under rigid rules limiting their purposes and methods of administration. Furthermore, violations may be enjoined without regard to the Clayton Act and Norris-LaGuardia Act safeguards.

(11) The Taft-Hartley Act impairs legitimate union security by providing that where State laws are more restrictive than the Federal statute, the State laws should prevail. As a result of this provision, even union shops are banned in some industries engaged in interstate commerce.

(12) The Taft-Hartley Act's broad ban upon political contributions and expenditures by labor organizations, in my opinion, is unfair and undemocratic. I consider this to be discriminatory legislation because it selects labor organizations as the only type of voluntary associations which are to be denied effective political participation.

(13) The Taft-Hartley Act provides for damage suits in the Federal courts for breaches of collective bargaining agreements and for violation of the prohibitions in the act against secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes. These provisions throw upon the Federal courts the task of deciding many issues which should be settled by the parties themselves within the framework of their agreements. Furthermore, the burden of untangling the complicated economic problems out of which the evils of unjustifiable secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes arise is one that administrative agencies dealing continuously with employer-employee relations are far better equipped to handle than the Federal courts, where dockets are already seriously overcrowded. These provisions assume an attitude of hostility between employers and unions which is wholly incompatible with the maintenance of peaceful collective bargaining relations and with the assumptions upon which our entire national labor policy is founded.

(14) The Labor-Management Relations Act indiscriminately outlaws all secondary boycotts whether unjustifiable or not. As the President emphasized in his veto message, the provisions of the act go far beyond merely prohibiting certain unjustifiable secondary boycotts. The language used is so broad that even boycotts engaged in for the purpose of protecting the standards of union members against the competition of goods produced under sweatshop conditions are prohibited Such types of boycotts have long been recognized by the courts as justifiable in order to preserve the union's own existence and the gains made in genuine collective bargaining. Yet the act puts a mandatory duty on the regional director, subject to the supervision of the general counsel, to go into the Federal courts for injunctive relief when he has reason to believe that a union is engaging in such a boycott. And the act requires the regional director, in the preliminary investigation of a charge concerning such a boycott to give the case "priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred."

(15) The Taft-Hartley Act grossly discriminates in the application of sanctions against unfair labor practices in favor of employers and against labor organizations. Mandatory injunctive action is provided for in the case of three employee or union organization unfair labor practices. In no case is it mandatory to afford relief to employees or a labor organization against any employer unfair labor practice.

(16) The Taft-Hartley Act provides elaborate and inflexible procedures including boards of inquiry, an 80-day waiting period enforced by injunction, and secret ballots which must be followed in emergency disputes. Nevertheless, as the President said in his veto message, he and his officers are deprived of their power to take effective action in securing peaceful settlement of such disputes. For example, even the boards of inquiry are deprived of authority to make recommendations for settling the dispute. In the atomic energy and longshore cases these procedures were unavailing, and agreements between the parties were reached with the assistance of Government conciliation, only after the machinery provided by the law had ineffectively run its course.

The 16 objectionable provisions discussed above and others too numerous to recount here could make possible the destruction of labor unions by unscrupulous employers This is a charge which has been repeatedly made. As was said in the reputable business publication, "Business Week," on December 18, 1948:

"What was wrong was that the Taft-Hartley Act went too far. It crossed the narrow line separating a law which aims only to regulate from one which could destroy.

"Given a few million unemployed in America, given an administration in Washington which was not prounion, and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck the labor movement.

"These are the provisions that could do it: (1) picketing can be restrained by injunction; (2) employers can petition for a collective-bargaining election; (3) strikers can be held ineligible to vote, while the strike replacements cast the only ballots; and (4) if the outcome of this is a 'no-union' vote, the Government must certify and enforce it.

"Any time there is a surplus labor pool from which an employer can hire at least token strike replacements, these four provisions, linked together, presumably can destroy a union.

"By going that far, the law defeated itself."

It is my considered judgment that the law has had the net effect of dislodging long-established labor relations patterns and weakened collective bargaining. Statutory provisions which unduly restrict and hamper free collective bargaining in this country should be eliminated. I, therefore, urgently recommend immediate repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

The Taft-Hartley Act was passed during a period of great emotional stress, arising from abnormal disturbance and readjustments, which was an inevitable accompaniment of the return to a peacetime economy. If the same Congress had been considering such legislation during the 1935-40 period, it is highly improbable that such a far-reaching law would have been written. I intend to discuss this phase of the problem further, later in my statement.

I shall now turn to a discussion of the bill which has been submitted to the chairman, which is entitled the "National Labor Relations Act of 1949."

Briefly, the bill embodies the legislative recommendations made by the President in his state of the Union message delivered to the Congress on January 5 of this year. The bill would (1) repeal the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, (2) reenact the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, (3) amend that act to retain the present Board membership and panel structure, (4) enables the National Labor Relations Board to deal with jurisdictional disputes and unjustifiable secondary boycotts, (5) reestablish the Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor, (6) provide means for the settlement of disputes arising out of the interpretation of existing contracts, and (7) provide means for meeting national emergencies in vital industries which affect the public interest.

Title I of the bill embodies the first three of these recommendations. It completely repeals the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. It reenacts the National Labor Relations Act of 1935, as it existed prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, and provides for the following changes:

The National Labor Relations Board is to remain a five-man instead of a three-man Board as it was under the original act. In addition, the Board is authorized to use three-member panels to exercise its powers and expedite its work.

Certain types of activities are made unfair labor practices if engaged in by a labor organization. In conformity with the President's recommendation, these are limited to certain types of secondary boycotts and certain types of jurisdictional disputes, and failure to file 30 days' notice of proposed contract modification or termination. The latter is also made an employer unfair labor practice. Under the bill strikes or secondary boycotts are treated as unjustifiable only if they are for the purpose of compelling an employer (1) to recognize a union in violation of the National Labor Relations Act, or (2) to assign particular work tasks to a union contrary to an award of the Board.

The bill makes it an unfair labor practice for a union "to cause or attempt to cause" employees to engage in a secondary boycott or a concerted work stoppage for the following purposes:

(1) To compel an employer to bargain with one union if another is the certified representative, or if the employer is required by an order of the Board to bargain with another union, or if the employer has a contract with another union and the question of representation cannot appropriately be raised under the act; or

(2) To compel an employer to assign particular work tasks contrary to an award issued by the Board under the act.

With respect to jurisdictional disputes the bill is limited to disputes between two or more labor organizations. The procedures in the bill for the settlement of such internion disputes over the assignment of work tasks give the National Labor Relations Board jurisdiction over these disputes under certain specific conditions. The Board can take jurisdiction of such a dispute only (1) when it has resulted in or threatens to result in a strike or secondary boycott, and (2) when it affects commerce. Once the Board has taken jurisdiction, it must afford the unions a reasonable opportunity to settle the dispute themselves. If the dispute is not so settled the Board may under regulations which the Board would issue, either hear and determine the dispute itself and issue an award, or appoint an arbitrator to do so. Certain guides which the Board or arbitrator must follow in making a determination are spelled out in the bill. The employer involved in such a dispute is entitled to be heard.

It if appears to the Board that the dispute is in fact one over representation instead of merely assignment of work tasks, it is required to treat the case as a representation case already instituted and proceed accordingly.

These provisions regarding secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes are designed to prevent certain conflicts between labor organizations where neutral employers are unjustifiably harmed or where the failure of employers to remain neutral tends to prolong or aggravate the dispute.

The blanket prohibition of the Taft-Hartley Act on all secondary boycotts, both justified and unjustified, is avoided in the committee print by defining specifically the types and purposes of those that are to be prohibited. The provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act which assume that jurisdictional disputes are primarily concerned with the assignment of work tasks by the employer is also avoided in the committee print by providing that jurisdictional disputes arise only when there is a dispute over such tasks between two or more labor organizations.

The bill makes two further changes in the National Labor Relations Act.

First, it is made clear that employers subject to the act may make agreements providing for the closed shop or other forms of union security or for the check-off of union dues and assessments notwithstanding the provisions of conflicting State laws. This would make uniform rules on these subjects of collective bargaining applicable to all employers and labor organizations in interstate industries. No longer will employers or unions be subject to conflicting rules in the different States where they operate.

Second, the bill requires 30 days' notice to the Conciliation Service of a proposal to terminate or modify any collective-bargaining agreement and makes it an unfair labor practice for either an employer or a union to terminate or modify such an agreement without filing such notice. These clearly are reasonable requirements which will enable the Service to be apprised in time to be able to head off controversies before they ripen into open conflict.

Title II of the bill provides that the United States Conciliation Service be reestablished in the Department of Labor—where it properly belongs. This has been repeatedly recommended by the President and, as I have said, is required by sound administration of Government labor functions.

The bill sets forth in explicit terms the duties of employers and unions to exert every reasonable effort to make and maintain collective-bargaining agreements for definite periods of time and to participate fully and properly in meetings called by the Service to aid in settling disputes.

The bill encourages utilization of arbitration procedures, not only in grievance disputes, but in other appropriate cases, by authorizing the Service, upon request of the parties, to cooperate with them in formulating agreements for arbitration and in the selection of arbitrators. The Service is also authorized to enter into agreements with local mediation agencies and to furnish information concerning the establishment of agencies to aid in the voluntary settlement of labor disputes through peaceful means.

The provisions with respect to disputes over the interpretation or application of an existing collective-bargaining agreement are included in this title. In his state of the Union message of January 5 of this year the President recommended procedures be developed for the settlement of such disputes without the use of economic force.

The bill declares the public policy of the United States "that any collective-bargaining agreement in an industry affecting commerce shall provide procedures by which either party to such agreement may refer disputes growing out of the interpretation or application of the agreement to final and binding arbitration." The Conciliation Service would be directed to implement this policy by assisting employers and unions in developing procedures for arbitration, in framing the issues in dispute, and in selecting arbitrators. The Service would compile a roster of arbitrators which it could make available to the parties. If the parties so desired, the Service would be authorized to designate one or more arbitrators.

The bill carefully avoids the twin evils of compulsory arbitration and rigidity of procedure. Its provisions are clear and simple and will, I believe, be effective in carrying out the recommendations of the President. They provide a minimum of governmental assistance intended to induce both employers and unions to develop sound arbitration machinery of their own, adapted to their own particular needs and circumstances, for the settlement of grievance disputes without the use of economic force.

Title II also provides that labor-management advisory committees such as were originally set up when the Service was in the Department of Labor would be appointed by the Secretary of Labor to advise on questions of policy and administration regarding the work of the Conciliation Service. Such committees would have a representative of the public as chairman and would be equally representative of labor and management.

Title III of the bill deals with national emergencies resulting from work stoppages in vital industries which affect the public interest. It provides that when the President finds that a national emergency exists "because a stoppage of work has resulted or threatens to result from a labor dispute" in such an industry, he shall issue a proclamation to that effect and shall promptly appoint an emergency board to be composed of such number of disinterested persons as he may deem appropriate.

The board would investigate the dispute, seek to induce the parties to reach a settlement and make a report, including the findings and recommendations of the board, within a period of not more than 25 days after the date of the President's proclamation. The report of the board would be made to the President, be transmitted to the parties, and be made public. The bill provides that during the period of not more than 25 days after the Presidential proclamation has been issued and until 5 days after the emergency board's report "the parties to the dispute shall continue or resume work and operations under the terms and conditions of employment which were in effect immediately prior to the beginning of the dispute unless a change therein is agreed to by the parties."

The procedure provided in the bill for dealing with national emergencies is simple and flexible. It is intended to be used only in limited cases involving a grave national emergency. The Government will assist affirmatively in the settlement of the controversy during the waiting period. The parties and the public will have the benefit of the considered judgment of a board of disinterested persons as to sound suggestions for settling the controversy.

The procedure proposed in the bill is based upon the assumption that our national labor policy is one of encouraging free collective bargaining. When labor and management are assured once again that this is our national labor policy, they will, I feel sure, comply with the procedures provided in the bill. In my opinion, there never was any valid reason at this time for departing from our declared public policy.

In this connection the report of the labor committee of the Twentieth Century Fund issued in 1947, said:

"A basic criterion of the value of any proposed legislation is that it should be helpful to genuine collective bargaining, not harmful; that the legislation should be calculated to build up creative conditions of labor peace on the foundations of industrial self-government."

The committee which wrote this report, which was unanimous on this point, was headed by William H. Davis as chairman. The other members of the committee included Sumner H. Slichter, Lamont University professor, Harvard University; Edwin E. Witte, professor of economics, University of Wisconsin; William L. Chenery, publisher, Collier's weekly; Howard Coonley, chairman of the board, Walworth Co., Inc., formerly president, National Association of Manufacturers; Clinton S. Golden, formerly vice president, United Steelworkers of America, CIO; and the late Robert J. Watt, formerly international representative, American Federation of Labor.

Title IV of the bill would continue in full force and effect the prohibitions in the Norris-LaGuardia Act and the Clayton Act against the issuance of labor injunctions. However, the National Labor Relations Board would be able to enforce its orders in the Federal circuit courts just as it used to do under the original National Labor Relations Act.

Title IV would restore the political contributions provision of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act as it existed before the War Labor Disputes Act. Both President Roosevelt and President Truman have pointed out that amendments to this statute have no place in a labor law.

There is a specific statement in title IV that titles II and III shall not be applicable with respect to any matter which is subject to the provisions of the Railway Labor Act.

In conclusion, I should like to express my firm conviction that the original Wagner Act, with the improvements proposed in the committee print, contains the essential elements of a sound national labor policy. The 1947 act impairs the hard-won gains of organized workers and hampers the efforts of the unorganized to form labor organizations.

It is important to bear in mind, as I mentioned earlier in my statement, the economic conditions which characterized the period when the Labor Management Relations Act was passed. At that time we were still in the midst of the upheavals and readjustments that always follow a major war. Just as we had such upheavals in the years 1919, 1920, and 1921 after the First World War, so we had them in the years 1946, 1947, and 1948. In fact, the readjustments after the First World War were characterized by even greater disturbances than those occasioned by World War II.

In 1919, for example, there were 20.8 percent of all employed workers who were involved in work stoppages. In the comparable year after World War II, 1946, 14.5 percent of all employed workers were involved in work stoppages. In the third year after World War I, 1921, 6.4 percent of employed workers were involved in work stoppages. In the third year after World War II, 1948, it is estimated that 5.6 percent of employed workers were involved in work stoppages.

It is true that the strikes which occurred between August 1945 and June 1947 played a large part in creating the emotional atmosphere in which a law like the Labor Management Relations Act could be passed. We should remember, however, that at the time the act was passed economic controls had been off for all practical purposes for almost a full year. In the period between June 1946 and June 1947 the Bureau of Labor Statistics consumers' price index rose from 133.3 to 157.1, or 17.8 percent. During the same period average hourly earnings, exclusive of overtime, increased from $1.05 to $1.17, or 11.4 percent. Throughout the period the widening spread between wages and the cost of living caused dislocations which inevitably produced exasperation and conflict.

A law written at such a time, as was the Labor Management Relations Act, inevitably reflects such exasperation and emotional reactions to such conflicts. The Congress was under great pressure from the people to pass legislation to deal with these conflicts Had the Congress been faced in the spring and summer of 1947 with writing a Federal labor law under different economic and pychological conditions the result would undobtedly have been very different from that act.

Today, the balance between prices and wages is beginning to adjust itself, and economic conditions are on a more settled basis, of course, on a level of production, employment and income are substantially higher than that which prevailed in the years 1935–39. There is an opportunity now again to return to the basic principle of free collective bargaining which the National Labor Relations Act of 1935 established as the fundamental basis of our national labor policy.

To carry out this purpose is the objective of the bill before this committee.

I urge the Congress speedily to enact the National Labor Relations Act of 1949.

POINT 1.—UNION SECURITY; THE CLOSED SHOP

"The Taft-Hartley Act's ban upon the closed shop has resulted in the outlawing of collective-bargaining agreements which had been mutually beneficial to both labor and management and had assisted in the maintenance of industrial peace for a period of over 100 years. At the time the act was passed more than 11,000,000 workers were covered by union-security agreements. Not only was the closed shop outlawed, but restrictions were put upon union-shop agreements. The elections called before union-shop contracts can be consummated are wasteful and useless. They have merely demonstrated the overwhelming preference of workers for this form of security. In about 97 percent of such elections the workers chose a union shop."

Section 8 (a) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for an employer—

"(3) by discrimination in regard to hire or tenure of employment or any term or condition of employment to encourage or discourage membership in any labor organization: Provided, That nothing in this act, or in any other statute of the United States, shall preclude an employer from making an agreement with a labor organization (not established, maintained, or assisted by any action defined in section 8 (a) of this act as an unfair labor practice) to require as a condition of employment membership therein on or after the 30th day following the beginning of such employment or the effective date of such agreement, whichever is the later, (i) if such labor organization is the representative of the employees as provided in section 9 (a), in the appropriate collective-bargaining unit covered by such agreement when made; and (ii) if, following the most recent election held as provided in section 9 (e) the Board shall have certified that at least a majority of the employees eligible to vote in such election have voted to authorize such labor organization to make such an agreement: Provided further, That no employer shall justify any discrimination against an employee for nonmembership in a labor organization (a) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to other members, or (b) if he has reasonable grounds for believing that membership was denied or terminated for reasons other than the failure of the employee to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership."

Section 8 (b) of the act, as amended, provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agent—

"(2) to cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of subsection (a) (3) or to discriminate against an employee with respect to whom membership in such organization has been denied or terminated on some ground other than his failure to tender the periodic dues and the initiation fees uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership."

Union Security Under the Taft-Hartley Act

(a) The nature of these provisions.—The combined effect of sections 8 (a) (3) and 8 (b) (2) is to render unenforceable agreements for closed shop (under which an employer may hire only members of the contracting union) and to permit lesser forms of union security agreements only if the National Labor Relations Board has certified, on the basis of an election, that a majority of the employees in the bargaining unit favor such a contract. The contract must also allow new employees 30 days in which to become union members. It cannot require the employer to refuse to hire or to discharge an employee for nonmembership in the union except for nonpayment of initiation fees and dues. If the employer who is operating under a union-security contract has "reasonable grounds" for believing the employee's union membership was denied or terminated for any other reason, he cannot discharge that employee merely for nonmembership.

(b) Disruptive effect of these provisions—(1) Uselessness of union-shop voting procedure—The uselessness of the election procedures specified in the act for determining whether the employees of a particular employer wish a union-security contract, is amply demonstrated by the fact that the union shop has been favored in approximately 98.2 percent of the elections conducted since the effective date of the Taft-Hartley Act (report of majority, Joint Labor-Management Committee, December 31, 1948, p. 49).

The majority of the Joint Labor-Management Relations Committee in its December 1948 report takes cognizance of the tremendous expense to the Government of such elections (estimated at about 40 cents per vote for the 2,457,352 employees who voted during approximately 1 year); the tremendous operating burden placed upon the staff of the agency conducting the elections (e. g., in May 1948 there were 4,420 elections; although the number was reduced in September 1948, the total was still 2,340); and the impracticability of conducting such elections in industries where employment is intermittent, e. g., the building and construction industry. The majority, therefore, recommended elimination of the union shop authorization vote but insertion of a provision permitting a vote to rescind authority for a union-security contract where one already is in existence (Rept. No. 986, December 31, 1948, p. 49).

(2) Upset long-established and peaceful collective-bargaining relationship.—According to studies made by the Bureau of Labor Statistics at the time the Labor-Management Relations Act was passed more than 11,000,000 of the 14,800,000 workers employed under conditions determined by written collective-bargaining agreements, or over 75 percent, were covered by some form of union-security agreements. Of these, nearly 5,000,000 were employed under a closed shop or a union shop with preferential hiring, which is substantially the same (Bureau of Labor Statistics, Extent of Collective Bargaining and Union Recognition, 1946).

The closed-shop system originated with the British guilds. It was transplanted to America as early as the seventeenth century.

The system originated and prevailed in trades and industries in which special crafts requiring high skills and long years of training predominated. Traditionally, there has been coupled with it an integrated system of apprenticeship training extending over a period of years. Thus, the closed shop is found to prevail in most branches of the printing industry, in building and construction, and in bakeries. Other industries placing less emphasis on crafts and training but with strong and firmly established unions, where the closed-shop form of union security is found, include the manufacture of men's and women's clothing, and shipbuilding (Bureau of Labor Statistics, Union Security Provisions in Collective Bargaining (1947); Rev. J. L. Toner, The Closed Shop (1942), pp. 91, 92).

That the closed shop has resulted in exceptional records of industrial peace in these industries has been widely recognized. Notable is the women's clothing industry with 380,000 members in the International Ladies' Garment Workers Union, which has not had a major strike since 1933 (see hearings of Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, 80th Cong., 1st sess., pp. 1332–1333). Best known of all perhaps is the long record of peaceful labor relations established in the printing industry under the closed-shop arrangements of the International Typographical Union. The majority of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations recognized this when it said: "The International Typographical Union has long enjoyed public confidence by its record of winning gains for its members while maintaining peaceful relations with employers" (S. Rept. No. 986, 80th Cong., 2d sess., March 15, 1948, p. 27).

An outstanding example of the disruptive effect of the closed-shop ban of the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 is presented in the case of the International Typographical Union. This union attempted, after passage of the act, to preserve union-security arrangements with employers in the printing industry. The result was the filing of 18 charges, 9 complaints, 1 injunction suit, and 2 damage actions against the union, and participation by the union in 8 strikes.

That employers find the closed shop to their advantage has been long recognized. A newspaper employer in St. Paul, Minnesota, has written as follows:

"In many industries the closed shop has existed for decades and has practically become incorporated in the structure and operating conditions of those industries. This is notably true in most branches of the printing industry. For example, most metropolitan newspapers, including this one, have closed-shop agreements covering the mechanical departments of the plant.

"Why should it be illegal or against public policy for a newspaper or a printing plant to make a contract whereby it designates a union as its agent to supply it with qualified printers * * * it seems to be a subject that should be left to voluntary agreement * * * between the employer and the (union)." (Editorial, The Pioneer Press, Dec. 10, 1946.)

In an investigation of the closed shop made just before the war, the National Industrial Conference Board, an employers' organization, found that employers with practical experience with a closed shop found that it—

"* * * places the union in a better position to keep its agreement, eliminates coercing of employees * * * gives employees greater feeling of responsibility and interest in their jobs * * * makes it possible to hold the union responsible for the action of its members." (N. I. C. B., Studies in Personnel Policy, No. 12, March 1939.)

Another employer has said:

"The effect on workers of a closed shop is an immediate improvement in morale. They at once recognize that management has wholeheartedly accepted them as a partner * * *.

"Responsibility is definitely fixed on and assumed by the union for discipline, full production, effective cooperation with management." ("Should the Closed Shop Be Outlawed," H. I. Buschsbaum, pres., S. Buschsbaum Co., Modern Industry, vol. 13, Feb. 15, 1947, p. 112.)

(3) Permits State union-security prohibitions to operate in Federal field.—The union security question is further complicated by section 14 (b) of the act, which provides that State laws are to govern union security agreements even with respect to employees in interstate industries. As pointed out in the discussion of that section elsewhere, the number of States which prohibit not only a closed shop but all other forms of union security provisions, has been increasing. Section 14 (b) encourages further extension of such prohibitions. Therefore, while only the closed shop is banned by sections 8 (a) (3) and 8 (b) (2) with which we are dealing, the potential effect of section 14 (b) can well be the elimination of many other types of union security arrangements in the future in many of the States.

(4) Interference with internal affairs of unions and destruction of union discipline.—As already pointed out, sections 8 (a) (3) and 8 (b) (2) permit an employer to refuse to hire or discharge an employee for nonmembership in the union even where a union security contract requires membership in the union, only if the employee has been refused admittance into or expelled from the union for non-payment of dues or initiation fees.

These provisions, which have the effect of interfering with a union's regulation of its own internal affairs, render the unions powerless to impose effective conditions, qualifications, or responsibilities upon their membership except with respect to payment of dues and initiation fees. Union dues and fees are in turn regulated by section 8 (b) (5) which makes it an unfair labor practice for a union to fix dues and fees found to be excessive by the National Labor Relations Board. They in effect render illusory the guarantee contained in section 8 (b) (1) (which prohibits a union from restraining or coercing employees in the exercise of their rights) that "the right of a labor organization to prescribe its own rules with respect to the acquisition or retention of membership therein" shall not be impaired.

Under the Taft-Hartley Act, the price which the union must pay for its illusory security under a union shop contract is the relinquishment of the disciplinary sanctions by which it is enabled to maintain its existence and its effectiveness as an organization.

Union Security Under the Wagner Act

(a) Summary of the Wagner Act provisions.—The Wagner Act did not require closed shop or other types of union security agreements. It merely permitted them if the labor organization concerned was not company assisted or dominated within the meaning of the act and if it was the duly certified collective bargaining representative of the majority of the employees in an appropriate unit at the time of consummation of the contract. Discharges for failure to join or maintain membership in a labor organization were unfair labor practices unless made pursuant to the terms of a valid closed or union shop contract which met the requirements of the act.[1]

(b) Protection of the rights of individuals under the Wagner Act.—The Board held in numerous cases that a closed shop contract could not be utilized to interfere with the right of employees to select a new bargaining representative.[2]

In Matter Monsieur Henri Wines, Ltd. (44 N. L. R. B. 1310), the Board held that an employee could not be discharged pursuant to a closed shop contract when he had been denied membership in the contracting union.

In Matter of Capital City Candy Company (71 N. L. R. B. 447), nonunion employees, as well as union members, who were found to have been discriminated against by an employer were held entitled to relief.

In Matter of Eureka Vacuum Cleaner Company (69 N. L. R. B. 878), and G. E. X-Ray Corporation (76 N. L. R. B. 64), the discharge of employees who had resigned from the union during the escape period provided for in a maintenance of membership agreement was held to be an unfair labor practice and the employees concerned were held to be entitled to reinstatement.

Although under the Wagner Act the Board was not authorized to proceed directly against unions, certification as exclusive bargaining representative was denied on a showing of membership cards and election ordered where proof was offered of intimidation or coercion by unions in obtaining the cards.[3]

Protection of Rights of Individuals by the Courts Irrespective of the Wagner Act

A long line of cases in which the courts have reviewed union discipline of members now appears to establish substantial judicial protection of the rights of union members against arbitrary union action.[4]

The courts extend this protection by applying three standards of procedural and substantive due process, the right to a fair trial, equal protection under the laws, and freedom of individual expression.[5]

These cases have held, for example, that a union law prohibiting the distribution of circulars within the union was void, and that threatened expulsion of members who violated the prohibition by issuing leaflets charging the national officers with financial mismanagement would be enjoined (Edmington v. Hall, 148 S. E. 403 (Ga. 1929)). However, courts have upheld union disciplinary action upon a finding that there was a fair trial and substantial evidence to support the action (Love v. Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 215 S. W. 602 (Ark. 1919)); (Pfoh v. Whitney, 62 N. E. (2d) 744 (Ohio 1945)). One court set aside, for lack of a hearing, the expulsion of several locals which were penalized because they disagreed over policy with the regional representative of the parent union (Cox v. United Brotherhood of Carpenters, 69 P. (2d) 148 (Wash. 1937)). The

New York courts have held that there must be substantial evidence to support expulsion on charges of libel or slander of officers, and that mere criticism of the officers is not substantial enough to justify expulsion (Polin v. Kaplan, 177 N. As Professor Robert Hale of Columbia University Law School has so aptly said:

"If (a worker) belongs to a union in a closed shop industry, it is perfectly true he has no freedom to work without being a member of the union, but he has a little more freedom through the brotherhood of his union against the restraint imposed upon him by the employer * * *.

"If he is subject to be governed by the rules of his union he presumably has a little more control over what those rules are than if he is governed solely by the rules laid down by his employer." (Hearings before Senate Committee on Education and Labor on S. 296, 73d Cong., 2d sess., p. 51 (1934).)

A unanimous report to the Governor of Massachusetts by a tripartite group of nine outstanding citizens of that State appointed by the Governor recommended that the closed shop not be prohibited:

"The committee believes that the closed shop, the union shop and maintenance of membership should be matters for collective bargaining. The committee, therefore, does not recommend that the closed shop be prohibited in the Commonwealth of Massachusetts. The closed shop and the union shop are well-established institutions in many industries, and serve useful purposes. In the absence of a closed shop or union shop, it becomes possible to accept the benefits of a trade union without bearing a share of the cost of maintaining the union and the cost of administering the agreement which the union has negotiated, and to shirk the responsibility of participating in the affairs of the union. Furthermore, the closed shop and the union shop mean that all members in the bargaining unit belong to the union and have an opportunity to participate in its affairs. This helps the union to become more representative of the people in the bargaining unit." (Report of the Governor's Labor-Management Committee, House Doc. No. 1875, the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.)

POINT 2.—EMPHASIS ON THE USE OF INJUNCTIONS IN LABOR DISPUTES

"The Taft-Hartley Act places special emphasis on the use of injunctions to settle labor disputes. The evils of the labor injunction were recognized by the Congress in the Norris-LaGuardia Act. It is unnecessary for me to repeat here what has so often been said concerning the abuses which arose in the past from the frequent use of labor injunctions. Under the Taft-Hartley Law, for example, the Board is under a mandatory duty to seek injunctions against unions in all cases involving secondary boycotts, including those for perfectly legitimate objectives, such as the protection of labor standards. In no case is it mandatory that the board seek injunctions against employers."

Injunctive proceedings are directed or authorized in labor disputes under the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, in at least four different types of situations:

(a) Under section 10 (j) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor Management Relations Act, the National Labor Relations Board is authorized, upon issuance of a complaint charging that any one, employer, labor organization or individual, has engaged in any unfair labor practice as defined in the act,

"* * * to petition any district court of the United States (including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia), within any district wherein the unfair labor practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper."

By agreement between the Board and the independent general counsel provided for in the act, this authority has been delegated to the general counsel (Code of Fed. Reg., Title 29, ch. 2, sec. 201.2).

(b) With respect to the union unfair labor practice of engaging in so-called secondary boycotts as broadly defined in the act,[6] the regional officers of the Board are required, if they have "reasonable cause to believe" a charge that a union is engaging in such an unfair labor practice, to seek injunctive relief in the Federal district courts. Section 10 (l) provides:

"Whenever it is charged that any person has engaged in an unfair labor practice within the meaning of paragraph (4) (A), (B), or (C) of section 8 (b), the preliminary investigation of such charge shall be made forthwith and given priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred. If, after such investigation, the officer or regional attorney to whom the matter may be referred has reasonable cause to believe such charge is true and that a complaint should issue, he shall, on behalf of the Board, petition any district court of the United States (including the District Court of the United Sates for the District of Columbia) within any district where the unfair labor practice in question has occurred, is alleged to have occurred, or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate injunctive relief pending the final adjudication of the Board with respect to such matter. Upon the filing of any such petition the district court shall have jurisdiction to grant such injunctive relief or temporary restraining order as it deems just and proper, notwithstanding any other provision of law: Provided further, That no temporary restraining order shall be issued without notice unless a petition alleges that substantial and irreparable injury to the charging party will be unavoidable and such temporary restraining order shall be effective for no longer than five days and will become void at the expiration of such period. Upon filing of any such petition the courts shall cause notice thereof to be served upon any person involved in the charge and such person, including the charging party, shall be given an opportunity to appear by counsel and present any relevant testimony: Provided further, That for the purposes of this subsection district courts shall be deemed to have jurisdiction of a labor organization (1) in the district in which such organization maintains its principal office, or (2) in any district in which its duly authorized officers or agents are engaged in promoting or protecting the interests of employee members. The service of legal process upon such officer or agent shall constitute service upon the labor organization and make such organization a party to the suit. In situations where such relief is appropriate the procedure specified herein shall apply to charges with resect to section 8 (b) (4) (D)."

The "relief" provided for in this subsection is also available to the Board's regional officers "where appropriate" in cases in which charges are filed that a union is forcing or requires an employer "to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another labor organization or in another trade, class, or craft" unless the employer is failing to conform to a Board certification or order as to the bargaining representative for such employees.

Under section 3 (d) of the act, as amended, the general counsel, not the Board, has "general supervision * * * over the officers and employees in the regional offices."

By section 10 (h) of the act, as amended, the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act is made expressly inapplicable to proceedings for "temporary relief or a restraining order" brought on behalf of the Board in the types of situations discussed in this paragraph and paragraph (a) above. Section 10 (h) provides:

"When granting appropriate temporary relief or a restraining order, or making and entering a decree enforcing, modifying, and enforcing as so modified, or setting aside in whole or in part an order of the Board, as provided in this section, the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity shall not be limited by the act entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes', approved March 23, 1932 (U. S. C., Supp. VII, title 29, secs. 101–115)."

(c) Under section 208 of title II, Labor-Management Relations Act, there is an additional provision for injunctions—in the case of "a threatened or actual strike or lock-out affecting an entire industry or a substantial part thereof engaged in trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States, or with foreign nations, or engaged in the production of goods for commerce" which will "if permitted to occur or to continue, imperil the national health or safety" (sec. 206). Following appointment by the President of a board of inquiry in any such case and receipt by him of its report which "shall not contain any recommendations," the President is authorized to—

"* * * Direct the Attorney General to petition any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties to enjoin such strike or lock-out or the continuing thereof, and if the court finds that such threatened or actual strike or lock-out—

"(i) Affects an entire industry or a substantial part thereof engaged in trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or with foreign nations, or engaged in the production of goods for commerce; and

"(ii) If permitted to occur or to continue, will imperil the national health or safety, it shall have jurisdiction to enjoin any such strike or lock-out, or the continuing thereof, and to make such other orders as may be appropriate.

"(b) In any case, the provisions of the act of March 23, 1932, entitled 'An act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes,' shall not be applicable

"(c) The order or orders of the court shall be subject to review by the appropriate circuit court of appeals and by the Supreme Court upon writ of certiorari or certification as provided in sections 239 and 240 of the Judicial Code, as amended (U. S. C., title 29, secs. 346 and 347)."

Injunctions obtained under this section are continued in effect up to 80 days, at the expiration of which time they must be dissolved regardless of whether or not the labor dispute that gave rise to the situation calling for the invocation of injunctive relief is settled (secs. 209 (b) and 210).

(d) Under subsection (e) of section 302 of title III, Labor Management Relations Act, the provisions of the Norris-LaGuardia Anti-Injunction Act and sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act are made inapplicable to actions including actions by private parties, to enjoin the prohibitions[7] against payment by employees to, and receipt of funds by, employee representatives, in connection with the check-off and health and welfare funds, except under certain limited conditions which are specified in section 302 (c). Section 302 (e) provides:

"The district courts of the United States and the United States courts of the Territories and possessions shall have jurisdiction, for cause shown, and subject to the provisions of section 17 (relating to notice to opposite party) of the Act entitled 'An Act to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes', approved October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., title 28, sec. 381), to restrain violations of this section, without regard to the provisions of sections 6 and 20 of such Act of October 15, 1914, as amended (U. S. C., title 15, sec. 17, and title 29, sec. 52), and the provisions of the Act entitled 'An Act to amend the Judicial Code and to define and limit the jurisdiction of courts sitting in equity, and for other purposes,' approved March 23, 1932 (U. S. C., title 29, secs. 101–115)."

Under section 301 (b) of title III, Labor Management Relations Act, it is provided that:

"Any labor organization which represents employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this act * * * may * * * be sued as an entity and in behalf of the employees whom it represents in the courts of the United States * * *."

This section of the act may furnish still a fifth basis for injunction proceedings, in this situation in actions brought by private parties, to restrain labor organizations from violations of collective bargaining agreements.

The Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations, created by title 4 of the Labor Management Relations Act, has reported[8] that during the period from August 22, 1947, when the amendments to the National Labor Relations Act made by that act became effective, through October 1948, so-called discretionary injunctions under section 10 (j) of the act were sought by the General Counsel on behalf of the Board in six cases. In four cases, injunctions were sought against activities of the following labor organizations:

American Federation of Labor (2): International Typographical Union[9]; Amalgamated Meat Cutters and Butcher Workmen of North America.[10]

Independent (2): United Mine Workers of America.[11]

In two cases, section 10 (j) injunctions were sought against employers, namely: Boeing Airplane Co.[12]; General Motors Corp.[13]

Information submitted to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare during its current hearings on S. 249 shows that the provisions of section 10 (1) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, had been resorted to in 36 cases through January 31, 1949, to restrain activities of labor organizations under sections 8 (b) (4) (A), (B), and (C) of the National Relations Act, as amended.[14] The extent to which the activities of different labor organizations became involved in injunction actions under this provision of the Taft-Hartley Act is shown by the following table:

American Federation of Labor (27): International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, six cases;[15] United Brotherhood of Carpenters and Joiners of America, three cases;[16] International Brotherhood of Electrical Workers, two cases;[17] United Association of Journeymen and Apprentices of the Plumbing and Pipe Fitting Industry of the United States and Canada;[18] International Longshoremen's Association;[19] Retail Clerks International Association;[20] Distillery, Rectifying and Wine Workers' International Union of America;[21] National Farm Labor Union;[22] Printing Specialties and Paper Converters Union, Local 388;[23] International Alliance of Theatrical Stage Employees and Motion Picture Machine Operators of the United States and Canada;[24] Brotherhood of Painters, Decorators, and Paper Hangers of America;[25] Local Building Trades Councils, eight cases.[26] and Warehousemen's Union;[32] United Electrical, Radio, and Machine Workers of America;[33] National Union of Marine Docks and Stewards, two cases.[34]

Independent (7): United Mine Workers of America;[35] Pacific Coast Marine Firemen, Oilers, Water Tenders, and Wipers Association, two cases.[36]

Six injunction actions have been brought for 80-day injunctions under the provisions of section 208 of title II, Labor Management Relations Act, following appointment of boards of inquiry in national emergency situations as defined in the act.[37] These cases involved the following labor organizations:

American Federation of Labor (2): Atomic Trades and Labor Council;[38] International Longshoremen's Association.[39]

Congress of Industrial Organizations (2): National Maritime Union, two cases;[40] International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union.[41]

Independent (1): United Mine Workers of America.[42]

No injunction actions to enforce compliance with section 302 of title III, Labor Management Relations Act, dealing with health and welfare funds, and the check-off, among other things, have as yet been reported.

It is to be noted that while the injunction proceedings provided for in sections 10 (j) and 10 (l) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, are intended to provide summary relief against alleged unfair labor practices pending decisions by the National Labor Relations Board on whether in fact unfair labor practices were being committed, the National Labor Relations Board has reached a final decision on the merits of the disputes in only two such cases.[43]

POINT 3.—CONCILIATION SERVICE

"The Labor-Management Relations Act removed the United States Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor, where it had functioned for 34 years. It created a new Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service as an independent agency. This was a completely unjustified dismemberment of the Department of Labor. During the 34 years of its existence in the Department, the Conciliation Service successfully settled more than 100,000 cases where serious disputes had arisen. Just before the Service was transferred from the Department it was settling without a work stoppage over 90 percent of those cases in which no stoppage existed at the time a conciliator was assigned to the case. This record could not have been achieved unless the Service was operating successfully, efficiently, and fairly and had the confidence of both management and labor.

"The exercise of conciliation functions outside the Labor Department is inconsistent with the principle, which I have often stated, that labor functions must be centralized in a Cabinet department. This centralization is necessary to achieve coherence in the formulation of national labor policies and in the administration of our labor laws.

"The Service was removed from the Department by the Taft-Hartley Act on the announced ground that it could not be impartial so long as it was within the Department of Labor. I cannot state too strongly that I, as Secretary of Labor, consider myself to represent the more than 140,000,000 American people and every segment of our economy.

"Conciliation functions must be exercised impartially if they are to be successful, and the record of the Department during the 34 years it had the Conciliation Service shows this was done and can be done in the Department of Labor.

"This is not my opinion alone. The President's Labor-Management Conference in November 1945 recommended that the United States Conciliation Service 'be established as an effective and completely impartial agency within the Department of Labor.' Mr. Ira Mosher, chairman of the executive committee, and Mr. Raymond Smethurst, general counsel of the National Association of Manufacturers, and Mr. Eric Johnston for the Committee for Economic Development, together with all the major labor organizations, testified in hearings held during the Eightieth Congress before this committee that no new agency should be created for handling conciliation functions outside the Department of Labor. If their point of view, that it was not desirable to remove the Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor was sound then, it is sound now to restore the Service to the Department of Labor."

The Organic Act of the Department of Labor,[44] enacted by the Congress and approved by President Taft as one of his last official acts on March 4, 1913, gave to the Secretary of Labor the authority "to act as mediator and to appoint commissioners of conciliation in labor disputes whenever in his judgment the interests of industrial peace may require it to be done."[45] The United States Conciliation Service was developed under this grant of power from the Congress. Until the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947,[46] removed the Service from the Department of Labor and created the new independent Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service[47] to perform exactly the same kinds of mediation and conciliation services, but on a more formal and somewhat more narrow basis,[48] the Service was continuously operated in the Department of Labor for nearly 34 years, including both World War I and World War II.

The removal of the United States Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor not only deprived the Secretary of Labor of important conciliation functions but diminished the influence of the Department of Labor on behalf of stable labor-management relations, the promotion and maintenance of sound labor standards, and the advancement of sustained high levels of production and purchasing power and maximum employment opportunities.

The United States Conciliation Service was removed from the Department of Labor, notwithstanding the consistent record of success the Service had achieved in settling labor disputes. The Secretary of Labor pointed out in the course of his testimony before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on January 31, 1949, that—

"During the 34 years of its existence in the Department of Labor the United States Conciliation Service successfully settled more than 100,000 cases where serious disputes had arisen. Just before the Service was transferred from the Department it was settling without a work stoppage over 90 percent of those cases in which no stoppage existed at the time a conciliator was assigned to the case.[49]

Detailed figures in support of these statements were given by the late L. B. Schwellenbach, former Secretary of Labor, at hearings before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare in 1947.

"In the first year of free collective bargaining the Conciliation Service handled 18,757 cases. It settled 3,350 work stoppages, involving 2,668,000 employees, and received 7,001 Smith-Connally strike notices "Of the 14,092 disputes closed during the period January through November 1946, 12,067 were not stoppages at the time of assignment of a conciliator; 10,892, or 90.3 percent of the disputes that were not stoppages at the time of assignment were settled without a work stoppage occurring. It is significant that 63.3 percent of the strike cases handled by the Service during the period from April 1 through November 1946 were in the strike stage before a conciliator was assigned.

"Let me say that under the procedure conciliators are not assigned except upon the request of one or both of the parties. That is the procedure under which the Conciliation Service operates. When we were called in before a strike started, 90.3 percent of the cases were settled without any strikes." [50]

In the Thirty-fifth Annual Report of the Department of Labor for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1947, it was pointed out that—

"In the fiscal year 1947 conciliators were instrumental in aiding labor and management in the settlement of more than 16,711 labor-management disputes. This represented a decline of 2,129 over last year's case load. Labor disputes are now at the lowest period since the end of the war. Strikes are on the decline, as shown in reports issued by the Bureau of Labor Statistics. During the past year Bureau of Labor Statistics data show that there were 6,795 strikes involving 6,795,000 workers in contrast to 7,718 and 10,789,000 workers in the fiscal year 1946. During that year the country was torn by a number of Nation-wide strikes in basic industries.

* * * * * * *

"Despite the difficulties that labor and management have had in relearning the free collective-bargaining process, experience in the few months immediately preceding enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act gave us dramatic proof of the fact that collective bargaining can work. Agreements were reached through the processes of free collective bargaining in the steel industry, General Motors, Westinghouse, General Electric, Western Union, Radio Corp. of America, the men's clothing industry, the ladies' clothing industry, the textile industry, the Big Four meat packers, the Big Four rubber companies, and many others. These agreements worked out across the bargaining table by labor and management show that they are learning to work out their differences peacefully. In the first 6 months of this year the number of work stoppages was at its lowest since VJ-day. Not only was the number of strikes less than at any previous work period, but workers involved and idleness were less than one-fourth of the number involved in the same period of 1946 when reconversion problems resulted in widespread labor-management controversies." [51]

The attitude of the Department of Labor and the Conciliation Service in performing mediation and conciliation functions within the Department of Labor was made perfectly clear in the following statement included in the Department's thirty-fifth annual report:

"The major agreements consummated over the few months preceding the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act are wholesome proof of the fact that industrial relations have come of age in this country. As we make adjustments during this reconversion period from a war economy to a peace economy, the outlook for industrial peace improves to the same degree that we achieve economic stability and to the same degree that we allow the parties to work out their problems by themselves free of governmental interference and regulation. Labor and management have found to their dismay that Government interference and regulation act as a crutch upon which the parties rely, rather than helping them along the path of self-government. Just when labor and management are learning to walk without assistance, we must not set them back by a new dependence upon the crutch of Government regulation. A free-enterprise system cannot succeed in the absence of free collective bargaining. If we avoid the pitfalls of renewed Government interference and regulation, and with increased economic stability, collective bargaining can work even better than it has in the last few months. If Government participation is kept to a minimum, management and labor can work out their problems through the processes of free collective bargaining." [52]

The creation of a new independent Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, which was accomplished by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, only adds to the already numerous labor agencies.

The Eightieth Congress, in Public Law 162,[53] established the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government. That Commission, headed by former President Herbert Hoover, has submitted its first reports to the Congress. The first finding of that Commission in its first report [54] stated:

[54] General Management of the Executive Branch, report to the Congress by the Commission on Organization of the Executive Branch of the Government, February 1949.

"The executive branch is not organized into a workable number of major departments and agencies which the President can effectively direct, but is cut up into a large number of agencies, which divide responsibility and which are too great in number for effective direction from the top.

"Thousands of Federeal programs cannot be directed personally by the President. They must be grouped by related function and divided among a small number of principal assistants who are the heads of departments." [55]

Upon the basis of its study of the executive branch, the Hoover Commission came to the conclusion that—

"Any systematic effort to improve the organization and administration of the Government, therefore, must—

"1. Create a more orderly grouping of the functions of Government into major departments and agencies under the President." [56]

The Commission found that—

"(b) There are too many separate agencies, several of which are not combined in accordance with their major purposes. Consequently, there are overlaps, duplications, and inadequacies in determination of policies, and in the execution of programs with a resultant lack of a clear-cut mission for each department.

"(c) The line of authority from departmental heads through subordinates is often abridged by independent authorities granted to bureau or division heads, sometimes through congressional act or stipulations in appropriations. Department heads, in many instances, do not have authority commensurate with their responsibilities. Such bureau autonomy undermines the authority of both the President and the department head. There is, therefore, a lack of departmental integration in performing the department's major mission.

"(f) The department heads in most cases lack sufficient authority to assign within their departments such responsibility as would promote economy and efficiency.

* * * * * * *

"(m) Confusion in the Government agencies bewilders the citizen in his contracts with the Government." [57]

To cure this situation the Commission has recommended:

"Recommendation No. 12:

"The numerous agencies of the executive branch must be grouped into departments as nearly as possible by major purposes in order to give a coherent mission to each department.

"By placing related functions cheek by jowl the overlaps can be eliminated, and, of even greater importance, coordinated policies can be developed.

* * * * * * *

"Recommendation No. 14:

"Under the President, the heads of departments must hold full responsibility for the conduct of their departments. There must be a clear line of authority reaching down through every step of the organization and no subordinate should have authority independent from that of his superior." [58]

With respect to no department in the executive branch of the Government are the observations of the Hoover Commission more pertinent than they are with respect to the Department of Labor. This is particularly true in the light of the experience of 2 years of effort on the part of the executive branch of the Government to rebuild and strengthen the Department of Labor and the record of actions which have weakened and diminished the influence of the Department of Labor.

The Hoover Commission's Task Force Report on Departmental Management made in January 1949, attached to its first report as appendix E thereof,[59] found that there has been a general lack of any common conception of the function and organization of an executive department in the Federal Government and referred to the fact that a number of permanent administrative agencies headed by a single administrator have been created which are responsible to the President but which are not regarded as executive departments. Among the agencies to which the report specifically referred was the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service.[60] The result of the practice of creating new independent agencies in the labor field, report pointed out, has been that "The Labor Department has been left primarily with one regulatory task and one statistical activity."[61]

In his message to the Congress of June 11, 1946, vetoing the proposed Federal Mediation Act of 1946 (Case bill)[62] President Truman discussed in some detail the considerations involved in the setting up of an agency outside the Department of Labor to handle mediation and conciliation functions. He said of the proposal in that bill to establish a new five-man Federal Mediation Board outside the Department of Labor that—

"I consider the establishment of this new agency to be inconsistent with the the principles of good administration. As I have previously stated, it is my opinion that Government today demands reorganization along the lines which the Congress has set forth in the Reorganization Act of 1945, that is, the organization of Government activity into the fewest number of Government agencies consistent with efficiency. Control of purely administrative matters should be grouped as much as possible under members of the Cabinet, who are in turn responsible to the President.

"The proposed Federal Mediation Board would have no quasi-judicial or quasi-legislative functions. It would be purely an administrative agency. Surely, functions of this kind should be concentrated in the Department of Labor.

* * * * * * *

"The bill proposes to transfer that Service [the United States Conciliation Service] and its functions to the newly formed Federal Mediation Board. To me this is the equivalent of creating a separate and duplicate Department of Labor, depriving the Secretary of Labor of many of his principal responsibilities and placing the conciliation and mediation functions in an independent body.

"In the eyes of Congress and of the public the President and the Secertary of Labor would remain responsible for the exercise of the mediation and conciliation functions in labor disputes, while, in fact those functions would be conducted by another body not fully responsible to either.

"As far back as September 6, 1945, I said in a message to Congress: 'Meanwhile, plans for strengthening the Department of Labor, and bringing under it functions belonging to it, are going forward.' The establishment of the proposed Federal Mediation Board is a backward step."[63]

In his message of June 20, 1947, vetoing the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947,[64] the President referred to the unanimous recommendation of the National Labor-Management Conference in November 1947 that the United States Conciliation Service to be strengthened within the Department of Labor. The President went on to say:

"* * * But this bill removes the Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor. The new name for the Service would carry with it no new dignity or new functions. The evidence does not support the theory that the conciliation function would be better exercised and protected by an independent agency outside the Department of Labor. Indeed, the Service would lose the important day-to-day support of factual research in industrial relations available from other units of the Department. Furthermore, the removal of the Conciliation Service from the Department of Labor would be contrary to the praiseworthy policy of the Congress to centralize related governmental units within the major Government departments."[65]

The Department of Labor is directed by act of Congress to have concern for the welfare of the approximately 44,346,000[66] nonagricultural wage earners of the United States. In carrying ont this responsibility, the Department of Labor no less serves the general interests and general welfare of the people of the United States than does the Department of Agriculture in connection with its manifold activities in the interest of the 6,763,000[67] farmers of the United States. There has never been any serious doubt expressed as to whether it is proper to house within the Department of Agriculture services and agencies devoted to advancing the interests of agriculture which involve a balancing of the farmers' interests against those of the people as a whole. Similarly there should be no question that it is equally proper to house within the Department of Labor the various agencies and services which are concerned with the wage earning population of the United States.

The restoration of the United States Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor is essential to the restoration of the Department of Labor as an effective Cabinet Department. The reorganization of this Department is in the interest of all the people of the United States, not merely the wage-earning population. After all, the Department of Labor cannot be strengthened if each individual proposal for accomplishing this objective is to be opposed. The restoration of the United States Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor is part of the general program of the President for rebuilding and strengthening the Department of Labor. It cannot be viewed separately from the attainment of that objective.

POINT 4.—GENERAL COUNSEL

"The Taft-Hartley Act abandoned the uniform procedures of the Administrative Procedure Act of 1946 and singled out the National Labor Relations Board as the one administrative agency in our Government which should receive different treatment. The law set up a general counsel who has broad discretionary powers and who is independent of the Board. This is an unwise and unnecessary division of the Board's functions.

"The administrative procedures established under the original National Labor Relations Act, which would be restored under this bill, provided for the internal separation of the judicial and prosecuting functions of the Board in accordance with the provisions of the Administrative Procedure Act. There is no reason why any additional separation should be required.

"Furthermore, the duty of the general counsel, under the Taft-Hartley Act, to determine what complaints should come before the Board places a tremendous amount of power in the hands of one man since it can be used to control policy in enforcing the act. The division of authority between the Board and the general counsel keeps the Board from considering issues vital and germane to its decisions.

"The President in his veto message of June 20, 1947, predicted that the separation of power between the general counsel and the Board——

"'* * * would invite conflict between the National Labor Relations Board and its general counsel, since the general counsel would decide, without any right of appeal by employers and employees, whether charges were to be heard by the Board, and whether orders of the Board were to be referred to the court for enforcement. By virtue of this unlimited authority, a single administrative official might usurp the Board's responsibility for establishing policy under the act.'

"This warning, like others contained in that veto message, has proved to be strikingly accurate."

Section 3 (d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, provides:

"There shall be a general counsel of the Board who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, for a term of 4 years. The general counsel of the Board shall exercise general supervision over all attorneys employed by the Board (other than trial examiners and legal assistants to Board members) and over the officers and employees in the regional offices. He shall have final authority, on behalf of the Board, in respect of the investigation of charges and issuance of complaints under section 10, and in respect of the prosecution of such complaints before the Board, and shall have such other duties as the Board may prescribe or as may be provided by law."

Under this provision, the general counsel has unlimited discretion, "on behalf of the Board," over the investigation of charges and the issuance of complaints of unfair labor practices. The exercise of this discretion by refusing to issue a complaint cannot be reviewed by the Board. Three consequences flow from this statutory provision: (1) In such cases the general counsel is both prosecutor and judge, exercising in fact quasi-judicial functions similar to those entrusted to the Board, and his decisions cannot even be reviewed by the courts; (2) the general counsel has an absolute control over the cases which he will allow to come before the Board; and (3) conflicting rules can be established in similar cases, because the general counsel can refuse to issue a complaint in a case which under Board decisions would be an unfair labor practice.

Section 3 (d) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, provides that the general counsel shall have "such other duties as the Board may prescribe or as may be provided by law."

Regulations of the Board [68] have delegated to the general counsel the authority to seek compliance with orders of the Board and to apply to the courts for temporary restraining orders in appropriate cases. The general counsel is further authorized to act for the Board in prosecuting appeals through the appellate courts.

The processing of petitions filed under section 9 of the act has also been made a function of the general counsel subject to the regulations of the Board, as has the processing of employee votes on an "employer's last offer" under sections 203 (c) and 209 (b) of title II of the Labor-Management Relations Act.

The general counsel is delegated full and final authority to initiate and prosecute injunction actions under section 10 (j) and section 10 (l) and proceedings under section 10 (k) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

The general counsel has been authorized by the Board to receive the affidavits required by section 9 (h) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended; to maintain an appropriate file thereof; and to make available to the public, on such terms as he may prescribe, appropriate information concerning such affidavits.

The foregoing powers of the general counsel are limited only to the extent that his refusal to issue a notice of hearing on a petition filed under section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, or his dismissal, of any such petition, are subject to review by the Board. The general counsel is not authorized to make information contained in the affidavit files open to unsupervised inspection.

The Thirteenth Annual Report of the National Labor Relations Board clearly demonstrates the significance of the separation of functions by the general counsel and the Board. Table 7 of appendix A of the report shows that 92.8 percent of all unfair labor practice cases closed during the fiscal year 1948 were closed before any formal action was taken. Cases were closed as a result of withdrawal of the charges filed in 45.3 percent of the cases and of adjustment after the filing of charges in 15.3 percent of the cases. Charges were dismissed in 32 percent of the cases. The percentage of cases closed by dismissal ranged from 34.7 percent in cases resulting from charges filed under section 8 of the National Labor Relations Act, prior to amendment, to 27.7 percent in cases resulting from charges filed under section 8 (b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act.[69]

The nearly one-third of the cases involving charges of unfair labor practices in which the charges were dismissed by the regional offices, which operate under the exclusive supervision of the general counsel without any review by the Board, represents the potential scope of the general counsel's discretion in exercising functions conferred upon him by the Labor-Management Relations Act.

POINT 5.—MULTIFARIOUS ELECTIONS

"By providing for numerous elections—representation, union shop, employer's last offer—the Taft-Hartley Act keeps the relation between employers and unions in an unsettled condition, instead of on the basis of stability and confidence so necessary in assuring free collective bargaining."

Under the Wagner Act elections were conducted in two categories of cases: (1) where a labor organization or other employee representative sought to be certified as the statutory bargaining agent of employees and (2) where an employer petitioned for the determination of conflicting claims to recognition by two or more labor organizations.

The Taft-Hartley Act, on the other hand, makes reference to elections in at least 12 of its sections and subsections.

(1) Section 8 (a) (3) permits the making of a union-shop agreement only after the Board has certified that at least a majority of the employees eligible to vote have voted to authorize the making of such an agreement in an election as provided in section 9 (e).

[69] Thirteenth Annual Report of the National Labor Relations Board for the Fiscal Year Ending June 30, 1948, table 7, appendix A, p. 104.

(2) Section 9 (b) (1) provides for a vote by professional employees to determine whether a majority desire to be excluded from a bargaining unit which represents nonprofessional employees.

(3) Section 9 (b) (2) provides for an election to determine whether a majority of employees in a craft unit desire separate representation where a different bargaining unit has previously been established (so-called craft-severance elections).

(4) Section 9 (b) (3) prohibits inclusion of plant guards in bargaining units which include other employees and presumably would give rise to separate elections among guards to determine their collective-bargaining representatives.

(5) Section 9 (c) (1) (A) (i) provides for petitions by labor organizations or other employee representatives for certification, following a Board-conducted election, as statutory bargaining agent.

(6) Section 9 (c) (1) (A) (ii) authorizes the Board to entertain petitions by employees for, and to hold an election on, decertification of a labor organization or other representative perviously designated.

(7) 9 (c) (1) (B) authorizes a petition by an employer, to be followed by a Board-conducted election, in situations where he alleges that a union is claiming recognition as collective-bargaining agent of the petitioner's employees. (Formerly such petitions were entertained by the Board only when two or more labor organizations asserted conflicting claims.)

(8) Section 9 (c) (3) requires a run-off election in the event that none of the choices on the ballot has received a majority. It further requires that the run-off ballot shall provide a selection between the two choices receiving the largest and second largest number of votes cast in the election. (Run-off elections, while not required by the Wagner Act, were conducted under rules and regulations of the Board. This provision of the Taft-Hartley Act alters the practice of the Board, however, in that whereas formerly the "neither" or "none" choice was eliminated unless it received a plurality of votes cast in the original election, this choice must now appear on the run-off ballot if it received the highest or second highest number of votes.)

(9) Sec. 9 (e) (1) requires the filing of a petition by a labor organization for a secret ballot among the employees represented by it to determine whether such labor organization should be authorized to negotiate a union-shop agreement.

(10) Sec. 9 (e) (2) permits the filing of a petition by the employees in a bargaining unit covered by a union-shop agreement for a secret ballot to determine whether such authority shall be rescinded.

(11) Sec. 203 (c) directs the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service to suggest (in labor disputes affecting commerce) the submission to employees of the "employer's last offer" for approval or rejection in a secret ballot.

(12) Sec. 209 (b) directs the National Labor Relations Board to take a secret ballot of the employees of each employer involved in a national-emergency strike on the question whether they wish to accept the "final offer of settlement made by their employer as stated by him."

During the fiscal year 1948, the National Labor Relations Board conducted a total of 21,277 elections, in which 2,245,734 employees were eligible to vote and 1,971,087 ballots were cast. Of these, 17,958 were union-shop authorizations polls and 3,319 were votes on question of representation. The largest number of elections were conducted in any previous year was 6,920 in 1947. The total number of elections conducted in 1948 is approximately 58 percent of the number conducted during the entire previous existence of the Board, the Board having conducted 36,969 elections during that period.

While both sections 9 (c), relating to representation elections, and 9 (e), regulating union-shop authorization, contain subsections stating that no election shall be directed in any bargaining unit within which a valid election has been held in the preceding 12-month period, these subsections do not remove the possibility of a union-shop referendum being held during the same year in which a representation election is conducted (Gilchrist Lumber Co., 21 LRRM 1302).

In a brief period of time, it is possible that a bargaining unit may be polled for: (1) representation purposes; (2) to authorize or deauthorize the negotiation of a union-shop agreement; and (3) to accept or reject an employer's last offer in a dispute situation.

The Thirteenth Annual Report of the Board shows that on June 30, 1948, there were 2,836 representation cases pending although the number of such cases filed during the year was only 7,038. In comparison, in fiscal year 1947, although 10,677 representation cases were filed, only 2,615 were pending at the end of the fiscal year. At the end of fiscal year 1948, therefore, there were 40 representation cases pending to every 100 filed during the year. At the end of the previous year, on the other hand, there were only approximately 24 representation cases pending to every 100 filed during the year.

The union shop authorization election provisions of the act have resulted in an overwhelming approval of union security. Ballots in favor of the union shop were cast by 82.9 percent of the eligible voters and only 5.1 percent voted in the negative. The remaining 12 percent failed to vote or had their ballots challenged. Unions were authorized to bargain for union-shop arrangements in 98 percent of the polls. This vote of approval is estimated to have cost the Government approximately 40 cents per vote.

The First Annual Report of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service, p. 35, sets forth a tabulation of the number of secret ballots on the employer's last offer proposed by the Service in accordance with sec. 203 (c). For reasons stated in the report, these figures are not considered accurate but it is indicated that 362 ballots were taken during fiscal 1948. With respect to such ballots, the report contains the following criticism of this requirement of the Taft-Hartley Act:

"It is the attitude of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service that a secret ballot on the employer's last offer may be useful under certain circumstances. The Service feels, however, that indiscriminately proposing a secret ballot in every dispute situation serves no useful purpose but may on the contrary destroy the usefulness of the secret ballot in those situations in which it may be successfully utilized to avert a work stoppage."

In every national emergency dispute the results of the ballot conducted by the NLRB pursuant to 209 (b) of the act have been overwhelmingly for rejection of the employer's last offer. The Annual Report of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service states that "it is fair to assume that the likelihood of any ballot in the future having a contrary result, is small and remote." The report further states: "These ballots are expensive to conduct, and the experience of a year demonstrates that they do nothing to promote settlement of a dispute. To the contrary, they are a disrupting influence in collective bargaining and mediation."

In an address to an audience of employers (Daily Labor Report, (BNA) No. 14, Jan. 14, 1949) the general counsel of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association stated that employers would suffer no great loss and indeed would gain in some instances from a repeal of seven features of the Taft-Hartley Act. The seven features listed by him included those provisions requiring a multiplicity of elections.

POINT 6—PEACEFUL PICKETING

"The Taft-Hartley Act completely outlaws peaceful picketing in many situations, even such types as have enjoyed protection of our courts for several decades. Thus, employees who picket an employer because he persists in making them work on partially finished goods produced in another plant at sweatshop wages may be found guilty of the unfair labor practice of engaging in an unlawful secondary boycott."

Prior to the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, peaceful picketing to the extent that it has the purpose of informing the public of the existence of a labor dispute, was regarded by the courts as within the protection of the right of freedom of speech guaranteed by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States.[70]

Under the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, peaceful picketing in aid of a secondary boycott, as defined in the act, is an unfair labor practice. For example, in the Sealright case, the striking printing union was charged with picketing the premises of two companies which handled or transported products for their employer, against whom they were on strike. The picketing was peaceful and resulted in employees of the picketed concerns, members of a different union, declining to handle Sealright products. The Board's general counsel obtained an injunction.[71] On appeal, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit,[72] after stating that it was settled by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court that picketing, when resorted to peacefully for the legitimate purpose of publicizing grievances, is within the protection of the first amendment, nevertheless sustained the issuance of the injunction pointing out the broad sweep of the act with respect to peaceful picketing in aid of a secondary boycott as defined in the act:

"The debate here is whether peaceful picketing may constitutionally be confined by legislation to the area of industrial dispute, or, in plainer English, to the premises of the employer with whom the dispute is in progress. It is of course settled by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court that picketing, when resorted to peacefully for the legitimate purpose of publicizing grievances, is within the protection of the first amendment. Thornhill v. Alabama, 310 U. S. 88; Carlson v. California, 310 U. S. 106; A. F. of L. v. Swing, 312 U. S. 321. Congress has now undertaken, in the exercise of its power under the commerce clause, to prohibit altogether or sharply to curtail the use by labor organizations of certain economic weapons which they have heretofore freely employed. In an effort to narrow the area of industrial strife, and thus to safeguard the national interest in the free flow of commerce, it has in effect banned picketing when utilized to conscript in a given struggle the employees of an employer who is not himself a party to the dispute. Such we understand to be the purport of section 8 (b) (4) (A) of the act.

"The picketing in this instance falls plainly within the terms of that statute. Its primary object was to induce the employees of Los Angeles, Seattle, and west coast to engage in a concerted refusal to handle Sealright's goods and thus to force their employers to cease handling or transporting the same. There can be no doubt about that any more than there can be doubt of the success of the endeavor. Appellants say they were merely picketing Sealright's products and were not engaged in a secondary boycott as that term is commonly understood. The statute, however, does not use the terms 'hot cargo', 'picketing the products,' or 'secondary boycott.' It broadly sweeps within its prohibition an entire pattern of industrial warfare deemed by Congress to be harmful to the public interest."[73] [Italics supplied.]

The broad sweep of the act's provisions with respect to secondary boycotts is discussed under point 14.

POINT 7—CHECK-OFF

"The Taft-Hartley Act places unreasonable restraints on many aspects of collective-bargaining agreements. The check-off—a legitimate labor-management practice—has been surrounded with many unnecessary procedural requirements, violation of which carries a criminal penalty, to be detriment of harmonious relations between labor and management."

Section 302 of title III, Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, provides in part as follows:

"Sec. 302. (a) It shall be unlawful for any employer to pay or deliver, or to agree to pay or deliver, any money or other thing of value to any representative of his employees who are employed in an industry affecting commerce.

"(b) It shall be unlawful for any representative of any employees who are employed in an industry affecting commerce to receive or accept, or to agree to receive or accept, from the employer of such employees any money or other thing of value.

"(c) The provisions of this section shall not be applicable * * * (4) with respect to money deducted from the wages of employees in payment of membership dues in a labor organization: Provided, That the employer has received from each employee, on whose account such deductions are made, a written assignment which shall not be irrevocable for a period of more than one year, or beyond the termination date of the applicable collective agreement, whichever occurs sooner;"

Section 302 of the act makes a violation of its prohibitions a crime punishable by up to 1 year's imprisonment and fines of as much as $10,000. Violations of the section may also be enjoined in the Federal courts without regard to the Norris-LaGuardia Act or sections 6 and 20 of the Clayton Act.

The check-off of unions dues has a long historical background and was until the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act a common practice in industry. In 1945 an estimated 5½ million workers were employed under collective-bargaining agreements which provided some form of check-off of union dues. Most of the agreements provided for an automatic check-off.[74]

Significant aspects of the check-off have been described in the following excerpt from the Dynamics of Industrial Democracy by Messrs. Golden and Ruttenberg:

"A word about the check-off. It is a device used by management for years to collect various obligations of workers. The Federal Government uses it to collect social-security taxes from workers. Each pay period management deducts from worker's pay envelopes such items as cash advances, group insurance, restaurant bills, rent, company-store bills, safety shoes, and various other obligations that workers incur from time to time. The only instance when management makes a big point of refusing the check-off is when unions ask that it be used to collect the monthly dues of their members. This is not done on logical grounds, since obviously management cannot accept the check-off device for every other obligation of its employees and deny it for union dues without revealing an underlying motive for such discrimination. The refusal of management to grant the check-off of union dues is merely a barometer of its basic attitude toward unions. To us—and also to most other unionists—opposition to the check-off of union dues reflects a management attitude that looks upon unions and collective bargaining as unavoidable evils, to be recognized for the time being until the opportune moment arrives to destroy both. As management increasingly realizes that a return of nonunion days is a vain dream, the discrimination against union dues in the use of the check-off device, no doubt, will be removed. The check-off is only a side issue." [75]

State laws, in a number of States, restrict the check-off by requiring the written consent from the individual employee.[76] Other States place other restrictions upon check-offs.[77] Still others permit automatic check-offs.[78] In other States, while the subject is not covered by a specific statute, there are statutes restricting assignment of wages in general.[79] The confusion caused by these different statutory requirements for employers and unions operating in several States would eliminated by a Federal law making such statutes inapplicable to employers whose operations affect interstate commerce, as would be done by section 107 of the proposed National Labor Relations Act of 1949.

POINT 8—RIGHT OF STRIKERS TO VOTE

"One of the most serious consequences of the law is the denial, not only of the right to reinstatement, as under the Wagner Act, but also of the right to vote in representation elections while granting a vote to strikebreaker replacements. The law thus permits an employer who is faced with a strike to improve wages and hours in his plant, to hire sufficient nonunion replacements to out-vote the members of the union and thereupon to demand an election, the result of which can well be to oust the union from the plant."

Section 9 (c) (3) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, provides, among other things, that "Employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall not be eligible to vote [in a representation election]." [80] This provision contrasts with the provisions of the original Wagner Act which, as interpreted by the National Labor Relations Board, did not make voting by strikers turn upon their right to reinstatement. The latest decisions of the Board prior to the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, ruled that both strikers and replacements were eligible to vote in an election with respect to the collective-bargaining representative.[81] Where strikers should have been reinstated, the replacement would not be eligible to vote, regardless of whether the strike resulted from an unfair labor practice.[82]

In such situations the strikers lost their right to vote only where the labor dispute was no longer current and where the strikers had obtained regular and substantially equivalent employment, so as to be no longer an "employee" within the meaning of section 2 (3) of the act.[83]

[83] National Labor Relations Act (49 Stat. 449).

The change necessitated by the Taft-Hartley Act is demonstrated by the Pipe Machinery Co. case in which the P. M. Co. Independent Union petitioned for certification during an economic strike by the International Association of Machinists, which, prior to the strike, had been the bargaining representative.[84] The strike began in February 1947 and the plant was closed down until May 12, 1947, when it was reopened with replacements who thereafter were given permanent employment when all except 31 of the strikers, having been previously notified, refused to return to work. The P. M. Co. Independent Union having then been formed, petitioned for an election. The Board observed that "there is no indication that any of the individuals currently on strike ever made an unconditional application for reinstatement," and concluded:[85]

POINT 9.—EMPLOYER PETITIONS

"Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, the employer can, by petitioning for a choice of collective-bargaining representative, determine the time most advantageous for himself to call for an election, even when not faced with conflicting claims for recognition. The employer can thereby stifle and thwart organization efforts and assure a year's freedom from union organization."

Section 9 (c) (1) (B) of the National Labor Relations Act as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, provides:

"Whenever a petition shall have been filed in accordance with such regulations as may be prescribed by the Board—

(B) by an employer alleging that one or more individuals or labor organizations have presented to him a claim to be recognized as the representative defined in section 9 (a);

the Board shall investigate such petition, and if it has reasonable cause to believe a question of representation affecting commerce exists shall provide for an appropriate hearing upon due notice * * *. If the Board finds upon the record of such hearing that such question of representation exists, it shall direct an election by secret ballot and shall certify the results thereof."[86]

The dangerous possibilities of section 9 (c) (1) (B) were recognized by both the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare which reported out the Taft bill (S. 1126) in the first session of the Eightieth Congress and by legal writers. The Majority Report of the Committee pointed out that the regulations of the National Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act[87] did not permit an employer to petition for representation election where only one union was involved, and acknowledged that the Board's rules had "been defended on the ground that if an employer could petition at any time he could effectively frustrate the desire of his employees to organize by asking for an election on the first day the union organizers distributed leaflets at his plant."[88]

The Report admitted that this "may be a valid argument for placing some limitation upon an employer's right to petition,"[89] but claimed that the danger to which an unrestricted right of the employer to petition for a representation election could give rise could be prevented by requiring that the petition recite that the union named in the petition was claiming a majority of the employees and was demanding exclusive bargaining rights.[90] Whether or not these safeguards would have been sufficient, they were not put in the Labor Management Relations Act as enacted by this Congress.

The significance of employer petitions has also been pointed out by Professor Archibald Cox of Harvard Law School who has written:

"The amendments also make a number of minor modifications in representation proceedings. One permits an employer to file a petition for investigation and certification whenever it has been presented a claim for recognition as the exclusive bargaining representative. Another change forbids the Board to hold an election in any bargaining unit or subdivision thereof, within which a valid election has been held less than 12 months earlier. The fear has sometimes been expressed that these two modifications taken together, would enable employers to file petitions putting a union to a premature election and thus, when the unions were defeated to escape collective bargaining for a year." [91]

Professor Cox thought that the danger could be partially avoided by unions delaying their claims of recognition until they are ready to proceed to an election.[92] However, this would not cover the case where a few antiunion employees, in order to forestall an outside union, might claim, or would be induced by the employer to claim, recognition as a local independent union. Professor Cox recognized "the risk of an unscrupulous employer's instigating a subservient group to present a claim for recognition in order that it might file a petition," but claimed this could be minimized "by the Board's refusing to proceed to an election, unless the group claiming recognition is able to show substantial representation among the employees." [93]

While an early decision of the Board appeared to support this view,[94] a later decision indicates that in an employer's petition no showing of substantial representation is necessary. In its earlier decision the Board held that where, at a representation hearing, a union actually disavows its claim to representation of a majority of the employees in the unit, the employer's petition will be dismissed. Where, however, the union does not appear at the representation hearing and nothing is alleged concerning the extent of its representation of the employees, the Board has subsequently ruled that an employer's petition will not be dismissed.[95] It was pointed out that the words of the act do not require an employer's petition to make such an allegation and that, in any event, the employer could not make an investigation of the facts on which such a claim could be based without committing the unfair labor practice of interfering with union activity of his employees.

It is pertinent to point out, on this connection, that under section 9 (c) (1) (A) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, a union's petition for representation is expressly required to allege that a substantial number of employees wish to be represented. As has been pointed out, "Under the Taft Act, the Board made it clear that it will accept union petitions only where there is a showing that at least 30 percent of the employees in the unit have authorized the union to represent them." [96]

POINT 10.—HEALTH AND WELFARE FUNDS

"The law removes from the area of free collective bargaining a subject which all must agree is a proper objective of workers—welfare funds established for the humanitarian purpose of protecting the health and security of employees. It is made a crime for employers and employees to establish such funds except under rigid rules limiting their purposes and methods of administration. Furthermore, violations may be enjoined without regard to the Clayton Act and Norris-LaGuardia Act safeguards."

Section 302 of the Taft-Hartley Act states that—

"(a) It shall be unlawful for any employer to pay or deliver, or to agree to pay or deliver, any money or other thing of value to any representative of any of his employees who are employed in an industry affecting commerce.

* * * * * * *

"(c) The provisions of this section shall not be applicable * * * (5) with respect to money or other thing of value paid to a trust fund established by such representative, for the sole and exclusive benefit of the employees of such employer, and their families and dependents (or of such employees, families and dependents jointly with the employees of other employers making similar payments, and their families and dependents): Provided, That (A) such payments are held in trust for the purpose of paying, either from principal or income or both, for the benefit of employees, their families and dependents, for medical or hospital care, pensions on retirement or death of employees, compensation for injuries or illness resulting from occupational activity or insurance to provide any of the foregoing, or unemployment benefits or life insurance, disability and sickness insurance, or accident insurance; (B) the detailed basis on which such payments are to be made is specified in a written agreement with the employer, and employees and employers are equally represented in the administration of such fund, together with such neutral persons as the representatives of the employers and the representatives of the employees may agree upon and in the event the employer and employee groups deadlock on the administration of such fund and there are no neutral persons empowered to break such deadlock, such agreement provides that the two groups shall agree on an impartial umpire to decide such dispute, or in event of their failure to agree within a reasonable length of time, an impartial umpire to decide such dispute, shall, on petition of either group, be appointed by the district court of the United States for the district where the trust fund has its principal office, and shall also contain provisions for an annual audit of the trust fund, a statement of the results of which shall be available for inspection by interested persons at the principal office of the trust fund and at such other places as may be designated in such written agreement; and (C) such payments as are intended to be used for the purpose of providing pensions or annuities for employees are made to a separate trust which provides that the funds held therein cannot be used for any purpose other than paying such pensions or annuities.

"(d)" Any person who willfully violates any of the provisions of this section shall, upon conviction thereof, be guilty of a misdemeanor and be subject to a fine of not more than $10,000 or to imprisonment for not more than one year or both."

A glance at the above provisions of the act suffices to show that they are complicated, rigid, and burdensome. In view of the millions of employees who are dependent on these funds for security—the benefits provided by the Social Security Act are now obviously inadequate with the rise in the cost of living—it would appear wise to encourage the establishment of health and welfare funds, rather than encumber them with burdensome restrictions. Any discouragement to the setting up of voluntary funds can only add to the burden of the Federal Government. This was pointed out prior to the passage of the act.[97]

The supposed justification for the restrictions placed on welfare funds by section 302 was the alleged diversion of funds from the purposes for which they were created.[98] It has been held that not even a majority of the members of a union could vote, against the wishes of a minority, to divert sick and burial benefit funds from the purposes to which they were originally dedicated (Liggett v. Koirunen, 23 L. R. R. M. 2035 (Minn. Sup. Ct., 1948)). (See Low v. Harris, 90 F. (2d) 783 (C. C. A. 7); Harris, ex rel. Carpenters Union v. Backman, 160 Or. 520, 86 P. (2d) 456 (Oregon Sup. Ct.).) These decisions bore no references to the Labor Management Act, 1947 and rested solely on equitable principles established under State law by judicial decision. It should also be noted that most welfare funds were prior to the enactment of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, either jointly administered by employers and unions or are administered primarily by an insurance company.[99]

Section 302 has criminal, rather than civil, sanctions, namely a fine of not over $10,000 and imprisonment of not over 1 year (subsection (d)). To escape the consequent risk of accidentally making or carrying out an agreement concerning a welfare fund in violation of section 302, one party secured an opinion from the Solicitor of Labor and from the Attorney General of the United States as to the validity of the proposed agreement.[1] However, such an opinion would not be binding upon either the Attorney General or the courts, or upon employers or labor organizations, in criminal proceedings against the trustees of such a fund. While a few cases have been decided concerning welfare funds as a result of civil actions,[2] the danger of being subjected to criminal prosecution in setting up new welfare funds is always present.

POINT 11.—UNION SECURITY: RESTRICTIVE STATE LAWS PREVAIL

"The Taft-Hartley Act impaired legitimate union security by providing that where State laws are more restrictive than the Federal statute the State laws should prevail. As a result of this provision even union shops are banned in some industries engaged in interstate commerce."

Section 14 (b) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by title I of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, provides:

"Nothing in this act shall be construed as authorizing the execution or application of agreements requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment in any State or Territory in which such execution or application is prohibited by State or Territorial law." [3]

Although the Labor-Management Relations Act did not change the declarations in the National Labor Relations Act that the national labor policy is founded on the principle and procedures of collective bargaining in interstate trade, commerce, and industry, section 14 (b) has had the effect of drastically curtailing the scope of such bargaining in interstate commerce industries. During the time when labor-management relations were under investigation by the Congress in 1947, 11 States [4] took action to ban by law all types of union security agreements.[5] Prior to this time only two States, Nevada and Florida, had provisions of law designed to remove completely the subject of union security from the realm of collective bargaining. In addition to the outright ban on closed shops, the laws of six [6] other States at the present time provide for various restrictions and conditions in connection with union security provisions, or declare such provisions against public policy without providing enforcement procedures.

Thus, in some States unions and employers can make the kind of union shop agreements which is permitted by the National Labor Relations Act, as amended,[7] while in others they cannot, even though they are engaged in interstate commerce or in activities which affect interstate commerce. The result is confusion and uncertainty for both unions and employers. Section 14 (b) is a major handicap to this development of fair, clear, and nondiscriminatory treatment of employees in interstate trade, commerce, and industry with respect to union security.

POINT 12.—POLITICAL CONTRIBUTIONS AND EXPENDITURES BY LABOR UNIONS

"The Taft-Hartley Act's broad ban upon political contributions and expenditures by labor organizations, in my opinion, is unfair and undemocratic. I consider this to be discriminatory legislation because it selects labor organizations as the only type of voluntary associations which are to be denied effective political participation."

Section 304 of title III of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, provides:

"Sec. 304. Section 313 of the Federal Corrupt Practices Act, 1925 (U. S. C., 1940 edition, title 2, sec. 251; supp. V, title 50, App., sec. 1509) as amended, is amended to read as follows:

"'Sec. 313. It is unlawful for any national bank, or any corporation organized by authority of any law of Congress, to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election to any political office, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any political office, or for any corporation whatever or any labor organization to make a contribution or expenditure in connection with any election at which Presidential and Vice Presidential electors or a Senator or Representative in, or a Delegate or Resident Commissioner to Congress are to be voted for, or in connection with any primary election or political convention or caucus held to select candidates for any of the foregoing offices, or for any candidate, political committee, or other person to accept or receive any contribution prohibited by this section. Every corporation or labor organization which makes any contribution or expenditure in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $5,000; and every officer or director of any corporation, or officer of any labor organization, who consents to any contribution or expenditure by the corporation or labor organization, as the case may be, in violation of this section shall be fined not more than $1,000 or imprisoned for not more than 1 year, or both. any agency or employee representation committee or plan, in which employees participate and which exists for the purpose, in whole or in part, of dealing with employers concerning grievances, labor disputes, wages, rates of pay, hours of employment, or conditions of work.' "

The scope of section 304 of the Taft-Hartley Act has been considered by the courts in two cases. In the first case arising under this section the Congress of Industrial Organizations and Philip Murray, its president, were charged with making expenditures in connection with a Federal election by publishing and circulating in the CIO News an editorial by Mr. Murray favoring one of the candidates in a special election held on July 15, 1947, to elect a representative to Congress in the Third Congressional District of the State of Maryland. The Federal district judge before whom this case was heard held that the section was an unconstitutional deprivation of freedom of speech, freedom of press, and freedom of assembly, guaranteed protection by the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States.[8]

On appeal, the United States Supreme Court sustained the district court's dismissal of the indictment, not however, on the ground of the unconstitutionality of the statutory provision but solely for the reason that the provision did not apply to the actions of the defendants in the case.[9]

In the other case brought under the section, another Federal district court has held, however, that the act prohibits a union from financing a newspaper advertisement and radio broadcast advocating the defeat of a candidate in a congressional election.[10]

Section 304 ignores the basic difference in nature and purpose between a corporation whose primary purpose is profit, and a labor organization, whose primary purpose is the promotion of good living standards and working conditions for its members. The members of labor organizations are not ordinarily able, as corporation officials, to make sizable individual contributions to political campaigns.[11]

Labor organizations are the only type of voluntary unincorporated associations whose political activities have been restricted.[12] Employers' trade associations, to mention only one such type, are not subject to any comparable restriction on their political activities.

POINT 13.—DAMAGE SUITS

"The Taft-Hartley Act provides for damage suits in the Federal courts for breaches of collective bargaining agreements and for violation of the prohibitions in the act against secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes. These provisions throw upon the Federal courts the task of deciding many issues which should be settled by the parties themselves within the framework of their agreements. Furthermore, the burden of untangling the complicated economic problems out of which the evils of unjustifiable secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes arise is one that administrative agencies dealing continuously wtih employer-employee relations are far better equipped to handle than the Federal courts, where dockets are already seriously overcrowded. These provisions assume an attitude of hostility between employers and unions which is wholly incompatible with the maintenance of peaceful collective bargaining relations and with the assumptions upon which our entire national labor policy is founded."

Actions in the Federal courts against labor organizations are provided for in two sections of the Labor-Management Relations Act. Suits for breach of contract may be brought under section 301 title III, of the act, which provides as follows:

"Sec. 301. (a) Suits for violation of contracts between an employer and a labor organization representing employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this act, or between any such labor organizations, may be brought in any district court of the United States having jurisdiction of the parties, without respect to the amount in controversy or without regard to the citizenship of the parties.

"(b) Any labor organization which represents employees in an industry affecting commerce as defined in this act and any employer whose activities affect commerce as defined in this act shall be bound by the acts of its agents. Any such labor organization may sue or be sued as an entity and in behalf of the employees whom it represents in the courts of the United States. Any money judgment against a labor organization in a district court of the United States shall be enforceable only against the organization as an entity and against its assets, and shall not be enforceable against any individual member or his assets.

"(c) For the purposes of actions and proceedings by or against labor organizations in the district courts of the United States, district courts shall be deemed to have jurisdiction of a labor organization (1) in the district in which such organization maintains its principal office, or (2) in any district in which its duly authorized officers or agents are engaged in representing or acting for employee members.

"(d) The service of summons, subpena, or other legal process of any court of the United States upon an officer or agent of a labor organization, in his capacity as such, shall constitute service upon the labor organization.

"(e) For the purposes of this section, in determining whether any person in acting as an 'agent' of another person so as to make such other person responsible for his acts, the question of whether the specific acts performed were actually authorized or subsequently ratified shall not be controlling."

Damage suits for injury to business or property by reason of so-called secondary boycotts and jurisdictional disputes, defined in the same terms as the union unfair labor practices defined in section 8 (b) (4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, are authorized in section 303 of the act. That section provides as follows:

"Sec. 303. (a) It shall be unlawful, for the purposes of this section only, in an industry or activity affecting commerce, for any labor organization to engage in, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in, a strike or a concerted refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services, where an object thereof is—

"(1) forcing or requiring any employer or self-employed person to join any labor or employer organization or any employer or other person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person;

"(2) forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act;

"(3) forcing or requiring any employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees if another labor organization has been certfied as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act.

"(4) forcing or requiring any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular labor organization or in a particular trade, craft, or class rather than to employees in another labor organization or in another trade, craft, or class unless such employer is failing to conform to an order or certification of the National Labor Relations Board determining the bargaining representative for employees performing such work. Nothing contained in this subsection shall be construed to make unlawful a refusal by any person to enter upon the premises of any employer (other than his own employer), if the employees of such employer are engaged in a strike ratified or approved by a representative of such employees whom such employer is required to recognize under the National Labor Relations Act.

"(b) Whoever shall be injured in his business or property by reason of any violation of subsection (a) may sue therefor in any district court of the United States subject to the limitations and provisions of section 301 hereof without respect to the amount in controversy, or in any other court having jurisdiction of the parties, and shall recover the damages by him sustained and the cost of the suit."

Union liability in damages for engaging in the activities defined in section 303 is in addition to the sanctions provided in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended, for engaging in these same activities. Thus, unions may be subjected to injunctions and cease and desist orders as well as damage suits if they engage in such activities.

As a result of the provisions with respect to damage suits, unions have sought contract provisions limiting or avoiding damage liability. Such provisions were said by the examiner in the Baltimore ITU case (21 LRRM 303) to be a proper subject of bargaining. Hitherto normal "no strike" clauses in collective bargaining agreements have been replaced by such clauses as "the union will not initiate, authorize, sanction, support nor engage in any strike, stoppage, or slow-down of work," [13] and simple agreements to work when "able and willing." [14]

Section 301 permits damage suits in the Federal courts for breach of collective bargaining agreements without regard to the usual jurisdictional requirements of diversity of citizenship and minimum amount in controversy. This right of action is in addition to that accorded in the courts of the several States.

It has been pointed out with respect to section 301 that—"I would be unfortunate if there should develop any strong tendency to look to the Federal courts to settle questions concerning the interpretation and application of collective bargaining agreements. A collective agreement is most workable when it is treated as a constitutional instrument or basic statute sharing an administrative authority with the day-to-day application of general aims. The determination of disputes arising during this process is more a matter of creating new law than of construing the provisions of a tightly drawn document. Few judges are equipped for this task by experience or insight; in addition, they would be hampered by the restrictions and delays of legal doctrine and court procedure. Wider voluntary use of arbitration offers a more promising method of settling such disputes." [15]

The burden on the Federal courts resulting from section 301 is shown by the fact that the number of civil actions [16] of all kinds pending in the United States district courts has risen from 29,927 on June 30, 1943, to 51,281 on June 30, 1947, constituting an increase of more than 43 percent, and an increase of almost 6,000 private cases pending on June 30, 1946. The cases pending would require approximately 11 months of disposition at the current rate, irrespective of new cases filed during that time.

It may be pointed out that the provisions of section 303 are one-sided, i. e., they give to an employer a right of action for damages against a union for certain unfair labor practices, but deny to a union the same right of action against an employer. The courts have held that the latter are properly brought only before the National Labor Relations Board.[17]

One case of the latter type, Amazon Cotton Mill v. Textile Workers, came up to the United States court of appeals in Richmond.[18] The union and the company had bargained collectively for 4 years. At the end of that time negotiations for a renewal of the contract broke down, and a strike resulted. The union charged the employer with unfair labor practices before the National Labor Relations Board. The union thereupon petitioned the Federal district court for damages and an injunction, and upon issuance of an interlocutory injunction both the employer and the National Labor Relations Board, as intervenor, appealed. On appeal the decree of the district court was reversed on the ground that the only remedy given by the Taft-Hartley Act to a union for the unfair labor practices of an employer was through a proceeding before the Board.

The fundamental objection, however, is that harmonious labor relations cannot be carried on through court fights.

"Pursuant to its legal-rights policy the Taft-Hartley Act authorized United States district courts to entertain suits by either pary charging violation of collective-bargaining agreements. It also declared it to be desirable that such disputes ought to be settled by a method agreed upon by the parties. But it did not act on this suggestion, though court procedures are about as helpful in securing friendly adjustments in cases of this kind as divorce suits are between man and wife." [19]

POINT 14.—SECONDARY BOYCOTTS

"The Labor-Management Relations Act indiscriminately outlaws all secondary boycotts whether unjustifiable or not. As the President emphasized in his veto message, the provisions of the act go far beyond merely prohibiting certain unjustifiable secondary boycotts. The language used is so broad that even boycotts engaged in for the purpose of protecting the standards of union members against the competition of goods produced under sweatshop conditions are prohibited. Such types of boycotts have long been recognized by the courts as justifiable in order to preserve the union's own existence and the gains made in genuine collective bargaining. Yet the act puts a mandatory duty on the regional director, subject to the supervision of the general counsel, to go into the Federal courts for injunctive relief when he has reason to believe that a union is engaging in such a boycott. And the act requires the regional director, in the preliminary investigation of a charge concerning such a boycott to give the case 'priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred.'"

Section 8 (b) (4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, provides:

"Sec. 8. (b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents—

* * * * * * *

(4) to engage in, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in, a strike or a concerted refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services, where an object thereof is:

(A) forcing or requiring any employer or self-employed person to join any labor or employer organization or any employer or other person to cease using, selling, handling, transporting, or otherwise dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer, or to cease doing business with any other person;

(B) forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9:

(C) forcing or requiring any employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees if another labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9;

This broad prohibition amounts to an indiscriminate prohibition of all "secondary boycotts," as that term is commonly used. In order to compel unions to desist from the use of secondary boycotts, the Labor-Management Relations Act (1) declares secondary boycotts to be union unfair labor practices: [21] (2) makes it mandatory on the Board to give such cases "priority over all other cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred" and directs the Board's officers to petition courts for restraining orders or injunctive relief pending the Board's final determination of such cases;[22] and (3) subjects unions to damage suits by any person injured by a secondary boycott.[23]

One of the primary effects of the secondary boycott provisions has been to provide a shield for nonunion employers by isolating them from peaceful economic pressures which a union could otherwise bring against them to observe decent working conditions established through the democratic process of collective bargaining. For example, in Styles v. I. B. E. W. (22 L. R. R. M. 2446), Roane-Anderson Co. had a contract with an electrical union, it subcontracted certain maintenance work to Kiser Electric Co., a nonunion contractor, the lowest bidder for the job. The maintenance employees of Roane-Anderson Co., the so-called neutral employer, members of the union, thereupon left their jobs. As the purpose of the strike was to induce the neutral employer to cease subcontracting work to the Kiser Electric Co., the court issued an injunction. If an employer for business reasons refuses to give up his right to deal with another employer whose working standards threaten the economic interests of the union, it is difficult to perceive any valid reasons for denying unions the equal right to withhold the services of their members from such so-called neutral employer.

The act provides an incentive to neutral employers to subcontract work to nonunion employers. In the long run, this can easily result in ruining unions and the gains made in genuine collective bargaining. For example, in Baker v. Carpenters (21 L. R. R. M. 2406), Montgomery Fair Co. had in its employ certain employees who were members of a carpenters' union. The company contracted with Bear Bros., Inc., a nonunion general contractor, to make certain improvements and alteration in its place of business. The union thereupon called a strike of its members against Montgomery Fair Co., the neutral employer, to cease dealing with the nonunion contractor. The court issued an injunction.

The possibility afforded by the law to use subcontractors as "strikebreakers" is well illustrated in the case of Douds v. Metropolitan Architects (21 L. R. R. M. 2256). In this case the union called a strike against Ebasco Services, Inc. Prior to the strike the company had subcontracted a limited amount of work to Project Engineering Co., under an arrangement whereby Ebasco supervised the work of the employees of Project engaged on its work, paid their wages, and allowed Project a certain amount for overhead and profits. After the strike began, Ebasco increased the volume of work it subcontracted to Project, work which otherwise would have been performed by employees of the Ebasco if they had not been on a strike. The union picketed Project, the neutral employer, and a charge of secondary boycott was filed. The court, with a keen appreciation of the facts of modern industrial practices, refused to issue the injunction, stating: "The economic effect upon Ebasco's employees was precisely that which would flow from Ebasco's hiring strikebreakers to work on its own premises." The court recognized that under the literal wording of the act an injunction would be required, but rationalized its refusal to issue the injunction by observing that to interpret that act literally would destroy it by driving it to obsurdity.

The argument is commonly advanced that the purpose of the act is to protect a neutral employer's right to carry on his business without interference. As illustrated above, in many cases a so-called neutral employer is not in fact "neutral." The act even prohibits employers and unions from agreeing, prior to the time a controversy arises, that the employer will not deal with nonunion employers. Thus in Douds v. Teamsters (75 F. Supp. 414), Conway's Express agreed with the union representing its employees that if it leased its equipment to others, it would arrange for the lease to use union operators or otherwise Conway would sell the equipment. Conway's Express breached the agreement by leasing equipment to Middle Atlantic Transportation Co. which did not employ union operators. The court enjoined a strike to compel Conway's Express to abide by its agreement, since the union was in effect seeking to induce the employer to cease leasing such equipment to the nonunion employer.

In Sperry v. Denver Bldg. and Cons. Trades Council (77 F. Supp. 321), the court found that the union attempted to persuade two general contractors to cease doing business with a certain subcontractor who consistently refused to employ any union members. The court found that on one job the union called one carpenter off the job and that a plumber, on hearing that the subcontractor operated a nonunion business, quit his job of his own volition. The court found further that the union placed one picket on another construction site, and that the union had placed the name of the subcontractor on a blacklist by placing his name on a blackboard at union headquarters where labor unions and members held their meetings. As the court concluded that the evidence failed to show that the business involved affected interstate commerce, an injunction was denied.

In most cases courts issuing injunctions under the secondary boycott provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act do not mention the reasons which induced the unions to impose a boycott. Such inquiry is not pertinent under the wording of the act; all secondary boycotts, without distinction, are prohibited. A superficial statement of the facts which label the act a secondary boycott, although sufficient to bring such activity within the prohibition of the act, is, of course, valueless for any intelligent evaluation of its social justification. In those few cases where courts have stated the facts which caused the union to boycott, or such facts may be reasonably inferred, it appears that the union struck because the employer of its members refused to cease dealing with another employer who paid wages below those established in collective bargaining agreements (Sperry v. Building Trades Council (Kansas City), 23 L. R. R. M. 2115; Styles v. I. B. E. W., supra); because the neutral employer with whom the union had a contract was either subcontracting work to, or working with, a nonunion contractor and thereby undoubtedly contributing to the perpetuation of lower working standards than those established by collective bargaining agreements of the crafts and trades employed on the project (Styles v. Carpenters, 74 F. Supp 499; I. B. E. W. case, supra; Baker v. Carpenters, supra); because the union was attempting to enlist the aid of members of other unions in its dispute with an employer (LeBaron v. Printing Union, 21 L. R. R. M. 2268, 23 L. R. R. M. 2145); or because the union was attempting to exercise rights contained in its contract with the neutral employer either not to make deliveries to or from a place of business where a strike or a picket line authorized by the building construction trades council was in effect, or to compel the neutral employer to observe other contractual requirements with respect to his business dealings with third person (Sperry v. Building Trades Council (Kansas City), 23 L. R. R. M. 2115; Douds v. Teamsters (Conway), supra).

The secondary-boycott provisions have had the further effect of prohibiting sympathy strikes and outlawing peaceful picketing in many situations. In Douds v. Wine Workers Union (21 L. R. R. M. 2120, 2204, 2282), the union was charged with refusing to handle products of Schenley Distillers for two distributors in order to assist a strike of an affiliated union against a subsidiary of Schenley. A temporary restraining order was issued, but was later dissolved when the strike ceased. In LeBaron v. Printing Union (23 L. R. R. M. 2145), the ninth circuit affirmed the issuance of an injunction against a union which was charged with conducting peaceful picketing of two carriers who handled Sealright Co.'s products and made shipments to it, thereby inducing the employees of the picketed carriers to decline to handle Sealright's products. The court pointed out that the prohibition on secondary boycotts "has in effect banned picketing when utilized to conscript in a given struggle the employees of an employer who is not a party to the dispute."

The history of Federal experience prior to the Labor-Management Relations Act with respect to injunctions in Labor disputes, including secondary boycotts, is a matter of common knowledge. When the Sherman Antitrust Act was passed, it was believed that it related to conspiracies in restraint of trade on the part of combinations of employers. After the Supreme Court in the Danbury Hatters' case[24] held that the act was applicable to unions, both the Federal Government and private employers frequently invoked the act to obtain injunctions and recover damages in a variety of situations, including those involving a refusal to handle or work on goods made in open shops and other secondary boycotts. The use by courts of the Sherman Act to deprive labor of the use of the boycott and other traditional economic weapons led Congress to pass the Clayton Act. Section 20 of the Clayton Act provided that no injunction would be issued to restrain employees from ceasing to patronize or from recommending, advising or persuading others by peaceful means so to do. It was believed that this would have the effect of outlawing the use of the injunction in this type of case. Nevertheless, the United States Supreme Court in 1921 in the Duplex Printing Press case[25] involving a secondary boycott held, over the vigorous dissent of Justices Holmes, Brandeis, and Clarke, that section 20 did not preclude the issuance of injunctions. Justice Brandeis, speaking for the minority, pointed out:

"May not all with a common interest join in refusing to expend their labor upon articles whose very production constitutes an attack upon their standard of living and the institution which they are convinced supports it. * * *

"* * * courts with better appreciation of facts of industry, recognized the unity of interest throughout the union, and that, in refusing to work on materials which threatened it, the union was only refusing to aid in destroying itself."

The Supreme Court's interpretation of the Clayton Act led to an increase in the number of injunction suits, not only in secondary boycott cases but in other situations where the powers of the Federal courts could be invoked. In the 83 cases which were brought under the Sherman Act against unions during the period 1890 to 1930, 64, or over 77 percent, were brought in the 14-year period after the passage of the Clayton Act. Thirty-four of these sixty-four cases were private injunction suits.[26] By 1932 the public was so aroused that Congress passed the Norris-LaGuardia Act which, by broadly defining the term "labor dispute," made it clear beyond doubt that Congress intended to prevent the use of injunctions in so-called secondary boycott situations.[27]

The report of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations shows that the use by Federal courts of the injunction in labor disputes is being revived on a scale heretofore unprecedented. As previously noted, in the 14-year period 1914–28, 64 injunction cases were brought against unions under the Sherman Act. The majority report shows that under the Labor-Management Relations Act in the 5-month period August 1947 to February 1, 1948, 132 charges alleging secondary boycotts were filed, or approximately 26 cases per month. During the 9-month period February 1, 1948, to November 1, 1948, 210 such charges were filed, or an average of 23 cases per month. The vast majority of these charges were later dismissed, and it is therefore impossible to state how many of such charges were valid. Notwithstanding this apparent decrease in the number of secondary boycotts, it is equally clear that injunctions are being sought in an ever-increasing number of such cases. In the first-mentioned period, 9 petitions for temporary restraining orders or injunctions were filed; however, in the latter period 22 such petitions were filed.[28] Thus, in the brief 14-month period, 31 suits for injunctions against unions were filed under the secondary-boycott sections alone as compared with a total of 83 injunction suits of all types filed under the Sherman Act in the 40-year period 1890 to 1930. The act makes it mandatory on the Board to give priority to such cases and directs the Board to seek an injunction whenever an officer of the Board finds any reason to believe that a charge of secondary boycott is true. It is wholly reasonable to anticipate, therefore, that unless the use of the injunction in labor disputes is again prohibited the present upward trend in the use of injunction in labor disputes will continue.

POINT 15—DISCRIMINATION AGAINST LABOR ORGANIZATIONS IN THE APPLICATION OF SANCTIONS AGAINST UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

"The Taft-Hartley Act grossly discriminates in the application of sanctions against unfair labor practices in favor of employers and against labor organizations. Mandatory injunctive action is provided for in the case of three employee or union organization unfair labor practices. In no case is it mandatory to afford relief to employees or a labor organization against any employer unfair labor practice."

Section 8 (b) (4) of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, provides that it shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agent "to engage in, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer to engage in, a strike or a concerted refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, materials, or commodities or to perform any services, where an object thereof is:"[29]

(b) forcing or requiring an employer to bargain with the labor organization unless it is the certified representative under section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended;

(c) forcing or requiring an employer to bargain with such labor organization if another labor organization has been certified as the bargaining representative under section 9 of the National Labor Relations Act, as amended.

Section 10 (l) of the act provides that when it is charged that any "person," which by definition includes any labor organization,[30] has engaged in any of the three foregoing unfair labor practices "the preliminary investigation of such change shall be made forthwith and given priority over all other cases except cases of like character in the office where it is filed or to which it is referred. [Italics supplied.] [31]

All other unfair labor practices provided in the National Labor Relations Act, as amended by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, including all unfair labor practices of employers, are made subject to the provisions of section 10 (j) which makes it discretionary with the Board to seek temporary injunctive relief. That section provides:

"The Board shall have power, upon issuance of a complaint as provided in subsection (b) charging that any person has engaged in or is engaging in an unfair labor practice, to petition any district court of the United States (including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia), within any district wherein the unfair labor practice in question is alleged to have occurred or wherein such person resides or transacts business, for appropriate temporary relief or restraining order. Upon the filing of any such petition the court shall cause notice thereof to be served upon such person, and thereupon shall have jurisdiction to grant to the Board such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper." [32]

It is to be noted that the provisions of section 10 (j) as well as the provisions of section 10 (l) are available to invoke injunctive action against labor unions charged with violation of section 8 (b) (4).

POINT 16—NATIONAL EMERGENCY DISPUTES

"The Taft-Hartley Act provides elaborate and inflexible procedures including boards of inquiry, an 80-day waiting period enforced by injunction, and secret ballots which must be followed in emergency disputes. Nevertheless, as the President said in his veto message, he and his officers are deprived of their power to take effective action in securing peaceful settlement of such disputes. For example, even the boards of inquiry are deprived of authority to make recommendations for settling the dispute. In the atomic energy and longshore cases these procedures were unavailing, and agreements between the parties were reached with the assistance of Government conciliation, only after the machinery provided by the law had ineffectively run its course."

The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, sections 206-208, inclusive, authorizes the President, whenever in his opinion, a threatened or actual strike or lock-out affects substantially an entire industry and would, if permitted to occur or continue, imperil the national health or safety, to appoint a Board of Inquiry which shall report the facts without recommendation. The Board is given subpena powers. After receiving the report the President may direct the Attorney General to petition for an injunction, and if the court finds that such peril exists it has jurisdiction to enjoin the lock-out or strike.

The order of the court is subject to review by the Circuit Courts of Appeals and the Supreme Court.

Sections 209-210 require that the parties to a dispute in which an injunction has been issued to make every effort to settle their differences with the assistance of the Mediation and Conciliation Service, although neither party would be required to accept any proposal of the mediation service. If settlement is not reached 60 days after the injunction, the Board of Inquiry makes a progress report to the Attorney General which report is made public. Within 15 days thereafter the N. L. R. B. holds an election among the employees of each employer to see whether they wish to accept the employer's final offer as stated by him. Within 5 days after the election the Board is required to certify the results of the election. Thereupon (or upon settlement at any time during the 80-day period if that is sooner) the Attorney General is required to move to have the injunction discharged. The President thereafter makes a full report to Congress with his recommendations.[33]

Under the foregoing provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, the President is virtually under a congressional mandate whenever there is a threatened strike or lock-out affecting an entire industry or a substantial part thereof to invoke the procedures provided for therein. It is true that the questions whether such procedure should be invoked and whether an injunction should be sought in any particular case are left to the discretion of the President. Once the initial decision is made to invoke the procedures provided for in sections 206–210, however, the act provides for an inflexible succession of boards of inquiry without authority to make recommendations, an 80-day injunction, a vote on individual employers' last offers as stated by them and discharge of the injunction.

The Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service in its first annual report pointed out that:

"One of the conclusions which the Service is undoubtedly justified in drawing from its experience of the last year is that provision for an 80-day period of continued operations, under injunctive order of a court, tends to delay rather than facilitate settlement of a dispute. Parties unable to resolve the issues facing them before a dead-line date, when subject to an injunction order, tend to lose a sense of urgency and to relax their efforts to reach a settlement. They wait for the next dead-line date (the date of discharge of the injunction) to spur them to renewed efforts. In most instances efforts of the Service to encourage the parties to bargain during the injunction period, with a view to early settlement, falls on deaf ears. Further, the public appears to be lulled into a sense of false security by a relatively long period of industrial peace by injunction and does not give evidence of being aware of a threat to the common welfare which would produce a climate of public opinion favorable to settlement." [34]

The report also observed that—

"In every national emergency dispute to date the results of a ballot conducted by the National Labor Relations Board pursuant to section 209(b) of the act have been overwhelmingly for rejection of the employer's last offer. For reasons which need not be elaborated here it is fair to assume that the likelihood of any ballot in the future having a contrary result, is small and remote. These ballots are expensive to conduct, and the experience of a year demonstrates that they do nothing to promote settlement of a dispute. To the contrary, they are a disrupting influence in collective bargaining and mediation. The last or final offer of an employer which the National Labor Relations Board is under an obligation to submit to ballot, is not likely to be the ultimate offer in fact, on the basis of which a settlement will be reached * * *

"A vote turning down an employer's last offer places additional obstacles and difficulties in the way of a settlement. Union representatives must necessarily accept the vote as a mandate from the rank and file of workers that they may regard as practicable and possible bases of settlement only those offers of employers substantially more favorable than the one rejected. With foreknowledge of this consequence, employers tend to keep in reserve, and not to represnt as a last offer which may be submitted to ballot, concessions which might result in a settlement. Union leadership and employees, aware that employers assess the situation in this manner, act accordingly. Thus, the mandatory last-offer ballot sets into action a cycle of tactical operations by both parties which cancel each other out and delay serious efforts to arrive at a prompt resolution of their differenees." [35]

In his message of June 20, 1947, to the Congress, vetoing the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947,[36] the President called attention to the fact that the boards of inquiry authorized by the act in emergency strike situations are forbidden to offer their informed judgment concerning a reasonable basis for settlement of the dispute.[37] This constitutes a serious handicap to the Government's efforts to assist the parties to settle the issues involved in this dispute. William M. Leiserson, former Chairman to the National Mediation Board and member of the National Labor Relations Board, has pointed out in an article published in the New York Times magazine, on February 6, 1949, at page 49, that—

"This is a clumsy and undesirable substitute for the customary method of fact finding which is the final step in the mediation process developed from the practice of collective bargaining itself and often used to secure settlements by mutual agreement. It is common in any major labor dispute, whether it appears to affect public health and safety or not, when direct negotiations between the parties and mediatory efforts both fail and they cannot agree on arbitration, for a board to investigate positions of the parties and the facts in the case and then to recommend an equitable settlement.

"Such recommendations form the basis on which the parties usually reach agreement. This procedure takes time, but a provision in the law that neither party shall change the conditions out of which the dispute arose for a period of 60 days is now generally acceptable to both labor and management. There is no need to resort to injunctions and court procedures to secure maintenance of the status quo pending a fact-finding investigation."

The national emergency provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act have proved ineffective not only in solving the disputes in which they were invoked but in preventing the occurrence of emergencies which they were designed to prevent.

In the atomic energy dispute, all of the statutory procedures were invoked, but the dispute had not been settled at the time when the injunction had to be discharged. At that time the "emergency" was still, therefore, as great as when the injunction proceeding was first initiated since the parties were still in dispute. The dispute was not in fact settled until the urgency of the situation was sufficiently felt by the parties to compel a settlement. Thereupon the parties themselves met, remained in continuous negotiation for over 50 days and, with the assistance of Government conciliation, finally reached an agreement.[38]

In the Pacific coast maritime dispute a settlement was not reached until almost 2 months after an injunction obtained under the national emergency provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act had been discharged.[39]

In the Atlantic coast longshore dispute, also, there was no settlement reached until after the injunction obtained under the national emergency provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act had run its course and been discharged. Settlement was finally reached by the parties assisted by Government conciliators.[40]

William H. Davis, former Chairman of the National War Labor Board, testified before the Senate Labor and Public Welfare Committee on February 7, 1949 that "there has not been a case under the Taft-Hartley law in which a settlement has been reached during the cooling-off period under an injunction."[41]

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will meet tomorrow morning in this room at 10 o'clock, and resume this session, and at 3 :30 this afternoon a meeting of the full committee is scheduled to meet in the Labor Committee hearing room on the amendment to the Fair Labor Standards Act.

Mr. IRVING. That is an executive session?

Mr. KELLEY. That will be an executive session.

The committee will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

TUESDAY, MARCH 8, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., Hon. Augustine B. Kelley (chairman) presiding.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will please be in order. The first witness is Mr. Scott, general counsel, National Association of Motor Bus Operators.

Mr. Scott:

TESTIMONY OF JACK GARRETT SCOTT, GENERAL COUNSEL, NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF MOTOR BUS OPERATORS

Mr. SCOTT. My name is Jack Garrett Scott. I appear before you as general counsel of the National Association of Motor Bus Operators, which is the national trade association of the intercity motor bus industry. That association represents approximately 1,000 motor carriers of passengers, either through direct membership or through its affiliated State associations. All of the carriers represented are subject to regulation by the Interstate Commerce Commission, or the various State regulatory bodies, or both.

Our industry employs approximately 65,000 persons, of whom about 64 percent, on the average, are unionized. The percentages of unionization vary with different classes of employees, being about 80 percent for drivers, 75 percent for maintenance employees, 60 percent for terminal employees, and a smaller percentage for office and administrative employees.

Our industry provides commercial passenger transportation facilities to practically every community in the United States, serving many thousands of such communities which have no other means of commercial passenger transportation. In recent years we have transported more passengers annually than the rail carriers. However, our principal competition is with the privately owned automobile. We feel that our industry has demonstrated itself to be an essential part of our national transportation system both in war and in peace.

Generally speaking, the members of our industry favor the retention of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 in its present form, primarily because it has worked out well in fact, both as to the carriers and their employees, and consequently the public. This is amply proven, we feel, by the decrease in number and severity of strikes in our industry since the enactment of the 1947 statute.

Attached to this statement is a table which shows the facts concerning strikes, both in the intercity bus industry and all industry in the United States, for the periods of 16 months before and 16 months after the effective date of the present statute. The conclusions to be drawn from the table should perhaps be qualified to some extent because of the unsettled conditions in all industry following the cessation of hostilities which might be reflected in the figures for the early part of the first of these two periods, but we cannot of course specify the extent of that condition and feel that, even admitting its existence, the showing is a significant one as to the beneficial influence of the present law.

Our experience under the present statute has shown that certain of its provisions are of more importance to us than others. Therefore, in order to conserve the time of the committee, we shall confine our discussion to a few of the features of the existing law which we feel are of paramount interest to our industry.

We particularly urge the retention of the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act which place a measure of responsibility upon labor organizations and their officials, a most important feature which is not contained either in the Wagner Act or the proposed bill. The provisions concerning union responsibility which we earnestly hope will be preserved consist of three types, all closely related:

(1) The duty of a union to bargain collectively in good faith with an employer whose employees it represents; to this organized labor can have no sound objection, for if the employer is obligated to bargain, surely the same responsibility should be placed upon the representatives of the employees;

(2) The duty to abide by an existing labor contract to which it is a party; and

(3) The duty to refrain from coercion, either as against an employee in his right to join or not join a union, or as against an employer in the selection of his bargaining representatives. When a union has been recognized or certified as the exclusive bargaining agent of the employees of an employer and then refuses to bargain with the employer, it is apparent that the consequence cannot be other than destructive. The employer is helpless, having no recourse of any kind. That has happened at times in our industry to the great detriment of all concerned, particularly to the traveling public, and we hope that it will not be permitted to recur. I am sure that many instances of situations of that kind will be presented to this committee, so I shall not go into detail as to our particular experiences; but we can conceive of no good reason, in logic or justice, why an employer should be required by statute to bargain collectively with a certified union, when the union has no corresponding obligation.

As to the duty to abide by existing contracts, the same considerations apply. The bill under consideration limits the duty of a labor organization in the case of a termination or modification of an existing labor contract to the bare requirement of 30 days' prior notice to the United States Conciliation Service. On the other hand, section 301 of the present law authorizes suits for damages for contract violation, either by employers or by labor organizations, and makes a union responsible for the acts of its agents.

These are salutary provisions, and we are certain that they have been responsible in large part for the comparative degree of labor-management tranquility which as existed since the present statute became effective. A contract seems to us to be a contract, binding upon all the parties thereto. And it is and always has been elementary in our law that one injured by a contract breach may obtain redress by way of damages. There seems no good reason why this simple and fundamental rule should be removed from the field of labor law. Its retention can do not harm, for it is equally applicable to both parties to the contract. On the other hand, its removal will return us again to the unconscionable situation wherein an employer who has been wronged and injured has no redress.

As to the duty of a labor organization to refrain from coercion, it is noted that the equivalent duty on the part of the employer to refrain from coercion would be retained by the pending bill. Coercion is abhorred in the law generally. It is an unjustifiable practice in all types of business and human relationships. Why, then, should it not be prohibited as to labor organizations, as well as to employers? What real or reasonable rationalization can there be for permitting a labor organization to coerce either employees or employers with impunity? We contend that there is none, and that the principles of equal and even treatment require a retention of the present provision making it an unfair labor practice for a labor organization to engage in coercive practices.

We have no substantial doubt that the provisions of section 8 (2) (3) of the present law relating to the so-called union shop were the result of a legislative compromise. At any rate, they constitute what we think to be one of the primary weaknesses in the present statute.

We start with the fundamental principle that an employee should be perfectly free to join a labor union if he chooses so to do. If he is free to join, he must necessarily, in logic, be free not to join if he wishes. The answer to this which is given by organized labor frequently, at least, is that there should be no "free riders." It seems to us that it is far better to have a few "free riders"—and there are only few, so far as we know—in our unit—than to have a complete loss of employee freedom. We feel, therefore, that there should be statutory recognition of the proposition, as a basic doctrine, that no person shall be denied the opportunity to obtain or retain employment because of membership or nonmembership in a labor organization.

Except for the Taft-Hartley Act, that has been the public policy of the United States since at least 1926, when the Railway Labor Act was enacted. That statute contained, and still contains, a provision prohibiting any contract which requires—> a person seeking employment to sign any contract or agreement promising to join or not to join a labor organization which effectively outlaws any union security provisions in railway labor contracts, to the detriment of no one so far as we have been able to learn. (45 U. S. C. A. 152 (5).) Later, in 1932, the Norris-LaGuardia Act (29 U. S. C. A. 102) was approved, which declared the public policy of the United States to be, in part, that though he (the unorganized worker) should be free to decline to associate with his fellows, it is necessary that he have full freedom of association—and so forth.

Therefore, the Labor-Management Act of 1947, in its union-shop provision, for the first time, gave congressional sanction to the unsound principle that union membership may be required as a condition of employment, or at least retention of employment, after a 30-day period. These two situations amount to the same, in effect.

Further, it established the method by which such a contract provision could be obtained, a method which, in our judgment, is ineffective to accomplish any sound or salutary purpose. After a given union has been chosen as bargaining representative of the employees, which is a necessary condition precedent to bargaining at all, it is a foregone conclusion that a majority of the employees will vote for a union shop. That is why practically all of the many union-shop elections conducted by the National Labor Relations Board have resulted favorably to the union. Such elections have shown themselves to be a useless, unnecessary, and expensive requirement.

We can find no convincing evidence that the last election and a change in the political complexion of the Congress constituted a mandate for the enactment of a law which would permit any kind of union-security provisions in labor contracts. On the contrary, we call attention to the increasing number of States which have adopted "right to work" statutes and constitutional amendments, most of them by public referendum, and the recent decisions of the United States Supreme Court which have upheld their validity against challenges of unconstitutionality.

In its opinion in the Nebraska and North Carolina cases, the Supreme Court points to various of its past decisions which have upheld the right of the states to proscribe "yellow dog" contracts—which we think is a salutary determination—and then the Court concludes that, if it is reasonable and in accord with due process to afford protection to union members by statute, it is every bit as reasonable to afford similar protection to nonunion workers. We urge that philosophy upon the committee and submit that it should be followed.

The foregoing considerations seem to us to be a more impressive and cogent demonstration of the public will on the subject than the election. And they are based upon sound conceptions of justice and fair play, which is not true of the pertinent provisions of the Wagner Act and the present statute.

Mr. Cyrus Ching, Director of the Mediation and Conciliation Service, in a statement to the Senate committee, made a powerful and conclusive statement as to the need for preservation of the independence of that service. It was such a sound and constructive presentation that we are unable to add to or strengthen it. We sincerely endorse everything that he said on the subject and hope that this committee and the Congress will follow his recommendation.

There is one additional consideration, however, to which Mr. Ching did not allude and which we feel should be called to your attention. The administration has advocated, and this bill suggests, greater use of the machinery of arbitration for settling labor-managtment controversies growing out of interpretations on applications of labor contracts. With that proposal we are in full accord, particularly in view of the fact that we are public utilities and, as such, we serve the public 24 hours a day, every day; but we are definitely opposed to any form of compulsory arbitration, to which subject I shall subsequently allude.

Stoppages of our operations are costly and destructive, possibly more so to that substantial portion of the public that desires and requires our service than to the carriers and their employees themselves. In past years many of our labor contracts provided for the appointment of conciliators by the Conciliation Division of the Department of Labor. Our experience under these provisions during the time that the Service was a part of the Labor Department was not altogether a happy one, largely, as we think, because that Department is, by statute, a friend and protector of labor. As a consequence, such provisions in our contracts have decreased substantially in number, as our members were able by collective bargaining to accomplish that result.

Since the present statute was enacted, the effort to shy away from such contract provisions has materially subsided. It would stop altogether, we are sure, if we could be certain that the Conciliation Service is to remain impartial and independent, as it now is. The method of selection of arbitrators by that Service is an efficient and simple process. We should like to feel that we are safely in the hands of fair-minded men if we return to the method heretofore so widely used.

Title 2 of the present bill would not only place the Conciliation Service within and under the jurisdiction of the Department of Labor, but would also give that agency, by section 205 of the bill, a power which is tantamount to the imposition of compulsory arbitration. To that we are unalterably opposed. We think that it is completely unjustifiable, by any method of reason, to place arbitration or conciliation, or both, in the hands of an agency which is prejudiced by statutory mandate.

Separation of enforcement and judicial functions of the National Labor Relations Board: Section 3 (d) of the present statute, by creating the office of general counsel and defining his powers and duties, separates the investigatory and enforcement functions of the National Labor Relations Board from its quasi-judicial functions. This, in our judgment, is a salutary and healthy provision and should be retained.

The many and conclusive reasons why this is so appear not only in the hearings on the bill which became the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, but more clearly and abundantly in the legislative history of the Administrative Procedure Act. Attention is invited to that history as it appears in Senate Document No. 248 of that session, particularly as it pertains to section 5 (c) of that statute.

The Administrative Procedure Act had the active support and endorsement of the American Bar Association and many other organizations of like caliber and impartiality, and was passed by the Congress by a very substantial majority in both Houses. We think that it states the policy of the United States in the particular mentioned, and that the principle should be adhered to in respect of the National Labor Relations Board as it must now be by other governmental agencies.

Free speech: The section of the present statute concerning free speech (section 8 (c)) would be repealed by the bill here under consideration. We have always felt, prior to the Wagner Act, that the first amendment to the Constitution of the United States was adequate to protect that most important right, but the decisions of the Board under the act, many of which were upheld by the courts, disabused our minds of that assumption. I should like to say, in all fairness to the Board, that this was particularly true in the more early days of the administration of the National Labor Relations Act, and there was a tendency before the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act to step away from it, and more to recognize the right of free speech than had been true in the early days.

For that reason, and in order that there can be no doubt as to right of an employer to express himself within the limitations contained, we urge that section 8 (c) be retained in the law.

Right of employer to petition for representation: Under the Wagner Act, an employer had no standing to petition for a representation election unless two or more labor organizations made conflicting claims as to the right of representation. Section 101 (9) (c) (1) (B) of the present statute gives the right of petition to the employer even if only one union is involved. The reasons in support of that provision are cogent and convincing. As a matter of fact, an employer without the right is confronted with a far greater dilemma and is much more seriously handicapped when the question confronting him is solely one of a particular union or no union.

The ultimate question is still whether or not a majority of his employees desire representation by a given union, to determine whether an election is necessary. Where two or more unions make conflicting claims, satisfactory evidence as to the majority will is often available without a vote, which is not true as to a single-union situation. For these reasons we urge that the right be preserved.

That concludes my statement, Mr. Chairman, and I desire to express my appreciation for the privilege of having made it.

Mr. KELLEY. We are glad to have you before us.

Mr. Scott, on the second page, you refer to the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 in its present form, and you prefer to have it that way, primarily because it has worked out well in fact, both as to the carriers and their employees. How do you know it has worked to the perfect satisfaction of the employees?

Mr. SCOTT. The only way I can tell you that is the reports we get from the employers, and the fact there has been a very substantial decrease in labor difficulties in our industry.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, the argument that the present bill is a good bill because there are fewer strikes is not to me a very strong argument in favor of the retention of the bill, because when they make strikes so difficult, naturally, they cannot use that weapon, and you cannot determine—no one has yet determined to my satisfaction that the employees of the country are satisfied with it. There might be a lot of pent-up resentment in their hearts which they cannot express.

Mr. SCOTT. You might be quite right, because certainly I cannot speak for the employees or their organization; all I can do is take the facts given to me by the folks I represent, who are the employers.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you not think it would be a good idea if the motor-bus operators were incorporated in the Railway Labor Act?

Mr. SCOTT. It seems to me, by and large, the Labor Act has worked very well. We have had difficulties, of course, in recent years; we have had threatened stoppage of the railroads, but I think that it has worked rather well, and I do not think that our folks—although they have not expressed their opinion on that specific point—I do not think our folks would object at all to being subject to the Railway Labor Act.

Mr. KELLEY. To become effective in the proper manner it would have to be an agreement between employees and employers, in your case, to request they be put under the Railway Labor Act?

Mr. SCOTT. I think that is probably so, and that is a possibility which I think would bear investigation. The railroads are under it, and the air transportation is under it, and it would seem to me it would add up to evenness of treatment of regulated transportation in industries if that came to pass.

Mr. KELLEY. Your employees of the Motor Bus Operators, are they members of the CIO or A. F. of L., separate?

Mr. SCOTT. Largely they are organized by the American Federation of Labor, the Amalgamated Association of Chauffeurs and Street Railway Workers. There are some of the companies that are organized by the Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen. I think we only have one contract—not more than two—with the CIO union. Let me verify that just a moment.

Mr. KELLEY. You can supply it for the record, Mr. Scott.

Mr. SCOTT. I am sure there are not more than two. I know of only one, myself.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Scott, on page 2 of your formal presentation, you make this statement: "Generally speaking, the members of our industry favor the retention of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 in its present form."

Am I to imply and is the committee to imply that you are endorsing the present Taft-Hartley Act with mental reservation; would you say, by "Generally speaking"?

Mr. SCOTT. No; I do not think that that puts it generally the way I meant to say it, Mr. Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. You must have had some idea like that in mind.

Mr. SCOTT. I meant to say this. I hope I can say it more clearly this time than I did before, that we would prefer to have the Labor-Management Relations Act remain in force at the present time, but there are a lot of things in the Labor-Management Relations Act which are of no importance to us and which we do not care about.

Now, that is the reason for the "Generally speaking."

Mr. BAILEY. I notice, too, in your discussion of free speech, that you object to the fact that during the life of the Wagner Labor Relations Act the employer was forbidden the right to coerce his employees with propaganda, speeches, and so on and so forth. I take it that you are referring there to section 8 (c) of the present act?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; that is right, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I take it that you are doing that on the constitutional grounds of free speech? I would like to say to you in that connection that there are a couple of other provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act that involve the question of constitutional guaranties. Under the injunctive procedure, it is possible to send an American citizen to jail without a trial by jury; yet, you are throwing a blanket endorsement over that procedure, under the injunction procedure.

Mr. SCOTT. I have said nothing specific about it, Mr. Bailey.

Mr. BAILEY. Nevertheless, you endorsed the bill which does provide for it.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I am wondering if that is one of your mental reservations.

Mr. SCOTT. No; I do not have any mental reservations. I tried to state here just exactly what we think about it.

Mr. BAILEY. There is also another constitutional question involved in the present Taft-Hartley Act, and that is the denial of the press owned by labor to print their names or to accept advertisements from candidates for public office. That is encroaching pretty much on the constitutional guaranty of free speech; is it not?

Mr. SCOTT. The Supreme Court said that that provision of the statute did not apply to publications of labor organizations in the Murray case.

Mr. BAILEY. Nevertheless, the boys who wrote the Taft-Hartley bill meant it to.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know what they meant, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You were discussing the question of unions and closed shops. With respect to the present provision for outlawing the closed shop and the institution of the union shop, what do you think of the recent decision of the labor board that employees that are in a class that are on strike are denied the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. SCOTT. Denied the right to participate in representation elections, you mean?

Mr. BAILEY. But anybody who is brought in there who is not a member of the union as a strikebreaker does have that right. Do you not think that that puts in the hands of the employer a pretty powerful weapon for the breaking of strikes?

Mr. SCOTT. I am very frank to say to you, Mr. Bailey, personally, that I am not too sympathetic with that provision. I do think there should be some kinds of safeguards.

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad we are in agreement on one point.

Mr. SCOTT. Sir?

Mr. BAILEY. I am glad we are in agreement on one point.

Mr. SCOTT. I would venture to say that we are in agreement on many points, if we would explore them all.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, right in that same connection there, you say you are opposed to compulsory arbitration.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I can understand why you would be opposed to that. If you have a method of breaking the strike, or even the union shop, you would not want to go ahead and arbitrate.

Mr. SCOTT. That is not the reason we are opposed to compulsory arbitration.

Mr. BAILEY. I have just one more question.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Justify, if you can why you say it was a salutory procedure for the Supreme Court to comment, I believe, one one of the decisions in one or two of the States that have legalized yellow-dog contracts. Will you explain that?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir. I think it is absolutely unfair, unjust, and unconstitutional, as the Supreme Court did, to require a man before he was given employment or retained on employment, to agree not to join a union. I think that deprives him of a right which he should have.

I used that illustration to say that the converse should also be true.

Mr. BAILEY. In what way?

Mr. SCOTT. That he should be free not to join, if he so wishes.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I have nothing.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Scott, I am impressed by your apparent objectivity in approaching this matter. There are one or two matters that I would like to have clarified. Maybe you and I are not too far apart if we explore the thing far enough.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope not, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You spoke of free speech. I hope that there is not anything that I have a greater ardor for than free speech and freedom of communications. But I wonder if you, as a lawyer, can point out to me any other type of case in our jurisprudence where the matter of what a man has said in hostility to an adversary cannot be used as evidence against him when his conduct toward his adversary comes in inquiry?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not recall any, offhand. But I do not know that that is analogous to this situation. I think there should be pointed out this distinction, which I wanted to make in answer to a question from Mr. Bailey, and neglected or forgot it. I think there is a lot of difference between free speech as we understand it under the first amendment, on the one hand, and coercion on the other. Now, when the use of speech amounts to coercion, then I do not think it should be protected by the constitutional guaranty, and I am certainly in favor of prohibitions against restrictions; I mean against coercion.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us forget the coercion. Let us forget the coercion entirely. Let us suppose that you never heard what I have said about you; therefore, it could not operate to coerce you to do or not to do anything, could it?

Mr. SCOTT. No.

Mr. JACOBS. But let us suppose that you are found dead in an alley somewhere——

Mr. KELLEY. God forbid.

Mr. SCOTT. I hope that does not happen soon.

Mr. JACOBS. But let us suppose that for the sake of the case, and in inquiring around, although you never heard about it, I have been expressing hostility toward you. Now, there is no coercion in that case, is there? But if I go on trial I am pretty apt to hear my words repeated in court; am I not? Is it not a rule of evidence?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; that is right. I think that such evidence would be admissible as pertinent to the inquiry of a motive on your part, or something of that kind.

Mr. JACOBS. That is right. Now, we are getting down to the real question. Section 8 (c) of the Taft-Hartley law provides that what a man may say may not be evidence of an unfair labor practice; is that not what it provides?

Mr. SCOTT. I do not recall it that way.

Mr. JACOBS. It is very important that we understand what that statute provides before we decide whether we are going to continue it in effect or not.

Mr. SCOTT. I think we should. Section 8 (c) says:

The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence.

Mr. JACOBS. There is a comma right after "constitute," is there not?

Mr. SCOTT. No. It is, "shall not constitute or be evidence."

Mr. JACOBS. Well, it is disjunctive, then. I will settle for a disjunctive.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes; of an unfair labor practice, and so forth.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then it shall not be evidence of an unfair labor practice. As a matter of fact, section 8 (c) is a rule of evidence, is it not?

Mr. SCOTT. I think that probably technically is true.

Mr. JACOBS. Practically, in its application, it is a rule of evidence; do you not as a lawyer agree with that?

Mr. SCOTT. It all depends. The applicability of this section depends, in my thinking, upon the unfair labor practice that you were talking about. Now, what are we talking about? They are talking about coercion of the employees by the employer as an unfair labor practice.

Mr. JACOBS. Does it not say that the expression of any view shall not be evidence of an unfair labor practice?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Then it does lay down a rule of evidence, does it not?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. As a lawyer you agree to that, do you not?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then, do you agree with the construction that has been given to that section by the Labor Board that it is a correct interpretation, that if an employer should say that he is against the union, that the union officers are bad men and should not be permitted to organize his craft, or should not organize his plant, and then the next day he goes down to the plant and he fires all the union officers; do you agree that in logic, the fact that he has expressed himself in opposition to those union officers would be some evidence of his motive in firing them?

Mr. SCOTT. I rather think so, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then as a lawyer, do you agree with me that under section 8 (c), if it is followed, that the court could not consider that evidence as long as there was no threat in it, but just merely an expression of animosity?

Mr. SCOTT. My objection to an elimination of this section was qualified very carefully in what I had to say, Mr. Jacobs. I said that I stand on the first amendment to the Constitution. I have always felt, as I said, that the first amendment to the Constitution was adequate to protect this thing. But what I do not like is some of the decisions of the National Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act which almost prohibit an employer from saying anything about anything.

Mr. JACOBS. Did it prohibit him from saying anything?

Mr. SCOTT. Under the rulings.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you give me the citation?

Mr. SCOTT. It went to an absurd limit.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you give me the citation of the case that prohibited the employer from saying anything?

Mr. SCOTT. I said in practical purposes it prohibited him from saying anything.

Mr. JACOBS. I believe that you are a pretty objective fellow. I want to ask you if this is not just about what it amounts to—and this dovetails into what you said a moment ago—that when the Wagner Act was passed, the legislative attempt which had been made for 50 years to outlaw the "yellow dog" contract was finally approved in the Fansteel case, the employer woke up one day and found that something he had been doing, thinking it was legal for so long that he thought he had a prescription to continue to do it, caused a great deal of the difficulty that occurred after the validation of the Wagner Act. I think you and I can agree on that; can we not?

Mr. SCOTT. I think that is right.

Mr. JACOBS. It is substantially what you said. So that the employer continued to express himself rather vehemently, did he not, in many instances?

Mr. SCOTT. In many instances, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And in a great many instances?

Mr. SCOTT. There is no question about it.

Mr. JACOBS. And there is no doubt that many of them thought they were within their rights about it when they did it?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. So that there were many expressions that did cast light on his motive, we will say, when he discharged men from employment; do you not think that follows?

Mr. SCOTT. I think that is right.

Mr. JACOBS. And, as a matter of fact, it was simply a matter of a prime common-law rule of evidence to say that what the man said in reference to a union man would characterize what he did in reference to the union man. Do you think that is fair?

Mr. SCOTT. I think that is probably true.

Mr. JACOBS. And do you not think it would still be fair that way today?

Mr. SCOTT. I think our situation has changed a good deal from 1935, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. May I interrupt you to ask you this?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I have only 5 minutes in which to question you, and I do want to close this one point. My question is this: Is there any reason for changing the rules of evidence that are time-honored in the common law, that have been the law since the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, in reference to the employer? Can you think of any reason?

Mr. SCOTT. If I could have any assurance that the administration of the existing labor act would permit the exercise of the right of free speech under the first amendment, I would say, "Throw this whole thing out."

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, you and I both.

Mr. SCOTT. But I say that this did not happen in the administration of the Wagner Act, particularly in its early years.

Mr. JACOBS. You and I both know that the courts, in applying the rules of evidence, frequently commit error. That is the reason we go up to the Supreme Court once in a while.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And I have had an occasion or two where I thought the Supreme Court did not use the greatest wisdom in applying them, too.

Mr. SCOTT. I agree with you on that, thoroughly.

Mr. JACOBS. But on the other hand, I am talking about the rule. You have a rule which I think you had admitted in section 8 (c) that throws a mantle of protection by way of evidentiary rule around the employer, that builds a law up whereby his words may not be used against him, and I would like to ask you now to cite me any other example in the whole field of jurisprudence where a similar rule obtains.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has 1 minute left.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I will wave 5 minutes of my time to Mr. Jacobs, so that Mr. Jacobs may complete his questioning.

Mr. SCOTT. I do not know offhand of any field of the law in which a rule of evidence on that particular point has been spelled out by statute.

Mr. JACOBS. Or by decision?

Mr. SCOTT. Or by decision. Offhand, I do not know that, either. However, I think we should not lose sight of the fact that this evidentiary rule as stated in section 8 (c) applies to unfair labor practices, and that unfair labor practices are specifically spelled out in other parts of the statute. Now, the unfair labor practice that this has to do with is coercion.

Mr. JACOBS. It is a matter of coercion.

Mr. SCOTT. That would be my judgment.

Mr. JACOBS. That is right. I agree with you on that.

Now, then, they are going to try to determine whether or not the employer has coerced the employee.

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. In determining that question, let us say that overt act was the discharge of the employee. That is the overt act.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. But now we are on trial. We are going into a judicial inquiry to determine one thing, and that is whether or not the employee was discharged because of his union affiliation. Can you conceive in logic of a court's being denied the right to consider what the employer may have said about the union?

Mr. SCOTT. Do not forget the last part of this section, which makes the rule of evidence conditional, and that is, if such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit, which is tantamount to coercion. Now, if anything that the employer has said, or the employee, either, because it works both ways, amounts to that, then the rule of evidence does not apply.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then let us look at it this way: Suppose the section had said this, that the expression of my opinion shall not constitute an unfair labor practice unless it contains express threats, et cetera?

Mr. SCOTT. I would be in favor of that.

Mr. JACOBS. We would agree on that?

Mr. SCOTT. I would be in favor of that. The method by which that was written is not a thing that I am praticularly impressed by. My whole point is this: Let us have a safeguard so that the first amendment will really be followed.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you agree with me that under the law, as evidentiary rule, whatever one man says about another should be an evidence of his motive in his conduct toward the other man?

Mr. SCOTT. I think that is a fundamental rule that is generally recognized.

Mr. JACOBS. That would be a fundamental rule of evidence.

Now, will you agree with me also that section 8 (c) buries that rule in the labor relations field?

Mr. SCOTT. It probably restricts it.

Mr. JACOBS. We will say it restricts it, then. All right. And then I suppose that the conclusion would inevitably be that to that extent, you think it is unfair?

Mr. SCOTT. I would perfectly agree to your changing that provision so that you leave out the evidence business and say that whatever a man says will not constitute an unfair labor practice unless it amounts to coercion.

Mr. JACOBS. And leave out the words "or be evidence of"?

Mr. SCOTT. That woud suit me all right.

Mr. JACOBS. Just strike them out?

Mr. SCOTT. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, while you and I are in agreement, let us just quit.

Mr. SCOTT. I believe that would be a good idea.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Very well.

On page 3, you say it is the duty of the union to bargain collectively in good faith with an employer whose employees it represents. To this, organized labor can have no sound objection, for if the employer is obligated to bargain, surely the same responsibility should be placed on the representative of the employees.

Basically, can you concive of any other reason that a union would be organized other than for the purpose of collective bargaining?

Mr. SCOTT. No. That is the only real purpose of organizing and being selected as representative. But there have been occasions, after the selection has been made, in which the union would not bargain collectively.

Mr. BURKE. Might not those examples be more a case of a disagreement? Is it not possible that the people involved in a certain situation might be at a disagreement rather than a break-down of collective bargaining, from the very fact that the union is there and is established solely for the purpose of collective bargaining? Then if there is any break-down in collective bargaining, might it not be because of disagreement rather than any refusal to bargain collectively?

Mr. SCOTT. That is not the type of situation which I have in mind in making this statement. What I have in mind is this: When a union has been organized and has been selected as the representative of the employees and certified, then it goes to the employer with a contract all written out and says, "Sign on the dotted line; take it or leave—the whole business."

If the employer says, "There are certain things in there that we cannot agree to, but we are willing to sit down and talk to you about it," and they say "No, take all as it is, or we strike," now, that has happened.

Mr. BURKE. Going to point No. 2, including "To abide by an existing labor contract which is a party," we have had in the House Committee on Education and Labor, since I have been a member, hearings on this act which is now in process of hearing, and on another labor act, and in those hearings—at least two cases—were brought to the attention of the committee, at which time both employer and union representatives pointed out that they had over a period of a great number of years in one case—I believe it was 25 or 35 years, and in another case for a larger number of years, certainly not since the adoption of the Taft-Hartley Act—been bargaining in good faith and had lived up to the terms of their agreement. In fact, that was the testimony that they gave to the committee. Is that not the usual situation?

Mr. SCOTT. I think it is. I think that the contrary is an exception to the rule. I was talking with the national head of an A. F. of L. union the other day who said that they had been doing business with their employers since 1886 and had never had a strike or anything of the kind which would lead up to a damage suit or anything of that sort. But that is not true of all unions. Insofar as it is true of unions I am certainly in favor of it, because I would like to make our position clear here on this whole business. We are in favor of collective bargaining.

Mr. KELLEY. Might I interrupt. You have 1 minute left, Mr. Burke.

Mr. SCOTT. We think that full and free collective bargaining offers the only reasonable, sound solution to labor-management strife. But we think it should be on the basis where each party occupies an equal position with the other in the matter of bargaining.

Now, where that has been made true because of the foresight and intelligence of the employer—which is not always true, I am sorry to say—and the foresight and intelligence of the union leaders—which I am also sorry to say is not always true—then the Government should lay down some rules to guide free and fair collective bargaining.

If those rules are fair to both people, that is the main thing that we are interested in. But we are heartily in accord with the processes of collective bargaining and we hope they can be made to work satisfactorily.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time has expired, Mr. Burke.

Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Mr. Scott, your presentation here does not cover the interstate bus lines, like Greyhound and so forth?

Mr. SCOTT. That is the type that it does cover. Ours is the inter-city motor bus industry as distinguished from the local transportation industry, such as Capital Transit here in town, and so forth.

Mr. WIER. Then you are not covering both interstate and inter-city, are you?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes. I think that all of the members of our own industry are engaged in interstate commerce, although frequently they did not operate beyond the boundaries of a State. All of them, so far as I know, are subject to the Interstate Commerce Act.

Mr. WIER. Then you are representing, and these figures on the last page represent, your labor disputes involving over-the-road Greyhound busses?

Mr. SCOTT. It is not only Greyhound; it is——

Mr. WIER. I mean the over-the-road busses.

Mr. SCOTT. It is that type. It is those which operate between cities rather than those which operate within a city or within a municipal area.

Mr. WIER. I was interested in that, because I reviewed these figures, and I am a little concerned about them. I would like to check them so that I will not put myself in a position of not having the facts to question the figures with.

You made some reference in your presentation here to the divorcement of the mediation and conciliation services from the Labor Department.

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. I would like to have you elaborate on that, because I am concerned with that insofar as it has been made an issue in the Senate hearings, and you make it an issue here, as to whether it is a function of the Labor Department or whether it is beyond the bounds of the Labor Department, and the advantages that accrue from that, beyond the fact that the services of the Mediation and Conciliation Service are not determined by what particular department it is under, but by the servicing of the individual cases: is that not correct?

Mr. SCOTT. Theoretically it is correct; but to get back to the fundamentals, the Labor Department was created by statute. There is an enabling act which set it up in the first instance, and one of the statutory provisions is that the Labor Department's functions, among others, is to foster and protect the cause of labor.

It is quite right the Labor Department should do everything it can to carry out its statutory mandate. But it seems to me that conciliation and mediation are entirely different things from advocacy. I think the Labor Department should be an advocate of labor, but I do not think that the Conciliation and Mediation Service has any place within the organiaztion of a statutory advocate, any more than a court would have.

Mr. WIER. Again, I am trying to determine your position on the divorcement, as to what advantage you feel lies in the divorcement of the Department, and following that up with this question: Do you feel that there was any partiality shown as against management during the time it was under the Department of Labor, under the Wagner Act?

Mr. SCOTT. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Then my answer to that is that we feel exactly the opposite, and not to where the Department is, but under whose direction.

Mr. SCOTT. That might make a lot of difference.

Mr. WIER. It makes a lot of difference.

Mr. SCOTT. But a Secretary of Labor who is trying to live up to his statutory duties is more apt to appoint somebody that sees eye-to-eye with him than otherwise.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this: You think the Department of Labor was set up for what purposes?

Mr. SCOTT. One of the purposes was to foster, protect, and promote the cause of labor. That is specifically stated in the statute.

Mr. WIER. I would hate to think that the Department of Labor was set up in the interests of management.

Mr. SCOTT. That is right. But I think it would be just as bad to have a Conciliation Service in the Department of Labor as it would be to have it in the Department of Commerce. I do not think it belongs in either place.

Mr. WIER. In the first place, many of the things that you make reference to here in your hopes of being retained in the new law have no relationship to the Conciliation and Mediation Department. That is the meat of the whole thing.

Mr. SCOTT. I certainly am in favor of a strong Conciliation and Mediation Department, but I am not in favor of having it in the Department of Labor. I would like to have it independent.

Mr. WIER. I am in agreement with the first part of your statement and in disagreement with the second part. I think that is going to be either the success or the failure of any set-up for the purpose of conciliation and mediation, that is, the type of service that it renders. It can either fail or succeed on the basis of the service that it renders, regardless of where it is located.

Mr. SCOTT. That is right: I agree with that, and I carry it one step further, as I did in my statement, that we are very much in favor of an arbitration system which will eliminate work stoppages and that sort of thing. We would like to have an arbitration system set up, however, whereby we can call upon somebody who is fair and impartial to appoint arbitrators to serve on our arbitration board.

Mr. WIER. I have had some experience with the Greyhound system in my part of the country and its dilatory tactics in the renewal of its agreements up there.

Mr. SCOTT. I should like to make the record clear by saying that Greyhound is only one of our members.

Mr. WIER. Well, it is a bad one.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute, Mr. Wier.

Mr. WIER. That is all.

Mr. SCOTT. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Scott, you represent an industry which directly serves the public, and for that reason your testimony and opinions regarding certain types of strikes take on an added significance, because if there is one thing important to me in all legislation dealing with labor-management relationships, it is to see that the public interest is protected.

In view of that, is it your opinion that the provisions of the proposed bill, H. R. 2032, adequately protects the public in strikes dealing with national emergencies?

Mr. SCOTT. We do not.

Mr. MCCONNELL. You think not, you say?

Mr. SCOTT. We think not, although I may say this, Mr. McConnell: We have never considered that our industry is such as to be subject to the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law concerning national emergencies, for the reason that we have no Nation-wide bargaining or contracts.

We have no regional bargaining or contracts, so far as I know. So whatever work stoppages there have been, have been in a limited area involving, say, one line at a time, so that we have never felt that we could call upon the provisions of the national emergency section of the present law under the circumstances. But we think that these things to which we have alluded are necessary in order to protect the public. We have to think of the public, because we live from the public's funds, and particularly the little fellow that does not have much money.

Mr. McConnell. That is one of the most difficult problems we have to deal with in our American life at the present time.

Mr. Scott. I know it is.

Mr. McConnell. There has never been a complete solution to it. We realized that in the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act. It was a compromise. It is always an open-end proposition, because we hesitate to bring it to compulsory arbitration conclusions, and therefore it has never been solved. It has been in the nature of a compromise.

Mr. Scott. And I must confess to you that we do not have any solution for it that we think would work. We oppose compulsory arbitration. We think that ultimately the only solution of it is successful collective bargaining by two parties on the same level, with equal rights and equal responsibilities.

Mr. McConnell. Now, it states here in the new bill that when the President finds that a national emergency is threatened, or exists, because a stoppage of work has resulted or threatens to result from a labor dispute, and so on, he shall issue a proclamation to that effect and call upon the parties to the dispute to refrain from a stoppage of work, or if such stoppage has occurred, to resume work and operations in the public interest.

Suppose they decide not to comply with that? There might be some type of arrogant person who would defy that idea or the request of the President, to continue to work. Then what happens?

Mr. Scott. Under this law, after the appointment of the board and its report, nothing happens—under this bill as it is written.

Mr. McConnell. Suppose they decide to defy the order to resume work, and to go on with their stoppage? Does the President have any inherent power, in your judgment?

Mr. Scott. I should like not to answer that question, Mr. McConnell, because I do not know. There are able lawyers who say that he does and there are other able lawyers who say that he does not, and I have made no independent investigation of it.

Mr. McConnell. What is your opinion of the injunctive idea at such a point?

Mr. Scott. I have not thought very much of that, either, because we had always considered that part of the present law inapplicable to our industry. It would be speaking just hypothetically if I spoke about it; or, rather, academically is perhaps the better word.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, you do not choose to commit yourself on a method by which work would be continued if they refused to comply with the order?

Mr. Scott. I think this: I think in such fields as transportation, where the main interest is the protection of the welfare and health of the public itself, some method must be found whereby those services can be continued where negotiations have reached a stalemate. Whether the injunction is the right way or not, I do not know. The last time that there was difficulty in the railroads, the President went back to an old statute of 1916 and took over possession and operation of the railroads. There might be something in that which would offer possibilities, but I do not throw it out as adequate. I throw it out merely as a suggestion and tell you that I do not have the answer. I wish I did.

Mr. McConnell. If there is no inherent right to cause them to abide by the proclamation, then for all practical purposes in the field of national emergencies this proposal of the administration in H. R. 2032 is just a powder-puff type of proposition?

Mr. Scott. That would be my judgment about it.

Mr. McConnell. You have nothing more to contribute regarding the strikes of a national emergency nature?

Mr. Scott. I think not, Mr. McConnell.

Mr. McConnell. Do you like the idea of emergency boards making recommendations?

Mr. Scott. The only thing that can be said in favor of that is that it might, by virtue of public opinion, be effective, but I do not know.

Mr. McConnell. Suppose they did not make any recommendations, but just published the facts, then what?

Mr. Scott. Then it is a worthless procedure.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, the present procedure would be worthless?

Mr. Scott. That would be my judgment about it.

Mr. McConnell. You feel that they should issue recommendations?

Mr. Scott. I would think so.

Mr. McConnell. Does it not become vital, if we are going to have voluntary arbitration, that the Conciliation Service and Arbitration Service be absolutely impartial?

Mr. Scott. That is our definite position, sir.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, if we are going to proceed to encourage voluntary arbitration, it is most essential that the parties involved—both sides—have absolute faith in the impartiality of the conciliators and arbitrators?

Mr. Scott. That is one of the most important points that we make in our statement, sir.

Mr. Kelley. You have 1 minute left, Mr. McConnell.

Mr. McConnell. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. No questions.

Mr. Kelley. Thank you very much, Mr. Scott.

Mr. Scott. Thank you, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen.

Mr. Kelley. Is Mr. Jeffrey present?

(No response.)

Mr. Kelley. Is Mr. Steele present?

Mr. Steele. Yes, sir.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Steele, you may proceed.

Do you have a long statement?

Mr. Steele. Not particularly, Mr. Chairman.

TESTIMONY OF HOYT P. STEELE, VICE PRESIDENT, THE BENJAMIN ELECTRIC MANUFACTURING CO., DES PLAINES, ILL., REPRESENTING THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. Chairman, my name is Hoyt P. Steele. I am executive vice president of the Benjamin Electric Manufacturing Co. of Des Plaines, Ill. I am also a member of the labor relations committee of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and I am here today to present the views of the United States Chamber of Commerce on changes in our labor laws.

By way of background——

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Steele, do you propose reading this statement?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. You are going to summarize it?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you.

Mr. STEELE. By way of background, the Chamber of Commerce is a federation of over 3,000 local chambers of commerce and State chambers of commerce and other business groups, and includes over 1,250,000 American businessmen.

My own company, for background, is typical of the average American manufacturing concern, medium to small business, a single factory located on the rural edge of Chicago. We employ about 450 men and women in our factory and our products are industrial lighting fixtures, electrical specialties, signals, and washing machine tubs.

I would like to file for the record my complete statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it is so ordered.

Mr. STEELE. It is a rather detailed statement of the chamber's view regarding the proposals under consideration for changes in the labor law.

Then I would like to summarize that statement and to speak also from my own experience. I hope that will help to show why so many American businessmen hold the views that are stated in the detailed brief.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States has always maintained a policy of being interested in good employer-employee relations. The expression of its views on the subject is not based on what happened the last 2 years, but go back many years prior to the Wagner Act.

Accordingly, our policy today is one of endorsing the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively whenever such action is the result of their own free and uncoerced choice. Our concern in making representations before Congress is that we shall have a labor-management law which will in fact make possible the very best kind of collective bargaining. We believe that industrial peace can best be achieved by placing principal reliance on procedures to which the parties have voluntarily agreed. At the same time we believe it should impose the quality of obligation on both parties, employer and union, and should give paramount consideration to the public interest.

We believe legislation should be written for the good of all parties, the public, employees, and employers.

Our basic position is that the principles of the present laws should be retained. We see no reason for tossing them into the discard and returning to a statute passed 14 years ago designed to correct certain conditions of that period.

The Wagner Act standing alone would clearly be inadequate today. It nourished the weak and struggling labor movement of 1935 into the powerful movement of 1949, with 16,500,000 members. There is no little irony in the current act to protect that brawny giant from employers who are wondering how equal their position is at the bargaining table. For every large employer able to take care of himself against the weight of million-member unions, there are thousands of small ones who are not. The collective-bargaining process is exactly as complete, and the contract usually has as many paragraphs in it, for the company with 50 employees as for the company with 50,000.

A law should not be written for the benefit of special groups to give them a position over and above that granted other citizens. Law, regardless of what subject it touches, should seek to promote the public interest. It it does that, it will protect the general interest and the welfare of all the people.

A return to the Wagner Act under the changed conditions of 1949 would not promote the public interest because it would benefit special groups, the union, just as it has benefited them in the 1930's. Nor would the law be much improved by the modifications proposed in H. R. 2032. These modifications state in forthright manner some of the problems, but the remedies proposed are not adequate.

On page 2 of the filed statement, I would like to read the summary that is there.

We believe that the basis for a sound national labor policy is a law directed in the encouragement of free-voluntary collective bargaining.

We believe that any such law should also contain adequate provision for machinery to settle labor disputes when bargaining breaks down. Particularly should there be effective procedures for the settlement of national emergency strikes.

We believe that Congress should take effective steps to outlaw monopolistic practices, whether by unions or employers or both, in combination.

We believe that the law should require both unions and employers to bargain collectively in good faith, provided the union is the representative of the majority of the employees. We believe that the law should define the scope of this obligation to bargain so that the parties will be assured of certainty in their relationships.

We believe that unions should be subject to unfair labor practice charges for various well-known causes, such as forcing an employer to discriminate, or to violate the law, for secondary boycotts, for jurisdictional strikes, for forcing an employer to choose a bargaining representative, and for restraint and coercion of employees in their rights under the act.

We believe that Congress should encourage union attainment of responsibility.

We believe in the principles of free speech for both employers and unions, assured of no coercion, threats of reprisal, or promises of benefit.

We endorse the principle of a strong, independent Conciliation Service, with a definite statutory direction.

We believe that the foremen and supervisors are members of management and should be recognized and accepted as such.

We believe that the procedural reforms made in the NLRB, such as separation of the prosecution and judicial functions of the Board should be retained.

We believe that compulsory unionism should be prohibited.

We deplore the attempt to usurp State powers by the provision which destroys State laws regulating compulsory unionism.

I have myself negotiated six union contracts with one union in the past 5 years. Four of these were negotiated under the Wagner Act conditions, and two under the present law. Our experiences, I think, are typical of the collective bargaining process of most of American industry, and I hope that my discussion briefly of a few of the differences will be helpful.

When our union was not required to bargain in good faith, bargaining became a question of receiving from the union a list of their demands, answering them with counterproposals, and receiving back from the union the same list of primary demands. This process went on in 1947, in the April negotiations, until the union decided that by the application of an economic force, the company would give in substantially to the listed demands. A strike was effectuated, and after a week it was clear then to individual employees what the company's position was, and possibly how firm the company was in its beliefs, and they began to drift back to work. Shortly a contract was signed with almost identical provisions that were offered in the first place.

The contract that was signed could have been signed before and would have saved the loss to the community, which in a semirural area, at least, is of considerable importance, and certainly the loss to the individual employees.

We have negotiated two contracts since the present law was in effect. Under the free-speech clauses of the present law, we felt that we were able to keep our employees fully aware of the company's position and the company's reasoning, both by letters written after each negotiating section reporting exactly what took place, and stating further the company's position on every matter, reporting the company's concessions as they were made, and also in one situation that appeared to be approaching a crisis, by individual meetings, voluntary meetings, with all employees.

We have gone through both of these negotiations, once in January of 1948 and once in October of 1948, with no strike. The contracts have embraced a cost-of-living bonus plan which has been in the matter of wages, which has been very helpful to employees during this particular period of time.

Obviously, for the CIO union, the cost of living bonus plan was entirely unacceptable to them. Without the free speech clauses in the present law, we are certain that we would have had two strikes, one in January and again in October, and the provision in the present law for free speech on the part of the employers has eliminated the loss to the community and to the individual employees that would have been caused.

In our experience, if labor laws should encourage and promote labor-management peace, then free speech for employers should be retained, and this entirely apart from the aspect of fairness or the principle of equality before the law.

On compulsory unionism, our experience may be of some interest. We have always maintained in our company that no man need belong to the union in order to obtain or to hold his job. This of course is exactly the stated, published, policy of the chamber of commerce. It is a form of freedom that is near-sacred in this country. However, up to last October we had in our union contracts a form of union shop, maintenance of membership, originally ordered during war time by a War Labor Board against a union demand for a closed shop.

We have held that the union should be able to maintain its membership on its own merits and not by compulsion. The union has claimed that without compulsory unionism—and they have claimed this throughout negotiations, and the question has been up at every single negotiating session—without compulsory unionism in our contracts there will be free rides for those who derive the benefits without contribution.

In a free society, I believe, there will always be a few free rides in any association, in any combination of men; but only a few. There are also those who will honestly disagree with the union's definition of "benefits."

Since last October, when we negotiated a union contract without maintenance of membership, the union membership in our factory has actually increased. They have today about 85 percent of the total eligible wage earners in the factory, whereas under maintenance-of-membership conditions the best they ever had was 78 percent.

I feel that under the circumstances it hardly appears that the present law was busting this union or enslaving anyone.

On the matter of the Conciliation Service, in the course of the years, we have on occasion called upon the Conciliation Service and the predecessors of this present Service for assistance when contract negotiations reached crisis stages, and also an arbitration of the normal month-to-month grievances. Our experience since the Labor-Management Relations Act and the independent Conciliation Service has been that the commissioners of conciliation are neutral, are independent, and are of tremendous assistance, in the matter of settlement of grievances particularly.

The Conciliation Service is not a labor function, but a labor-management function, and I feel, as did the previous witness, that it belongs just as improperly in the Department of Commerce as in the Department of Labor. The Department of Labor is intended to promote the interests of wage-earners—of labor. We do not believe that commissioners of conciliation can remain entirely neutral if the Service is transferred to the Department of Labor.

On the subject of secondary boycotts, I appeared 2 years ago last month before this committee and testified solely on that point. I am vitally interested in the subject, because my company is the victim of the secondary boycott practiced in the electrical industry. I will be quite specific on this subject, because I think I am very well informed on it as I deal with it on a day-to-day basis.

As a matter of background and history, I will have to say that the union in our plant is the Electrical Workers Union of the CIO, the union that has almost complete representation, or contracts, with electrical contractors throughout the country. Those contractors who install lighting equipment almost to the conclusion, or I believe to the exclusion of any other union, have contracts with the International Electrical Workers of the A. F. of L.

In 1945, to go back to the history again, a policy meeting was held by the IBEW in Milwaukee, and it was reported, where a decision was made that no IBEW members as a matter of policy would hang or install or use or handle a fluorescent lighting fixture that did not bear the label of the IBEW indicating that it had been manufactured by a member of that union or in a factory where that union had a contract. The boycott operation that stemmed from that policy decision was, of course, somewhat slow in getting under way, because there are locals all over the country, many cities having two or three of them. Nevertheless, it made steady and persistent headway. By 1947 there were boycotts in operation, actually, against unlabeled fluorescent lighting fixtures in almost every major industrial area in the country, with the possible exception of some of the southeastern States, and it was apparent that it was going to go into those areas, too.

A package of the Labor-Management Relations Act with its prohibitions against secondary boycotts of this type, slowed down this boycott by the IBEW against CIO-made or nonunion-made fluorescent lighting fixures to a considerable extent. It has not eliminated it entirely, but actually at the moment a boycott is in effect of this sort in the cities of New York, Chicago, Minneapolis, St. Louis, Kansas City, and that is about all.

Even the present law does not make it simple to obtain a case to be presented to the Board of the type of boycott that I am speaking of. It goes further than that. I mean, obviously a lighting fixture or a group of them is ordered and delivered to a job site. The union electrician says, "We won't hang that fixture." So they send it back.

So you have a definite, positive evidence of the existence of concerted action, a refusal to handle the material. The boycott is more underground the way it is practiced at present. No one in the construction industries, no building contractor, no architect or specifying engineer, wants to have trouble on his job. Therefore, if he knows that the boycott situation exists in his area or the area in which a building is going up, he will inquire first before he writes specifications for lighting fixtures, and if the unit does bear the label of the IBEW, it is not specified. Even if it is specified because the engineer or architect makes a mistake, the electrical contractor, who knows very well whether the boycott exists or not, changes the specifications, since it is his very own employees who are involved.

Now, there are cases where errors have been made, and we have received, with our CIO-made products, orders for shipment and installation in an area where the boycott is in effect. What happens is that they start to say that if the unit is refused, they will not accept it. We agree, all right, if that is the case, there is not a thing we can do about it. We do not have an IBEW plant. We have a union contract in effect. It was originally certified in 1943, and there is nothing we can do about it. So we say, "Please send the material back."

There is one case where the present law actually works. It is a little detailed, but it works, because once we say "Send the material back," there and then they know, and we get evidence and we have a case. In two of the years of watching very carefully for cases we can present to the Board, we have never yet had them. However, the very existence of this secondary boycott situation, as we have it in this present law, has definitely slowed down that present law.

An interesting thing has happened since November. In anticipation of the change in the labor law, we have seen an increasing activity, or rather it is reported to us by our men in the field, our own salesmen, our wholesalers, and electrical contractors with whom we have done business for a long time, that in anticipation of the change in the law, the secondary boycott activity on the part of this one union against nonunion-made or CIO-made electrical lighting fixtures is increasing.

Now, in H. R. 2032, as I read it, the only prohibition, the only type of secondary boycott that is prohibited, is the type that stems from a representation situation or a jurisdictional situation. The kind that is covered here is provided for in the law, where there is actually a concerted action to refuse to handle goods by one union, and it actually is not a strike or a picketing, or anything of that sort; but actually it is a threat of strike. These electricians tell their contractors or employers "We will not hang the unit." So that there is a refusal to work, and carried to its final form, it would be a strike.

That sort of situation is not covered at all in H. R. 2032 and I am certain that if provisions at least as strong as those contained in the present law are not continued, this secondary boycott, against which an employer has absolutely no recourse whatever, will come into play again. We did violate the law by inviting the IBEW to our plant. We would be inviting considerable trouble on the part of the CIO union if we attempted such a thing. There is nothing that we can do about it, and without provisions at least as strong as in the present law, I am certain that this secondary boycott situation will grow and spread to many other lines beside fluorescent lighting fixtures. There is a tendency that is growing in that direction now.

Secondary boycotts, of course, as reported in the watch-dog committee report, take many, many forms and variations. I believe that all of them are unfair and that all of them should be prohibited. I can conceive of one single case—and it has been referred to before as possibly a justifiable type.

It was one where a plant which we call A has a dispute, or the employees have a dispute with their employer, and the employer, to circumvent directly the economic force of that strike, sends out tools, or leases or subcontracts work of great importance, and the secondary boycott must be applied to some other employer. Possibly that is a justifiable secondary boycott. If the employees of A company picket the plant of the subcontractor, that is justifiable. But in most cases it would seem that primary action, the application of economic force, should be limited to those cases where employees are acting directly against their own employer.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Steele, on page 2, the "Summary of views", the second paragraph.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. You say:

> We believe that any such law should also contain adequate provision for machinery to settle labor disputes when bargaining breaks down. Particularly should there be effective procedures for the settlement of national emergency strikes.

When bargaining breaks down in settling labor disputes, that invites stalling on the part of one party or the other, or it invites the refusal to bargain, on the part of one party or the other. When the collective-bargaining machinery breaks down, then you weaken collective bargaining; and, when you surround collective bargaining with any provisions of law, then it is weakened, if not destroyed. Collective bargaining must be free, unhampered, and unrestricted. That has been my experience in negotiating contracts, as an employer, by the way, and I have always felt that, as long as you keep the parties sitting around the table talking, there are bound to be some results sometime, and you cannot put anything in front of them; because, if you do, it weakens them.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Kelley, I feel, to elaborate on this general statement of policy some, I agree with you completely that collective bargaining must be absolutely as free as possible. You say one of the things you must do—and I find this from my experience too—is to keep people talking, and to keep them around the table. It seems to me that is exactly what a free independent conciliation service helps to do, and I think it does the best when it has the confidence of both sides around the bargaining table. I think employers generally—and this gets into the point of the independent conciliation service granted—but I believe the employers will continue to have confidence in the Conciliation Service if it is not attached to the Department of Labor, which was established for the purpose of promoting the interest of labor.

As far as the national emergency strike situation, I feel H. R. 2032 recognizes the need for some positive action for machinery. I feel that if 30 days as a cooling-off period, as indicated in H. R. 2032, is good, then 80 days, as is in the existing law, is better. I feel the mere force of public opinion, which apparently is the only tool left to the President, is substantially no tool at all. The injunctive process in the present law has been used on six occasions as you know, and if the force of public opinion has been sufficient it does not seem reasonable the injunction would have been used in such case.

From my own experience—and I am obviously so small a manufacturer a strike in my plant will never be a national emergency—but certainly, as a consumer, I am interested in a telephone strike, or a coal strike.

Mr. KELLEY. When you say "coal strike," you are looking at me.

The argument the Conciliation Service should be an independent agency is a question that sets up much doubt in many people's minds. The argument for having an independent agency is that the Labor Department is charged with the duty of looking after the welfare and the interests of the workers. To me, that is a paramount reason why it should be in the Department of Labor, because if the Conciliation Service is in the Department of Labor then they are looking after the interests of the employees, the workers, because certainly if anybody wants to go to work it is the workers.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir, but is not conciliation, almost every matter that ever comes before a commissioner of conciliation, whether it be in the contract making or the collective-bargaining process, or whether it be the arbitration grievances, is that not an employee-employer function, a labor-management relationship; and, if commissioners of conciliation come under the Department of Labor, are they not already placed on one side of the table, rather than at the head of it?

Mr. KELLEY. I do not believe so, because I think the weight given Conciliation Service in their interest for the employee is sufficient pressure upon the Conciliation Service to get the employees back to work as soon as possible, and to settle disputes as soon as possible, because the employees are the people who suffer a great deal during a strike.

Mr. STEELE. But is it not the employer who is equally interested?

Mr. KELLEY. He is.

Mr. STEELE. The controversy is a labor-management controversy, and the purpose of conciliation is to keep people talking to line up a sensible agenda, and outline the issues and get them before you. We have done this several times in the cases of grievances, and it has worked since the Conciliation Service has been independent. It has worked remarkably satisfactorily, and we have only lost in arbitration five out of six cases. I am thrilled by the service of Conciliation Service.

Mr. KELLEY. One of the weaknesses of the policy in the past, instead of strengthening the Conciliation Service, even when it was in the Department of Labor, it was weakened by lack of proper appropriation.

Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Steele, you describe yourself as vice president of the Benjamin Electric Manufacturing Co. at Des Plaines, Ill. The fact of the matter is you are the official representative of the United States Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. It is generally conceded, is it not, Mr. Steele, the United States Chamber of Commerce is composed of a group of rugged individualists who object vehemently to the Government regulating business, but are prone to suggest they regulate every other class of our society?

Mr. STEELE. I am not under that impression.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to call your attention to a speech made by Mr. Earl Shreve, president of the United States Chamber of Commerce, in which he cried about the tendency to enlarge social-security activities, and to appropriate money for education, and about a national health program, and postwar airports and roads, and he referred to socialism; would you like to enlarge on that?

Mr. STEELE. I am afraid, Mr. Bailey, I am not qualified to do that. If you want my personal opinion, I would agree with Mr. Shreve, but I am a member of the Labor Relations Committee, and a member of the United States Chamber of Commerce, and an executive head of a small manufacturing enterprise, and I would rather confine my testimony to the subject of the current problems under the Labor Management Relations Act.

Mr. BAILEY. At the bottom of page 2 of your presentation, you set out 12 suggestions for the new labor legislation.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. On the whole, are they not blanket endorsements of the present law?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir. As I stated in my opening remarks, the basic policy of the United States Chamber of Commerce is to retain the principles of the present law; we think they should be retained.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to call your attention to section 2, the same section that the chairman of the committee discussed with you.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY (reading):

> Particularly should there be effective procedures for the settlement of national emergency strikes. We believe that any such law should also contain adequate provision for machinery to settle labor disputes when bargaining breaks down.

Would you advocate a compulsory arbitration, or would you resort to injunctive procedures, as in the present act?

Mr. STEELE. I would not resort to compulsory arbitration. I feel from my exeprience and I know the policy of the Chamber of Commerce arbitration is a very useful tool. It should be entered into voluntarily, and the assistance of the Conciliation Service is immensely important as far as the national emergency strike. I feel there is no tool in the hands of the administration in H. R. 2032 to handle a national emergency strike. A strike situation has occurred six times since August 1947.

Mr. BAILEY. Take, for instance, the coal strike: The final strike was settled around a bargaining table, and not by the injunctive action.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. In fact, can you point out to me one single instance where the injunctive procedure under the Taft-Hartley bill has settled a strike?

Mr. STEELE. I feel the case is similar to the situation I described in the secondary boycott in the industry. The mere existence of it makes for the elimination of national emergency situations and the speedy settlement of them. I do not believe—and again this is entirely a personal opinion—I do not believe that the coal strike would have been settled 12 days or longer after the 80-day injunctive period without the injunctive procedure.

Mr. BAILEY (reading):

> We believe in the principles of free speech for both employers and unions, short of coercion, threats of reprisal, or promises of benefit.

Am I to understand you would like to go back to the practice they indulged in prior to the National Labor Relations Act when they would stick a little slip of paper in the employee's pay envelope and advise him how to vote?

Mr. STEELE. I do not.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you consider that coercion?

Mr. STEELE. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Just how far can the employer go under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act in that respect?

Mr. STEELE. I think it would take the courts to say how far he can go. This is how far I think he should be allowed to go, short of coercion: I would like to be able to stand up before the people who work for me, and to write them a letter, and set forth in as clear use of the English language as I can, the issues that are at stake. My experience with collective-bargaining committees of unions is that, although there may be 5 or 10 members, there is very little that gets back to the employee in the shop. In the case of the strike situation that we had in April 1947, in our plant, the only single membership meeting of that union—and it was a very strong and militant union—they had only 50 percent of the union members present, and the only time they ever had that many at a membership meeting was at the time of the strike vote. Never yet since have they had a forum of 50. How can you expect, with all due credit for honesty on the part of the union representatives, and particularly the people who are employees on negotiating committees, how can you speak for the employee, as to how he is to make a decision, and whether he is to vote for a strike or not? How can he know it if the employer does not use the means at his disposal to tell him so, and to tell him why it is there, and to say, "If you do this, the company is going to go to pot in a year." That is, I think, a threat, and I do not think that would be necessarily allowed. I think an employer would be permitted to say he does not like such a union. I do not believe there is coercion in that.

Mr. BAILEY. You would not want to go so far as to say to an employee that, if he does not vote so and so, it will cost him his job?

Mr. STEELE. Absolutely not. I think that violates the basic principle we have been talking about.

Mr. BAILEY. You refer to the transfer of the activities from the present independent to the labor commission. I presume you are aware of the fact that the Hoover Commission is making recommendations for combining wherever possible these various activities, and no doubt will recommend that be placed in the Department of Labor.

I cannot conceive of an organization like the one you represent disagreeing with Herbert Hoover on anything.

Mr. STEELE. Of course, Mr. Bailey, I have not yet heard it is a fact that that recommendation has been made. I am simply saying it seems to me the conciliation function is a joint labor-management function, and the Conciliation Service which exists in the settlement of grievances and in the making of contracts, even at the crisis stage, it will do the job better and have the greater confidence of the employees.

Mr. BAILEY. I will say, Mr. Steele, you are honest in your convictions, and stick to your point.

Mr. STEELE. Thank you, Mr. Bailey.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Steele, I notice that you dwelled on the subject of public opinion. I am just wondering how that public opinion is created. Do you think that the members of the unions are equal to the members of the NAM and the USCC, of which you are a member, in the matter of creating public opinion in case of differences?

Mr. STEELE. Considering the availability of free speech in the union newspapers, I would think they are substantially equal; yes, sir.

Mr. IRVING. Of course, I would definitely have to disagree with you, because some mediums are not available to labor. I myself, personally, have tried to secure space for advertising in metropolitan newspapers, and have been told there was only so much space available, and so forth. Yet, in that same edition, a full-page ad would appear in an attempt to create public opinion in favor of the employer. There is no question about that. Also radio time is not available as freely and as equally to organized labor because you have to have a prepared script approved in advance of delivery, and labor does not have regular programs with commentators carrying that program on a regular schedule, so it is impossible. You speak of union newspapers. They reach only the union members. They do not reach the people we are talking about influencing in employer-employee controversies. I think that is very pertinent. Public opinion is usually created by the one who has the most economic power.

Mr. STEELE. May I make one reply, please, Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. Yes, sure. I should like to have your views.

Mr. STEELE. I do not think in terms of paid newspaper advertising because I myself have a very low opinion of the effect of the molding of public opinion that paid newspaper advertising has. In the second place, as far as radio time is concerned, from the situation that is present in one city that I know about, in Chicago, at the moment there is more regular scheduled labor commentation on the radio stations each day than there is telling the side of management or the employers.

Mr. IRVING. That is certainly the exception. I think you will agree with that.

Mr. STEELE. One of the reasons is because one of the strong electric unions runs a program by the commentator every day in the week over WGN.

Mr. IRVING. Generally speaking, that is not true. Just generally, all over the country, it does not exist.

Do you think that unions should be prohibited from assessing members, say, $15 or $20 or $25, for such purposes?

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Irving, I believe, when you speak of the matter of assessing, there are lots of problems wrapped up there. For instance, if you are speaking of a compulsory union situation—possibly even a closed shop, which would not be outlawed by H. R. 2032—if, by failure to pay the assessment, a man lost his job, yes, very definitely I am opposed to that. He should have a free right to determine whether he is supporting the program. If you do not agree with the assessment, you can quit; but under a compulsory union situation, of you do not agree with the assessment, you can quit and lose your job.

Furthermore, is the assessment the question of deduction from pay roll, or is the assessment to be deducted from pay roll; I understand that is a question not settled as yet.

Mr. IRVING. Do you not believe that would be very critical; I mean it would be open to considerable criticism by the public, and so forth, if the union did not adopt those methods, and did not assess those members in that manner? It seems to me there has been some criticism on that point.

Mr. STEELE. I think it depends entirely upon the purpose of the assessment.

Mr. IRVING. I was just referring to the AMA assessing their members $25 for the purpose of lobbying or creating public opinion. I presume—although I understand it is not compulsory—there is a possibility of a little displeasure on the part of some members of what you call an association, such as the NAM, or the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, or any business group, but which I refer to as a union because they represent their members in much the same manner as unions do for working people.

You mentioned about the membership of unions not being present and not being informed. I believe the officers usually accept it as an indication that the membership is satisfied with their leadership when they do not attend their meetings too regularly. There is no other assumption possible.

Mr. STEELE. I agree with you.

Mr. IRVING. They are satisfied with the officers and satisfied with the conduct of the business, but I am wondering if all of the corporations have all of their stockholders present when all the decisions are made in the various matters that would be of interest to stockholders.

Mr. STEELE. I understand that is not the case, Mr. Irving. I met the point in our own particular case, in our own company, because—and I am giving the union full credit, and honestly so, of telling the situation in contract negotiations exactly as it stands, and of even reflecting the company's position and the company's point of view accurately—but there is no medium of communication if they do not go to the meeting.

The confusion that existed under the Wagner Act was where there was question as to whether an employer could say the things I have said. The Wagner Act did not say definitely I could not say those things, but I have read a large number of the cases of the Board's actions in those days, and prior to August 22, 1947, I would not have dared to write the bulletins that I did, or to make the talks before a long series of employee meetings which I did. I welcomed that freedom of speech.

Mr. IRVING. I happen to know a case—and I am going to say I think the way you described your activities has been fair—but I do happen to know the case of the union where the employer used free speech as a means of coercion, saying that the company was going out of business, and so forth, if the union made a successful effort to negotiate an increase in wages.

As you say, the people start straggling back to work. In this particular case, I think it was a move to get 2½ cents after some employers had granted raises of 12½ cents. Those particular employees had been in the union for a number of years.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has one minute left.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you. I am sure you and I have found that to be the case in a number of instances since this has been in effect. The effectiveness of the union collective bargaining has been very much lowered.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Irving, the case you cited, it seems to me, would be an unfair labor practice under the present law, and would be and is contrary to the policy I have stated. That is coercion, and I think it is wrong, and I think it should be prohibited.

Mr. IRVING. I would like to ask one more question.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. Thank you, Mr. Steele.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Steele, I notice you have recommended the injunction. What do you consider the office of injunction to be?

Mr. STEELE. This, I presume, is the answer: You have too many people who are unfortunate by not being lawyers. As I understand it, the injunction, as I have seen it in the newspapers in the national crisis, as used, I understand it as being a process that stops an illegal action.

Mr. PERKINS. From your experience in dealing with labor and labor unions, have you had any occasion to use the injunction?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir. Unfortunately, I want to have one under the IBEW secondary boycott.

Mr. PERKINS. Since the Norris-LaGuardia Act outlawed the injunction, has there ever been an occasion in this country where we have needed the injunction in labor disputes?

Mr. STEELE. As I say, I believe that the injunctive process as applied to the portion of the law, the present law, dealing with the secondary boycott, for example, has helped.

Mr. PERKINS. We won the war without the injunction provision being in the Wagner Act; did we not?

Mr. STEELE. Yes; and we won the war, also, however, at tremendous sacrifice in this country, and there was a terrific compulsion to not strike.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask you if you are acquainted with the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir; I believe so.

Mr. PERKINS. Turning to the provision that deals with the unfair labor practices, section 8 (c), which has been discussed here this morning, there is a provision that states:

> Any expressions or views of the employer, argument or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether written, printed, graphic or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this Act if such expressions contain no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

What do you understand that to be?

Mr. STEELE. I understand that to be, Mr. Perkins, in practice, a means of detailing to some extent, at least, what an employer can say in the course of collective-bargaining procedure to his employees, without suffering the penalties that accrued under the Wagner Act, by board order, where those were declared unfair labor practices.

Mr. PERKINS. Did you know that for hundreds of years we have had a rule of evidence recognized by Federal courts and the State courts that any statement made by a party could be used against that party for the purpose of contradicting him if he appeared as a witness, or as a declaration against interest, or to show his motive or intent on any litigation that may come in court, either criminal or civil, and do you recognize the fact that this provision right here changes a rule of evidence in favor of the employer to something that has never been practiced in the courts of this Nation? Do you recognize that provision to have that effect?

Mr. STEELE. No; I do not. It seems to me the law states it is not an unfair-labor practice.

Mr. PERKINS. I believe you have recommended the injunction here without knowing just what the true office of the injunction is; is that correct?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir; I do not believe that is correct. I have recommended the injunctive process, as I have said in my detailed statement, in the maintenance of the present law, at least, in respect to the secondary-boycott procedure, jurisdictional strikes, national emergency, and it looks to me like it works there, and has been working there. I would not know the first thing about getting an injunction because I am not a lawyer.

Mr. PERKINS. You do not recognize the fact that the court has an inherent right to issue the injunction, do you?

Mr. STEELE. I do not believe I understand the question.

Mr. PERKINS. In the instance that irreparable injury was facing the country, a national emergency situation affecting the health and welfare of the country——

Mr. STEELE. You mean with or without the existence of the present law?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes; I mean without a statute.

Mr. STEELE. I do not understand the circumstances. If that were the case, and if the injunctive process were so simple to apply in six national emergencies, why was it not in 1946, when they went out to seize the railroads instead of stopping it by the injunctive process?

Mr. PERKINS. They got the injunction then; did they not?

Mr. STEELE. Yes; the railroads were seized, and the strike was ordered.

Mr. PERKINS. And the Taft-Hartley law was not on the books; was it?

Mr. STEELE. Possibly so. However, it seems that with the force of public opinion, which is the one apparent tool that is available under H. R. 2032, in the case of national emergency situations, that, in my opinion, is not sufficient. I think the injunctive process, as I said before, assisted in the settlement.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you know under what law the restraining order was issued to the railroads?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute left, Mr. Perkins.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Steele, I would like to explore your views in regard to another matter for a few minutes. You referred to your opposition to compulsory unionization, and in keeping with my understanding of that term, I think I would agree with you, but I am wondering what you meant by it. Do you mean by that you are opposed to the closed shop?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir; and, furthermore, I am opposed to the basic principle, to the basic situation where a man must belong to a union in order to obtain or to keep his job.

Mr. JACOBS. That is the closed-shop question, of course; is it not?

Mr. STEELE. Part of the closed shop, and part union shop.

Mr. JACOBS. Or union shop?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. That is what I wanted to explore your thinking on. You are a business corporation?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You have a number of stockholders, I suppose?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. It is not a closed corporation?

Mr. STEELE. No. However, it is very small.

Mr. JACOBS. Whether it be yourself or somebody else, a corporation elects directors; do they not?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And then the directors select executive officers?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. That is the usual pattern?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. The executive officers then, of course, transact the business of the company?

Mr. STEELE. Right.

Mr. JACOBS. Including the negotiating and execution of a collective-bargaining agreement with the employees, or whatever kind of agreement they have?

Mr. STEELE. Right.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, those executive officers are not bothered by any dissident factions of stockholders at the bargaining table; are they?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. They present a single front; that is correct; is it not?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not sort of see where there is just a little advantage on the part of the employer so long as he can maintain the philosophy that a man that shows his independence by not joining the union, do you not think that creates a divided front on the other side of the table that is somewhat advantageous to the employer?

Mr. STEELE. Possibly, but largely because the number of people is generally smaller.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you pardon me a moment? I seem to remember some of the big employers saying they have more stockholders than they have employees.

Mr. STEELE. Of course, again I am speaking for my own company, and from my own experience, but actually in our process of collective bargaining, with a group of four or five people sitting for management, in conference, there is often a difference of opinion, but because it is four or five instead of possibly four or five groups of a hundred apiece——

Mr. JACOBS. You are speaking of four or five people in executive positions, are you not? And they would be comparable, would they not, to the bargaining committee from the union?

Mr. STEELE. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. But I am talking about the stockholder. Can he come in and make a bargain with the union, or the employee? He cannot, can he?

Mr. STEELE. Oh, no.

Mr. JACOBS. So the employer comes to the bargaining table with a single front, and do you not think it is rather natural the employees would try to create a single front to bargain with the employer?

Mr. STEELE. It seems that is what they have tried to create in the first place.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course. I would not approve a law that said a man had to belong to a union, and I would not approve a law that said the employer had to sign a contract that was a closed-shop contract, but what your folks are asking is that we pass a law which says you may not sign a contract for a closed shop; in other words, is that not what it amounts to? As the law permits the directors of a corporation to represent all its stockholders, and the stockholders cannot interfere with the executive functions of the corporation, and then the same body of law turns around and says that it shall be unlawful for the contract between labor and management to say that all the workers shall join the single front; is that not about what it amounts to?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, but——

Mr. JACOBS. Do you agree with me?

Mr. STEELE. Actually, no. The stockholder has at least the opportunity to muster sufficient strength to do something about it.

Mr. JACOBS. Just what can he do about it?

Mr. STEELE. If he can obtain sufficient backing he can change the whole executive personnel of the employer.

Mr. JACOBS. As a lawyer myself, and having represented the labor unions, and also participated in a few interunion fights, I recognize there are some abuses within certain unions. Do you not sort of think it would be a good idea to try to make the unions decent by prescribing that they elect their officers rather than to try to divide them, as the Taft-Hartley Act does? What do you think about that as an objective approach to the question?

Mr. STEELE. As an objective approach to the question I think that is true. My opposition to the closed shop is not so much that the employer is not permitted to bargain on the issue of a closed shop, but because of the existence of the closed-shop arrangement promotes a closed union, for example.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you say that the union should not be closed? If the union were not closed would you object to the closed shop?

Mr. STEELE. If all of the monopolistic practices—and again I must speak only for myself—that might be fostered by the closed-shop contracts were eliminated, I personally would not object.

Mr. JACOBS. You are not speaking for the United States Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. STEELE. I do not know the policy of the chamber, and I doubt if they would agree with it.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think the real object is to keep the workers somewhat separated so they will not present a unified front at the bargaining table?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Let me ask you this: You have some 3,000 trade associations affiliated. Do you have these associations that denominate themselves as associated employers; are they members of the Chamber of Commerce?

Mr. STEELE. To my knowledge, no. The federated membership of the United States Chamber of Commerce is the local chamber of commerce.

Mr. JACOBS. I understand what you mean by that. I know of a certain employer association in a certain State, and they have said the same thing that you have said here today, that their object and purpose was to foster good peaceable labor relations between labor and management. There happened to fall into my hands, by chance, a bulletin that had been issued by that organization to its members, and I want to read you an excerpt from that bulletin.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute left.

Mr. BURKE. I will yield 5 minutes.

Mr. KELLEY. All right.

Mr. JACOBS. It was headed "Antiunion campaigns." The first sentence reads as follows:

> How far management can go to keep a union out of the plants is something more employers would like to know a great deal more about.

Do you believe that is true, that first statement?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. You think that most employers are of a mind that they accept the idea of complete unionization of their employer and employees?

Mr. STEELE. I think, by and large, employers in this country have awakened to the fact unions are here, and are here to stay, and employees deserve collective-bargaining arrangements, and their own free choice of representatives. I think very few employers would ever entertain a matter of that sort.

Mr. JACOBS. I wrote the man and asked him if he thought that was the view of all his membership, and he never answered me, but I did talk to a lot of the membership who said it was not their view.

I want to see if you will agree with me on this, and this is the last question: A few employers can drag down the wage scale and create unfair competition with which the fair employer cannot meet, is that correct; would you agree with that?

Mr. STEELE. I feel employers can drag the wage rate down?

Mr. JACOBS. Just a few employers could settle down a spiral——

Mr. STEELE. I do not think that is true.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think it would be safe to leave the matter of wages to the altruistic attitude of the employer in this country?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think there has been strife on the other side of the bargaining table?

Mr. STEELE. I think the bargaining process has done a pretty thorough job of establishing wage levels as to the value of the work.

Mr. JACOBS. You live close to one city in my State, Indiana, and you know there are two big employers down there?

Mr. STEELE. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And you know one of the employers has scarcely had any difficulty with its labor?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. I think within the last 6 months they have lost a few hours by labor disputes, and I believe that is the first time they ever have in the history of their operation. You know there is another large employer in that city, do you not?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. They are constantly at each other's throats; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Does it not seem to you that perhaps that results from the attitude of the management?

Mr. STEELE. You would expect in a free labor area that they will tend to gravitate toward the employer who has the best labor relations.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think maybe a lot of our labor strife in this country results from the philosophy such as was put out in the bulletin we were speaking of?

Mr. STEELE. I personally do not believe there is a lot of that philosophy, and I do not believe there is a lot of strife.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you agree with me on this, that sometimes the heads of the employer association do not properly represent the views of their members?

Mr. STEELE. I very definitely will.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke, you have 7 minutes.

Mr. BURKE. I will not need that much.

I would like to address myself on the subject of this Conciliation Service again. I recognize that you are out in the field, in the same manner that I have been, only on the other side of the table, and my experience has been that the personnel of the commissioners of conciliation has been largely the same under the new act, under the Taft-Hartley Act, as they were under the Wagner Act; is that not about right?

Mr. STEELE. I realize to a large extent the same men stayed on. The change of law did not make any difference.

Mr. BURKE. And they were drawn from practically all fields of endeavor. Some of them were retired ministers. In fact, I remember one retired corporation president, and some were from labor's ranks.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. And largely they built up a pretty good reputation in the community in which they carried on their operations, is that not true?

Mr. STEELE. That is right.

Mr. BURKE. Now, for practical purposes, that is, practical day-to-day working out in the field, is it not true that they could work just as well under the Labor Department as they could under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. STEELE. As men, yes, sir; I think they probably could, but I think there are two differences; one is that in the attachment to the Labor Department there is a possibility of the trend being to the labor side; it seems logical. What experience I have had with organization work, of you want somebody to be in the middle you leave him completely unattached. And the other point, I do not think it should be mandatory for employers or unions, in the cases of grievances, or in approaching crises of situations, and in contract making. I believe the best function can be served if there is complete confidence in the Service. I think there is a greater confidence on the part of the employers to go to the Service for help if it is independent.

Mr. BURKE. Has it not been the experience during some 34 years of the existence of the Conciliation Service, even before the Wagner Act, that they did receive the confidence of both sides when they came in on any given situation?

Mr. STEELE. But the operation was certainly limited in those days, and so, as a general rule, employers certainly did not turn to the Conciliation Service. At least, I did not, as an employer, as I have in the last 2 years. We have gone to them for the appointment of arbitrators after the third step in grievance procedure, and we have told them we thought there was an approaching crisis situation, and we thought they should come out and sit with us in the collective bargaining. We have done that both times in the two negotiations in 1948, and I believe the confidence the employer has in the Conciliation Service is greater if the Service is independent than if it is attached as part of the Department of Labor. That does not necessarily say that possibly the labor side of the table has less confidence; I am speaking from the employers' side.

Mr. BURKE. Of course, bearing in mind the distinction between the definition for conciliation, mediation, and arbitration, do you not think it is far better for the people on both sides of the table to strive to reach an agreement themselves before they resort to any of these various agencies?

Mr. STEELE. Absolutely; yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. It should only be somewhat of a last resort.

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. Burke. And prior to complete breaking off of negotiations in the operations?

Mr. Steele. Particularly in respect to conciliation during collective-bargaining contracts, to go as far as you possibly can, and then have conciliation to keep you going further.

Mr. Burke. But, as far as the prestige of the Service is concerned, there should be no difference out in the field, whether the Commissioner of Conciliation works for the Labor Department or for some independent agency?

Mr. Steele. I would agree that the Commissioners of Conciliation have generally made their own standing, but I feel wholeheartedly that employers have greater confidence in the Service, and therefore use it with greater confidence, and possibly use it to the elimination of grievances, strikes, or proper settlement of grievances and strikes, which is in the public interest, if the Conciliation Service is independent, and possibly on that one point.

Mr. Burke. That is all.

Mr. Kelley. Mr. Wier?

Mr. Wier. Mr. Chairman and Mr. Steele, I have perused your presentation here to some extent; and there is one line on the second page, or two lines on the second page, I want to refresh your memory on; and it has to do with your experience during the 20 months of the Taft-Hartley Act, and I quote from the second paragraph:

> Accordingly, it is our position that legislation should impose that minimum of control which will encourage voluntary rather than Government-imposed settlement of labor disputes.

That is correct?

Mr. Steele. Yes, sir.

Mr. Wier. During the sessions of the Eightieth Congress the word went out that this act was going to be enacted, under which labor and management both would strive for the continuance of friendly relations. That was broadcast from the time the act first made its appearance here in the Capital of our Nation. I have had some considerable experience with this act since it has been made the use of a medium in some labor disputes in my community, which happens to be Minneapolis.

From the inception of the idea of organization in a plant or institution, I have gone through it step by step, and I will give you my reaction to what the Taft-Hartley Act has done in the interest of management. Step by step it is a complicated piece of machinery. You can go from one stage to the next stage and finally wreck the union, but I will use one outstanding example, and that is the typographical strike in the city of Chicago. You are familiar with that?

Mr. Steele. Yes, sir.

Mr. Wier. You have never had any disagreement in the chamber of commerce or in the National Association of Manufacturers, openly, at least, in the carrying on of collective bargaining between either industry or management?

Mr. Steele. That is right.

Mr. Wier. And I think you are familiar with the fact that in this country over a long period, traditional period of time, some of our major industries—the printing industry, the building construction industries, the amusement industries, the movie and show business, and so forth—have always had a traditional policy of operating that business between management and labor under the so-called closed shop?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Are you familiar with the statement that Mr. O'Keefe made before the committee here in the Capitol——

Mr. STEELE. No; I am not.

Mr. WIER. With regard to the causes of the printers' strike in Chicago, in which he said there would not have been a strike had not the Taft-Hartley law been invoked by the process of steps to prevent them from renewing their agreement with the Typographical Union of Chicago. You have read that, have you not?

Mr. STEELE. I know some of the employers have stated that; yes.

Mr. WIER. And you and I have followed very closely the relations between labor and management, and you and I have followed the actual steps that management can take from the very inception of the idea that somebody is organizing his plant, and he has the right of very broad free speech and activity. In the case of the typographical union it is true that Mr. McCormick and his cohorts started to use the machinery that was laid out throughout the law.

Have you some knowledge of that? And what is your reaction to that situation?

Mr. STEELE. My reaction to the Chicago typographical strike, the newspaper strike, is this: They traditionally, of course, had closed-shop agreements, and they expected to have them renewed. The employers had always agreed to that, and they had just as soon have continued that, except that it was against the law for them to sign such a contract.

As I stated before, undoubtedly in this case it was unfortunate because it was an old union, and it had undoubtedly contributed considerable to the art, but nevertheless the effect on the labor relations on public interest of other closed-shop arrangements and other closed-union arrangements are reason enough, in my opinion, to continue to prohibit the closed shop.

There is certainly another answer to the contract-making by the Chicago newspapers.

Mr. WIER. Let us follow that strike up as a direct result of forbidding the employer and union of arriving at a logical level in the contract, which formerly has always been legal in this country. Are you in accord with all of the weapons that the Congress put into the hands of management, as has been demonstrated in that particular strike, in carrying it through, which meant that when the union failed to reach an agreement and called a strike, because of their inability by law to get the closed shop they were faced with injunctive processes as the first means of impeaching; that is correct, is it not?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. They were faced with injunctions from four States?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Then when that did not effectually cause a settlement and the return to the trade, they were further faced with suability on the basis—and the law is quite effective in that case—they were faced with suability and another injunction forbidding them or their membership from helping them in their dispute—that is correct, is it not—whether by process of a secondary boycott or by process of financial aid and relief and pickets other than those on strikes; do you remember those phrases?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Do you believe that the law of collective bargaining adds anything to the bargaining by the eventual process of total destruction of the union?

Mr. STEELE. No, sir. I believe that the present law adds considerable to the collective-bargaining process by placing both sides of the table on a substantially equal basis, which they were not on before. I do not believe that the law was intended, nor is it being used, that way by employers, as I answered Mr. Jacobs, for the purpose of busting unions. I do not believe that employers generally want to bust unions, and I do not think that the law will serve them in that respect if they do.

Mr. WIER. Then I am assuming from that answer that you have in mind the typographical union of Chicago or any place else does not have to be busted or wrecked; they can go back to work under the open-shop provisions of the act; is that right?

Mr. STEELE. Now, after all, there is a union-shop provision even in the present act. I believe that the long-standing closed-shop arrangements between publishers and the typographical union of Chicago make this one strike distinctly an exception, with the strike having been going on for so long. It is distinctly outside, and an exception. There is certainly another way of providing the function under the present law that the unions were after. There was, as I understand it, no disagreement as to wages or any other part of the contract. It would have been signed except for the closed-shop provision, and the employers would have signed it. So they certainly would have a signed union-shop provision. And certainly the typographical union could obtain a union-shop election.

Mr. WIER. Do you believe that an organization of 5,000 or 6,000 men ought to be responsible for the action under the suability clause for what some individual member may do or may commit?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. STEELE. The union as such is responsible under the suability clause, and not the individual members, as I understand it. And is not that the same position that a manufacturing concern is in, that the company can be sued for an action of its representative or officers? It seems to me again that is equality before the law.

Mr. WIER. That has been a most difficult case for us, and that is one of my reactions to the Taft-Hartley Act, that what the unions reserve is the right of protection of the contract is awfully difficult. When you say the employer has free speech to prevent the outgrowth of an organization, his free speech under this Taft-Hartley Act is unlimited.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time is up, Mr. Wier.

Mr. WIER. Thank you. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Steele, you have brought in certain views, and I would like to ask one or two questions.

You believe that the basis for sound national labor policy is a law protecting and encouraging free, voluntary collective bargaining. Do you feel that the provisions of the present Taft-Hartley law encourage free collective bargaining, or do they restrict it by some of the provisions we have in the law?

Mr. STEELE. Mr. McConnell, I feel that the present law does encourage free collective bargaining to a greater degree than was present, at least, under the old Wagner Act, or prior to the passage of this law, largely because for the first time management and labor are on substantially an equal basis, with the free-speech clauses, and so forth.

Mr. MCCONNELL. How about a definition of collective bargaining? What constitutes collective bargaining? Originally, I was of the opinion that that would be helpful. I am now of the opinion that it impedes rather than helps.

Mr. STEELE. You mean the existence of a definition?

Mr. MCCONNELL. That is, to define what is collective bargaining. If so-and-so takes place, then so-and-so must occur, and then so-and-so. I think that is putting collective bargaining too much in a strait jacket.

Mr. STEELE. I would rather not see the term defined, because we all know what it is, particularly those of us who have worked with it and are working with it. From my point of view, it covers the full range of relationships between employer and union, or employees' representatives.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I think it is a little vague when you say the law should contain certain adequate provisions for machinery to settle labor disputes when bargaining breaks down.

Mr. STEELE. This was intended, of course, here, as a summary, Mr. McConnell. I think the details are somewhat clearer in the body of the brief. The thought, of course, is that there should be mediation and conciliation measures, and there should be positive action available in the case of national emergency.

Mr. MCCONNELL. We are dealing with voluntary arbitaration, of course.

Mr. STEELE. The recommendation is for voluntary arbitration.

Mr. MCCONNELL. You also feel that mediation and conciliation would be better served by having it an independent agency rather than in the Department of Labor?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Now, I notice that the unfair labor practices in a substantial degree, as they apply to labor organizations, are removed in H. R. 2032. I am particularly concerned with one of them that has to do with restraint and coercion of employees in their rights to organize and bargain collectively. Would it not be true that coercion would have the same effect whether it is done by management or labor? Would that not be the fact?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir; and of course, I have dwelt on the subject. But, you see, there is coercion even to the point of joining the union in an open-shop situation. Coercion is very subtle. But it is there. I have seen it work. Everyone knows that sort of thing goes on.

Mr. MCCONNELL. In other words, a worker should not be coerced or restrained by either side? Would that not be a fair way to get at it?

Mr. STEELE. Yes, sir. The basic principle, I think, is that he should be completely free in his selection of a collective-bargaining representative, which means whether he have one or whether he not have one.

As I understand the law, although some of the Board decisions obscured the fact, the Wagner Act actually embraced that very philosophy. The employee was free to join or not join, as he saw fit. That is the freedom that is the basic principle of our whole collective-bargaining procedure.

Mr. McConnell. In recommendation No. 12, you say:

> We deplore the attempt to usurp State powers by the provision which destroys State laws regulating compulsory unionism.

I imagine the decision yesterday would have some effect on recommendation No. 12 in its relation to it. I think you are speaking of the same thing.

Mr. Steele. I think it has some relation to it. I am actually speaking in this brief of H. R. 2032, rather than of the State laws with regard to closed shops.

Mr. McConnell. You say here, "We believe that compulsory unionism should be prohibited."

You mean, the union shop set-up in the present Taft-Hartley law should also be stricken out?

Mr. Steele. As a matter of basic policy, I would say that the principle that no man should have to join or maintain membership in a union to hold his job should be followed. However, I believe and I feel personally that the union shop provisions, with the election procedure in the law, would, for instance, solve the Chicago typographical situation if they would only let it work.

Mr. McConnell. Have you covered some of the background of what you might call the compromise provision regarding the union shop in the Taft-Hartley Act? For instance, very few things we realize as we live in life are all good or all bad. We can argue for all ends, we might say, or on all sides of questions. There are advantages in the closed shop, and there are disadvantages in the closed shop. I think the thing that worried the committee most as we listened to testimony last year, was the power given to certain individuals in the closed shop. It virtually amounted to life or death, as far as the job of a worker was concerned, in certain types of industries. However, we recognized that there was an argument in connection with the free-rider idea. If you are going to have the advantages of a union operating, then you should pay some of the freight; you ought not to be a free rider. So the thought was that management would be given the right to hire their workers: they could use union's suggestions or hiring halls, if they wished, but fundamentally the right to hire the workers for their business was preserved. The committee, however, said that if you get a job with a concern, you will at least have to join the union to the extent of being willing to pay your freight and not being a free rider.

But we will also draw the teeth of the power over a worker's job and say that just because a worker might incur the wrath of some union leader and were suspended or fired from a union, not necessarily would he have to be fired from his job.

That was the general background of the compromise. Now, maybe we erred in that compromise; maybe we have gone astray in some part of the thinking of it. But that was the general background of the union-shop provision in the Taft-Hartley law.

In view of that, is it your thought that we should throw that out?

Mr. Steele. As a matter of basic principle, I think, yes, that compulsory unionism should not be permitted. Now, the question of free riders paying the freight went a long way to withdrawing the effect of the union-shop type of contract, since it was for nonpayment of dues only, and it was after initial hiring, of course. Actually, I do not know if anyone ever heard of the free-rider idea in connection with labor relations until after the union started charging a fare for the ride. But I can think of a parallel situation in local chambers of commerce. Many of them, in the smaller towns, in even the bigger towns, do a considerable amount for the advancement of the community. And there are some merchants, some manufacturers, who prefer not to join; yet they benefit as the community benefits, and they are not paying dues and they are not paying any of the freight.

I feel that that is exactly comparable to an employee. I think in the final analysis he may have an honest, sincere conviction that he just plain does not want to belong, whether he is deriving benefits or not. He may not believe what the union defines as benefits are benefits, and he should be free to make that choice. It does not do any good to say, "All right, if he does not like this arrangement, the union-shop area in general, say, all contracts being that kind, he will move to some other town."

I do not believe that the basic policy should be directed to the point where we expect a restriction of freedom in the right to work and where a man can work.

Mr. WIER. Will you yield to a question there, Mr. McConnell?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Nixon?

Mr. NIXON. I will yield my time to Mr. McConnell.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I yield to Mr. Wier.

Mr. WIER. To either one, Mr. McConnell or Mr. Steel, I would like to make this observation or ask this question. I would not want it to be left here in the minds of anybody that only the free-rider idea is involved in the closed shop. I think what you have to realize in dealing with this question there of the closed shop is that in many of our old established trades there is a lot more in the minds of the employer in dealing with a closed-shop union than in just making the member pay his freight, because, for example, in many of these trades—the old trades, and not the wartime ones—the question of the apprenticeship comes up through the union, the fact that the union has within its membership all of the most competent mechanics in that field, and that makes it more necessary and perhaps better for the employer to deal with a closed-shop union.

Is that not true, Mr. Steele?

Mr. STEELE. I think, sir, that it depends upon where you enter the circle. Being historically a closed-shop union, then, of course, they have a monopoly of the best mechanics, and monopoly in all other parts of our society is considered evil.

Mr. WIER. That is right. We have to deal with monopolies, too.

Mr. MCCONNELL. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all. Thank you very much, Mr. Steele.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Steele is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF HOYT P. STEELE, VICE PRESIDENT OF THE BENJAMIN ELECTRIC MANUFACTURING CO., DES PLAINES, ILL., ON BEHALF OF THE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE OF THE UNITED STATES, REGARDING NATIONAL LABOR LAW REVISION

I am Hoyt P. Steele, vice president of the Benjamin Electric Manufacturing Co. at Des Plaines, Ill. I am a member of the labor relations committee of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States, and am appearing as a witness on behalf of that organization. I should like to discuss current problems under the Labor-Management Relations Act, and make reference to various proposals to revise our national labor law which have been laid before your committee.

At the outset, a bit of background is appropriate, I believe. The Chamber of Commerce is a federation of some 3,050 local chambers of commerce, and trade associations, and other business organizations. These organization members, in turn, collectively comprise over a million and a quarter American businessmen in all field of activity in every geographical section in the United States. They and the policies of our organization represent the views of a major cross-section of American business.

I appear before you to present the viewpoint of that membership in regard to desirable principles which should be adopted in writing labor law.

The Chamber of Commerce of the United States has always interested itself in good employer-employee relations. Thus, its expression of views on the subject at this time is not prompted entirely by what has happened in recent years, but goes back to chamber thinking long before the Wagner Act.

The chamber had a policy even before the 1920's which declared that "the right of workers to organize is as clearly recognized as that of any other element or part of the community."

Accordingly, our policy today endorsing "the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively whenever such action is the result of their own free and uncoerced choice," is the development of a principle which the chamber has supported for many years.

Our concern in making representations before the Congress is that we shall have a labor-management law which will in fact make possible the very best kind of collective bargaining. We believe that industrial peace can best be achieved by placing principal reliance on procedures to which the parties have voluntarily subscribed. We believe that Government-imposed regulations and decisions do not promote industrial peace and understanding as effectively as agreements freely arrived at by the parties on their own responsibility by the conference method.

Accordingly, it is our position that legislation should impose that minimum of control which will encourage voluntary, rather than Government-imposed settlement of labor disputes.

At the same time, we believe it should impose equality of obligation on both parties and should give paramount consideration to the public interest. We believe legislation should be written for the good of all parties—the general public, employers, and employees.

SUMMARY OF VIEWS

Let me summarize briefly the views I wish to express in my testimony:

1. We believe that the basis for a sound national labor policy is a law directed at the encouragement of free, voluntary, collective bargaining.

2. We believe that any such law should also contain adequate provision for machinery to settle labor disputes when bargaining breaks down. Particularly should there be effective procedures for the settlement of national emergency strikes.

3. We believe that Congress should take effective steps to outlaw monopolistic practices, whether by unions or employers or both in combination.

4. We believe that the law should require both unions and employers to bargain collectively in good faith, provided the union is the representative of a majority of the employees. We believe that the law should define the scope of this obligation to bargain so that the parties will be assured of certainty in their relationships.

5. We believe that unions should be subject to unfair labor practice charges for various well-known causes, such as forcing an employer to discriminate, or to violate the law, for secondary boycotts, for jurisdictional strikes, for forcing an employer to choose a bargaining representative, and for restraint and coercion of employees in their rights under the act.

6. We believe that Congress should encourage union attainment of responsibility.

7. We believe in the principles of free speech for both employers and unions, short of coercion, threats of reprisal, or promises of benefit.

8. We endorse the principle of a strong, independent Conciliation Service, with a definite statutory direction.

9. We believe that the foremen and supervisors are members of management and should be recognized and accepted as such.

10. We believe that the procedural reforms made in NLRB, such as separation of the prosecution and judicial functions of the Board, should be retained.

11. We believe that compulsory unionism should be prohibited.

12. We deplore the attempt to usurp State powers by the provision which destroys State laws regulating compulsory unionism.

PUBLIC INTEREST

Naturally, the public interest should receive paramount consideration in any legislation. We believe the best welfare of all employers should also be considered, both those who do and those who do not have unions. Similarly we believe the welfare of all employees should be considered, both those who do and those who do not belong to labor organizations.

We first should like to speak about those things which are of primary concern to the general public.

Our basic position is that the principles of the present law should be retained. We see no reason for tossing them into the discard and returning to a statute passed 14 years ago designed to correct certain alleged conditions of that period. The Wagner Act, standing alone, would clearly be inadequate today. It nourished the weak and struggling labor movement of 1935 into the powerful movement of 1949, with 16½ million members. There is no little irony in the current drive to protect that brawny giant from employers who are wondering how equal their bargaining powers are when stacked up against the powerful labor leaders of today. For every large employer able to take care of himself against the weight of million-member unions, there are thousands of small ones who are not.

Law should not be written for the benefits of special groups, to give them a position over and above that granted other citizens. Law, regardless of what subject it touches, should seek to promote the public interest. If it does that, it will in the long run protect the general interest of the people whom it affects.

Now you simply cannot say that a return to the Wagner Act, under the vastly changed conditions of 1949, would do that. Nor are the proposals before you in H. R. 2032 to modify the Wagner Act any better.

They merely mention certain problems which have shown themselves necessary of correction, without providing any effective remedies. They do not, in short, come to grips with the matter at all.

NATIONAL EMERGENCY STRIKES

Take the question of national emergency strikes. It has been recognized that there must be procedures laid down for dealing with them. H. R. 2032 recognizes this necessity.

But instead of courageously tackling the problem, the bill would permit the President to proclaim a national emergency when a strike threatens to occur in a "vital industry which affects the public interest." He may call on the parties not to strike, may appoint a board to find the facts and then report its recommendations. The parties are to preserve the status quo for 30 days.

And that's all.

How is the President to enforce this 30-day cooling-off period? According to Secretary Tobin, only by calling on the force of public opinion. According to Atttroney General Clark, by the use of the President's inherent powers. But the President has used neither of these methods exclusively in his previous efforts to settle such disputes. He usually has used either an injunction or plant seizures backed up by an injunction. In one situation, he actually asked Congress for authority to draft strikers.

It seems, therefore, that the argument over the possession of inherent powers is academic, to say the least. If the President does have such powers as are claimed for him, then they ought to be made clear and specific in law. The weapons at his command should be spelled out so that everyone will know what can and cannot be done. If he has no inherent power, then he ought to be given some, the nature of which is clearly and specifically spelled out in law, so that he can protect the public in such situations.

Public opinion alone has not stopped strikes in the past and it alone will not likely stop them in the future.

The existing provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act are far superior in regard to this situation to the proposals in H. R. 2032. Present law, moreover, now leaves it to the discretion of the President as to whether he will invoke the injunction remedy provided in it. Thus, if, in any situation, it appears that the force of public opinion would be enough to obtain settlement of a labor dispute, the President may call upon it. If it appears that the use of Government power is necessary, he may use the injunction. He will not, as H. R. 2032 proposes, be left defenseless in situations where the force of public opinion is not enough.

However, the injunctive procedure should not be limited to a fixed period.

Use of an injunction, moreover, should make seizure proceedings unnecessary, since seizure itself is, under the doctrine of the Lewis case,[1] enforceable by injunction. We also think that there is no necessity for calling a board of inquiry to find the facts until after the injunction is granted.

But one thing is certain. There must be effective procedures for dealing with Nation-wide strikes. The arguments against the use of the injunction apply primarily to its indiscriminate use by private parties to crush legitimate union activities. They certainly do not apply to use of the injunction by the Government to stave off a national disaster. To discard such a procedure merely because of traditional opposition to it based on the practices of the 1920's bespeaks too much adherence to the theories of a bygone era.

COMPULSORY UNIONISM

Compulsory unionism is one of the most vital questions that confronts Congress. It is one on which we have positive views, based on the long observation and experience of our members with this device.

Ordinarily, I would discuss this matter of the closed and union shop under monopolistic practices. To say that a man must join the union in order to get or retain a job is but another way of saying that the control of job opportunities has been handed over exclusively to a union.

When anyone gets exclusive control of anything, that is monopoly, whether it is price fixing, restriction of supply, compulsory unionism, or union security. It is wrong in principle, it is harmful in practice, and it has certainly been contrary to the spirit of our laws to foster monopoly of any kind for almost 60 years.

The closed shop harms both the employer and the individual worker. It harms the employer by denying him, at times, access to qualified workers, or by forcing him to discharge them at the union's whim. It forces the employer to discriminate against employees on the basis of union membership, and not on their qualification for the job. It retards efficient production by fostering feather-bedding practices, jurisdictional strikes, and other labor abuses.

It is most harmful of all to the individual worker. It places his job at the mercy of the union. If he does not happen to sympathize with the union, or a particular union activity, he cannot dissent without fear of being deprived of his livelihood. It enhances the possibility of a dictatorship of the few. It encourages intraunion politics, it subjects the worker to arbitrary and capricious activities of union leaders, and it cuts off his job if he objects.

If a union is worth joining, it should be entirely possible to recruit members on the basis of the union's merit. But if the union cannot persuade a worker to maintain membership on that basis, it should not be permitted to force him to join by means of its control over the job. The mere fact of a closed shop indicates that a union feels its merits are too few or too weak to attract members.

We believe, therefore, that Congress should continue the prohibition on the closed shop, and, in fact, on all other forms of compulsory unionism.

It should be unfair-labor practice for either employers or unions to discriminate in regard to hire or tenure of employment because of union membership or activity, or lack of it. The alternative to such provisions can only be regulation of internal affairs of unions to prevent abuses of the closed union. We believe that the right to work should not be dependent on union membership. H. R. 2032 is quite inadequate to protect that right.

We believe that Federal law should continue the L. M. R. A. provision which gives full recognition to the desire of the States to enact such legislation. The fact that 16 States see fit to enact anticlosed shop laws indicates the widespread demand from the people for such legislation.

Policies of the Chamber of Commerce of the United States advocate maximum freedom for the States to enact the labor laws they deem advisable in their legislative discretion. This principle has proven its value from long experience, and we commend it to your attention.

MONOPOLISTIC PRACTICES

The public has a vital interest in the prevention of monopolistic and other improper practices.

It has long been recognized under our American system that monopolistic and unfair-trade practices by employers should be banned by law. The Chamber of Commerce of the United States supports this principle. We believe, furthermore, that if we are going to have the best kind of employer-employee relations, regulations in restraint of monopolistic and other unfair practices should be applied to labor organizations, which today have in fact grown into enormous business enterprises. Among such practices which we would ban are:

1. Misuse of economic power.—Industry-wide bargaining which assumes such proportions that either employers or labor organizations can exercise monopolistic powers.

2. Payments to labor organizations.—Payments either by employers or employees to labor organizations, or their representatives, should be subject to legal restrictions in order to prohibit racketeering, extortion, or monopolistic practices, and to insure that, where such payments are made for benefit or welfare funds, they are used exclusively for such purposes.

3. Interference with use or installation of materials.—Refusal to handle, work on, or install products solely because they were made or handled in the first instance by unorganized workers or by members of another labor organization.

4. Secondary boycotts.—Secondary boycotts practiced against employers with respect to whom no grievances exist.

5. Featherbedding practices.—The use of economic power to require an employer to carry on the pay roll more workers than are needed and other featherbedding practices.

We believe these principles are sound. They have been tested by experience. We are greatly disappointed that they are recognized in H. R. 2032 to so limited an extent.

SECONDARY BOYCOTTS

The only recognition your pending bill gives to any of these principles is that section directed to secondary boycotts. We are glad the committee recognizes this problem. However, if the real evils of secondary boycotts are to be eliminated, the bill will have to be broadened. As it presently stands, the bill outlaws only those boycotts which are aimed at forcing an employer to disregard a National Labor Relations Board certification or an NLRB order to bargain, or to upset an existing contract with a union. But this practice is used in many other situations as well.

Secondary boycotts are often used to spread the power of the unions even into plants where a majority of the employees do not want union representation. That use of the boycott is the antithesis of industrial democracy. It is an indefensible use of one type of monopolistic power. We urge, therefore, that the treatment of the subject in H. R. 2032 be enlarged so as to prohibit this type of unjustifiable conduct.

We are concerned, moreover, about the length of time that will be required under the present bill to get action with respect to boycott practices. According to statistics the length of time it takes the NLRB to process an unfair labor practice case is 8 to 10 months. If the case goes to court that is going to take several additional months. Meanwhile, the boycott has done its harmful work. Employers who engage in monopolistic practices are, of course, subject to restraint by injunction. We believe that the few unions who engage in the pernicious practice of using boycotts should similarly be restrained by injunction so that irreparable harm will not be done while the matter is being processed by the Board and the courts.

The boycott is the easy way of organizing a nonunion plant, of upsetting NLRB certifications, and of raiding rival unions. It seeks to force workers into a union, often when they do not wish to join, by destroying their jobs on which they depend. We think it only fair that unions should be made to persuade employees to join the union by direct methods, and not by injuring innocent third parties and by the destruction of job opportunities.

H. R. 2032 has not covered one of the worst aspects of monopolistic secondary boycotts. In many instances, unions which have gained control of certain job opportunities of an entire area deny the entry into that area of any competing products or services, regardless of whether they are produced by union labor.

In some instances, the union forces the employer to assist it. The result is a tight, area-wide monopoly of certain products with exactly the same effect on the consumer as though the employers alone had banded together to do the job. Such a situation ought to be forbidden by the antitrust laws, yet the mere fact that a union is the instigator is enough to exempt it from the operation of such laws, unless the employers actually combine with the union to do the job. The courts, therefore, have sharply limited the Department of Justice in its efforts to unseat such monopolies for that reason alone.

But, since the object of the boycott in such a situation is not one of those proscribed by the proposed law, there would be no remedy for such an abuse. H. R. 2032 should certainly be expanded to cover that case.

INDUSTRY-WIDE BARGAINING

Industry-wide bargaining which assumes such proportions that either employers or unions can exercise monopolistic powers is another matter which Congress should consider further. Industry-wide emergency strikes are only one aspect of this situation. Monopolistic control of the labor supply, of labor costs, and of prices is equally harmful to the public.

We do not condemn all bargaining of this character. In certain instances, it has come about in order to protect a group of small employers from a big union. In others, the situation in an industry may be such that multiemployer bargaining is the only feasible way of effectuating the best employer-employee relations. But in others, the use of such bargaining has resulted in monopolistic powers at public expense. This type of situation should not be condoned.

Present law forbids a union to coerce an employer in the choice of his bargaining representative. Retention of this section would be of considerable assistance in preventing the spread of monopolistic industry-wide bargaining. It is in line with long-standing NLRB policy to refuse to set up a multiemployer unit for bargaining purposes unless the employer had actually authorized bargaining in that fashion.

It would not even appear necessary for Congress to legislate on such matters were it not for two Supreme Court decisions which have virtually exempted unions from the laws applicable to everyone else in this regard.[2] Surely no one can claim that racketeering, extortion, and monopoly are legitimate union activities. Surely it isn't necessary to point out that unions alone should not be permitted to commit what for everyone else would be a crime.

Provisions of present law relating to union financial reports and to individual authorization of the check-off are designed to provide such safeguards. Unions who are collecting check-offs honestly and legitimately, for legitimate purposes, have not found it difficult at all to secure the necessary authorizations. But this section has made it difficult for that small minority of unions to extort payments for illegal purposes from employers and employees.

As to welfare funds: We do not wish to prohibit their establishment. But we do feel that, if they are as important to employees as has been suggested, and since employers contribute much of the money for them, safeguards to prevent their diversion into other channels should be provided in the law. Present law appears adequate for this purpose.

THE REQUIREMENT TO BARGAIN

The cornerstone of both the Wagner Act and the L. M. R. A. is the policy laid down by each to encourage the development of free collective bargaining as the primary method of settling labor disputes.

The Wagner Act sought to remove obstacles placed in the path of this policy by employers. The L. M. R. A. while retaining these Wagner Act curbs, sought to remove further obstacles placed in the path of collective bargaining by unions as well as employers.

Under H. R. 2032, the only means of implementing this policy of furthering collective bargaining is the provision which requires employers to bargain in good faith. But this is not adequate.

The bill contains no requirement that a union bargain in good faith, no definition of what constitutes good faith bargaining for purposes of the act, and no specifications as to how far the Government would go in requiring employers to bargain. It does not define the scope that will be given to this requirement or what specific subjects will be encompassed.

Any statute should provide adequate guidance to the agency which administers it, and merely to reenact the Wagner Act provision mentioned above simply will not do the job. It would leave so many questions open as to encourage confusion rather than clarity in our labor policy.

If Government intrudes at all into the bargaining process, it should do so only to bring collective bargaining to its fullest and most mature development. We do not think that has been done in H. R. 2032. All that is done is to require employers to bargain. Bargain over what? Bargain how? And with whom? These questions have not been answered in the bill. Unless the law is specific, the matter will be left to the NLRB. But why turn the function of Congress over to an administrative agency. If collective bargaining is desirable, why not spell out what that means? Why not require mutuality of bargaining by imposing responsibility on the unions who engage in that process? It cannot be assumed in the face of the record of recent years that unions will automatically embrace the responsibility that goes with their tremendously increased power.

We recommend, therefore, that, in order to give fullest effect to the stated national policy of encouraging free collective bargaining, the law must contain a requirement that unions bargain in good faith. Likewise the law should say how far it is willing to go in enforcing that requirement, and what, for its purposes, collective bargaining means. Otherwise we have a statute which imposes compulsory collective bargaining, the meaning and scope of which is totally obscure, and which impinges on only one side of the bargaining process.

The conclusion is inescapable that either both sides should be left free to do as they wish, or the law should set up a clear, specific, enforceable statutory requirement that will establish adequate standards for the administrative agency to follow.

Such a course is not at all antiunion. It is only common sense to let both employers and unions know in advance what the law will require of them and not force them to guess at what they must do.

UNION UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Congress has seen fit to enact statutory provisions setting forth certain employer unfair labor practices which impede union organizational efforts and collective bargaining functions. These restrictions were spelled out in the Wagner Act, continued in the L. M. R. A., and undoubtedly will be in any new labor law that is written. They are recognized features of our national labor policy.

The administration proposals, the statements of many union spokesmen, and others, do not, in principle, argue against the listing of union unfair labor practices as such. Thus in the provisions of H. R. 2032, which have received general labor acquiescence, there are three union unfair labor practices—use of the secondary boycott for certain purposes, failure to abide by an NLRB jurisdictional dispute award, failure to give 30-day notice of contract termination.

I think, therefore, that we can say that the principle of subjecting unions to charge for practices deemed to be unfair is objectionable to no one. The real question comes on the actual content of the charges to what unfair labor practices should unions be subjected. What are those union abuses which need correction through this medium?

The L. M. R. A., as you know, lists six: coercion and restraint of employees in the exercise of their rights under the act; forcing an employer to discriminate against an employee; refusal to bargain; strikes and boycotts for certain purposes (i. e., to force an employer to cease doing business with another, foster a jurisdictional dispute, upset an NLRB certification); charging excessive or discriminatory initiation fees; and feather-bedding demands of a limited character. We are unable to perceive why most of these cannot be retained in the law which is being framed.

UNION RESTRAINT AND COERCION

The union restraint and coercion forbidden under NLRB decision, encompasses violence, threats of violence, use of force, mass picketing or other intimidation against employees in the exercise of their guaranteed rights under the law. Unions do practice such abuses, and the records of congressional hearings are replete with instances of this character.

Those employees who want to join a union need not be inflicted with restraint and coercion to do so; those who don't, should be protected against anything but persuasion. If the union cannot persuade such employees to accept its views, it shouldn't be allowed to force them to agree. Use of force and coercion is not an inherent union right; it does abuse collective bargaining; and it violates the rights of individual employees.

Since this section, as interpreted by NLRB and the courts, does not affect legitimate union rights—a strike, for example, is not the restraint and coercion contemplated by the act—there is every reason for retaining it in the law as a protection to the individual employee, if he needs it, and to the public which should not be subjected either to union or employer use of restraint and coercion.

UNION DISCRIMINATION

The case for retaining the unfair labor practice of causing the employer to discriminate against an employee in violation of the act rests on equally sound grounds. It simply means that a union cannot require an employer to discharge an employee on the ground that he is or is not a union member, except under a valid union-shop contract, and then only if the employee fails to pay his dues and fees.

The NLRB, under the old Wagner Act, regularly recognized the impropriety of a union requiring an employer to discharge an employee for rival-union activity under a closed-shop contract. The courts have generally recognized the right of employees not to be expelled from the union, or from their job at union behest for arbitrary or discriminatory reasons. Union discrimination against certain types of employees has but recently been recognized by the NLRB as ground for withdrawing NLRB certification of a union.

With this backlog of NLRB and court rulings against union discrimination, it would seem that there could be no objection to requiring a union not to discriminate against an employee or prospective employee. If practices of this character have been recognized as wrong even under the Wagner Act, there would seem to be ample justification for Congress to eliminate union discrimination against employees.

I have already discussed refusal to bargain, and secondary boycotts. The Administration bill itself recognizes the desirability of forbidding a union to strike or boycott to upset another union's certification.

The question of jurisdictional disputes also has been recognized by the Administration bill as warranting legislative attention. We agree with the principle of such a provision but question whether, as drafted, it will be as effective in stopping jurisdictional strikes as present law. H. R. 2032 would make it a union unfair labor practice only to violate an NLRB award.

Congress should do more. It should make any jurisdictional strike an unfair labor practice and permit NLRB to enjoin it temporarily, pending NLRB decision. If the law is to deal at all with this matter, it should do so effectively, so as to stop such totally unjustifiable strikes. There should be no loopholes in its procedures which may well tend to negate their value.

The record of L. M. R. A. in stopping jurisdictional strikes is exemplary. The action of labor and management in the construction industry in setting up a joint board to settle such disputes under the aegis of that act was something that had never been achieved in 50 years of futile union effort. With such a record of achievement, it would be surprising if Congress changed the rule merely because it is in the Taft-Hartley Act.

The present unfair labor practice charge outlawing a limited type of featherbedding is inadequate. It covers only services not performed or not to be performed. It does not cover situations where the employer is forced to pay for only slight services a wage far beyond their actual value.

This whole problem is bound up with the closed shop. By and large, it is those unions which have strong closed-shop contracts, or equivalent arrangements, that are able to enforce featherbedding demands. Retain the prohibition on the closed shop, therefore, and much of this featherbedding problem may well be solved.

UNION RESPONSIBILITY

The whole question of union unfair labor practices is but one aspect of the question of union responsibility. We think that the unions also should be responsible to their members and to employers as well. They cannot, in fact, be otherwise and continue to demand an appropriate place in our national economy.

Now, most unions have achieved such responsibility. Legislation designed to assist the rest of them attain such maturity surely would benefit this majority by protecting them from the "unfair competition" of those unions that do not wish to assume responsibility commensurate with their power.

By admitting that unions can commit unfair labor practices, the pending bill implies that certain union responsibility can be attained only through the help of legislation. But, here again, it is necessary to do the job effectively and not half-heartedly.

An essential part of assisting unions to attain a desired maturity is to insure that they will be judicially answerable for those wrongs for which every other person or institution in the country is liable. They should be permitted to sue, or be subject to suit for breach of contract, for damage to the person and property of others and for those other wrongs which, if committed by an individual, would bring him into court. The unions complain that this would harass and bankrupt them. They can, of course, avoid this by refraining from committing wrongs that are cognizable in court actions. But to permit them to escape liability in such situations because of defects in the law cannot be justified.

The law should continue to have provisions similar to those of the present statute which prescribe uniform rules for suits by and against unions. The law should continue present provisions which protect individual union members' assets against liability for any judgment against the union. Repeal of the provisions of present law would remove this statutory protection.

FREE SPEECH

The effect of H. R. 2032 would be to repeal the present provisions of the law relating to free speech. We think this one of the most unfortunate provisions in the bill.

The Constitution of the United States has always embodied protection for free speech which does not present a "clear and present" danger to the community. Until the passage of the Wagner Act, freedom of speech on any subject was considered too precious a right lightly to discard.

Acting, perhaps, in an excess of zeal, early NLRB rulings under the Wagner Act placed a virtually complete gag on the employer when speaking of matters pertaining to unions. He was to maintain strict neutrality; he was not to speak out either for or against the union. The Supreme Court eventually modified that rule to state that an employer may express his views on labor policies or problems. It said, however, that speech could amount to coercion, viewed "in connection with other circumstances."

The loophole left open by this decision was quickly seized on by the old NLRB to impose virtually the same rule as before. All they had to do was find some evidence of employer coercion, "set the speech in that context" and forbid the speech as before. In many cases, on slight pretext, this was done.

This abuse of a constitutional freedom was what led to present law which forbids NLRB to enjoin free speech if it does not contain threats of reprisal or promises of benefit. The purpose was to protect free speech which was innocent in itself and which committed no "verbal act" of threat or bribery. The genesis for this provision may be found in opinions of various Supreme Court Justices in Thomas v. Collins (323 U. S. 60 (1945)). Justice Jackson said, in concurring:

"Free speech on both sides and for every faction on any side of the labor relation is to me a constitutional and useful right. * * * If the employer's speech is associated with discriminatory discharge or intimidation, the constitutional remedy would be to stop the evil, but permit the speech, if the two are inseparable."

Justice Rutledge said, in rendering the majority opinion:

"Decision here has recognized that employers' attempts to persuade to action with respect to joining or not joining unions are within the first amendment's guaranty."

Safeguards to assure free speech should be written into law to insure no repetition of the previous situation.

This is particularly true when Congress is, at the same time, seeking to remove all Federal bans on union picketing, which has been judicially likened to free speech. Present law permits peaceful picketing for legitimate objectives on the part of unions as a matter of free speech and outlaws violence or coercive picketing. Present law also permits employer free speech which does not go beyond the mere expression of views, opinion or argument and descend into coercion or bribery. The balance achieved thereby is a just one and one that Congress ought not to disturb in the interest of fairness to all.

SETTLEMENT OF DISPUTES: THE CONCILIATION SERVICE

The original Wagner Act was directed at a very limited objective; the prevention of alleged employer obstacles to union organization of employees. It provided machinery for the settlement only of disputes over whether employers should recognize unions. At the same time, it announced, as has been often said, a broad policy of encouragement to collective bargaining as the best method of conducting employer-employee relationships.

The Wagner Act was found to be too limited a vehicle for the full expression of such a national labor policy, so it was amended and modernized to meet changed conditions of labor-management relationships.

The L. M. R. A. went one step further in its attempt to foster good employer-employee relations. It sought to provide an answer to the question: What happens when collective bargaining breaks down?

It set up procedures for the protection of the public in national emergency disputes. And it provided for the first time a statutory basis for a Federal conciliation agency, independent of any partisan agency of government, for the resolution of disputes with the aid of conciliation and mediation. Its independence was intended to, and has, ensured that its impartiality would be unquestioned.

The record of its first year of operation shows clearly how much greater has been the public confidence in this agency than when it operated as an arm of the Department of Labor. We urge that you retain this independence.

The Labor Department is an agency created by law to promote the welfare of the wage-earner. Rightly or wrongly, in recent years, the Department has interpreted that to mean the organized wage-earner. We do not make an issue of that policy as such at this point. But we do oppose the return of an agency, designed to help resolve conflicts between the wage-earner and his employer, to a Department whose representatives have time and again gone on record as partisan to the former.

The Conciliation Service is not a labor agency It is a labor-management agency. It must have the confidence of both sides. It will almost certainly lose the confidence of many employers if it is returned to the Labor Department as proposed.

We urge that Congress continue the independence of the Conciliation Service in the interests of promoting the national labor policy of encouraging free, voluntary collective bargaining.

SUPERVISORS

H. R. 2032 contains no provision which would exempt supervisors from the law. This is a serious defect which ought to be remedied.

To give governmental encouragement to organization of supervisors is to encourage union encroachment on management. This is not equality before the law since mangement is forbidden to interfere with or to encroach upon unions in any way.

Supervisors—foremen—are members of management and should be recognized and accepted as such. This recognition should be and is being granted by employers all over the country.

We urge, in the interests of fairness, that Congress continue the exemption of supervisors from the term "employees" who are covered by this law.

PROSECUTION AND JUDICIAL FUNCTIONS

The L. M. R. A. made many desirable procedural reforms in the Wagner Act. These changes were based on long experience with and operation under that law, and we think that the net effect has been greatly to strengthen public confidence in the operation of the NLRB.

We do not wish to dwell on such matters as the 1-year election rule; the preponderance of evidence rule; abolition of the review section; expansion of NLRB to five members; and other desirable changes in Board procedure. Their value has been amply demonstrated.

However, we do wish to discuss the separation of the prosecution and judicial functions of NLRB. Opposition to this separation of functions does not look realistically, we fear, at the nature of NLRB functioning.

The National Labor Relations Board is an administrative agency with powers of deciding cases that are judicial in character. When charges are brought before the Board, there must be a complaint issued, preliminary investigation and/or attempted adjustment, a hearing in the nature of a trial, a decision by the trial examiner, and an appeal to the full Board for final adjudication by any aggrieved party. The processes are akin to those of police, prosecutor, jury, judge, and appeals court.

Under the Wagner Act, all these functions were under the control of the three-man NLRB itself. It combined all these functions into one, at variance wtih our system of court justice. Many people felt that such an agency could not possibly render an impartial decision, and the records of the old NLRB proved their contentions.

The present separation of powers has promoted public confidence in the NLRB, since it now in fact functions in a judicial capacity. An agency possessing its powers should not be permitted to sit on both sides of the argument. Under the L. M. R. A. it has not, and the experience under this operation has been highly beneficial. The separation of powers has been effected with a minimum of friction. We recommend that Congress continue the separation of NLRB's prosecution and judicial functions in the public interest.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO COORDINATING STATE LAWS

H. R. 2032 omits any provision which would expressly authorize the National Labor Relations Board to conclude jurisdiction agreements with State labor relations boards. Such agreements would do much to encourage a sound relationship between the Federal Government and the State governments in the field of labor relations. A highly important effect of such a provision would be to encourage the State to enact labor laws at the State level which would coordinate and implement the Federal labor policy. The failure to enact a provision to carry out this objective effectively would mean a return to the familiar Federal policy of overriding State labor laws through constantly broadening the exercise of the interstate commerce power and the consequent preempting of fields in which many States now have sound and useful labor laws.

This objective was actually contemplated in section 10 (a) of the L. M. R. A., which authorized jurisdiction agreements with State boards, ceding to them control within the State over certain types of labor disputes, even though these were in the area of interstate commerce.

Careful consideration should be given to the practical benefits which would derive from such a provision. In addition to a strong encouragement to State governments to adopt and administer labor laws consistent with the Federal labor law, there would result (1) the handling of local disputes by local authorities and (2) a substantial lessening of the case load now borne by the National Labor Relations Board.

The language of such a provision should make clear that the Board has authority to cede jurisdiction to each State board which enforces a State labor relations act with the following basic elements: It should guarantee to workers the right to organize and to bargain collectively and it should specify unfair labor practices for both employers and unions similar in general purpose and scope to those enumerated in the Federal law. If the NLRB is not required to observe too restrictive a measure of consistency between the Federal and State laws, and if it actually uses its powers either to cede or withdraw jurisdiction, there should result a strong incentive to the establishment of coordinating laws and Government agencies at the State level.

Let me conclude by saying that we believe H. R. 2032 fails to meet the test of any good labor law—fairness to both sides and equality of obligation and treatment under the law. The bill seeks to restrict employers in the conduct of their employee relations in every way devised by the Wagner Act, while leaving unions largely free to perpetrate many abusive practices that should be regulated. We urge that Congress retain in the law those many provisions that have proven of substantial public benefit; that Congress modify it only as the necessity for change in the public interest has been clearly demonstrated.

Mr. KELLEY. Is Mr. Jeffrey here?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman, at this point I would like to ask the unanimous consent of the committee to insert in the record the correspondence between myself and Charles E. Wilson, president of General Electric Co., including his letter of January 21 to me and my first reply on January 26, stating that I would like to have him as a witness; my letter of February 9, answering the questions in the widely publicized GE questionnaire; his reply of February 26, in which he did not answer the questions that I propounded; and my reply of February 28 to that letter.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, it is so ordered.

(The correspondence above referred to will be found in the appendix following the close of testimony in today's hearing. See p. 211.)

Mr. KELLEY. Gentlemen, you may proceed and tell who you are. Who is Mr. Wilson?

Mr. WILSON. Right here.

Mr. KELLEY. I am glad to see you. You are from my district.

Mr. WILSON. That is right, sir.

Mr. JEFFREY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

TESTIMONY OF HARRY P. JEFFREY, SECRETARY AND GENERAL COUNSEL, FOREMEN'S LEAGUE FOR EDUCATION AND ASSOCIATION, DAYTON, OHIO, ACCOMPANIED BY GEORGE DRIESKE, DEPARTMENT SUPERVISOR, MURRAY CORP. OF AMERICA, DETROIT, MICH., AND ALEXANDER H. WILSON, FOREMAN, ROBERTSHAW THERMOSTAT CO., YOUNGWOOD, PA.

Mr. JEFFREY. Mr. Chairman, my name is Harry P. Jeffrey. I am a lawyer practicing in the city of Dayton, Ohio, and am secretary and general counsel of the Foremen's League for Education and Association. The league is a nonprofit corporation organized for the purpose of promoting educational work among foremen and supervisors.

Its office is in Dayton, Ohio, and its work is financed by more than 250 industrial concerns, both large and small, located throughout the country. The league advocates retention of the sections relating to foremen and supervisors contained in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. We believe this a realistic and common-sense approach to a problem that vitally concerns both labor and management.

Both the original Wagner Act and its amendment by the Taft-Hartley Act recognized labor as an entity and management as an entity. There has to be a practical dividing line. In this sense, therefore, where does labor and management begin? We believe that both history and common sense reveal that management begins with the foremen.

Throughout the life of American industry, the foreman has been a part of management and the direct representative of management at its initial point of contact with the rank and file, or production, workers. This has been the traditional position of the foreman; it is his position today. He is the first link in the management chain, and this is true whether he is employed in a small or a great mass-production enterprise.

In the Packard Motor Car Co. case, Mr. Justice Douglas in his dissenting opinion states:

> It [the Wagner Act] put in the employer category all those who acted for management not only in formulating but also in executing its labor policies. Foremost among the latter were foremen. Trade-union history shows that foremen were the arms and legs of management in executing labor policies.

The Foremen's League believes that foremen themselves are the best witnesses as to their own status. For many years, foremen have associated themselves together for self-help through education and association, while opposing the principle of collective bargaining.

There are two national associations, or organizations, of foremen and supervisors in the country, with memberships of approximately 75,000, and literally scores of scattered clubs made up of foremen not identified with any national group which operates on this principle today.

While we are aware that opinion polls are not in the best standing, I believe we all realize that intelligently conducted research can be both informative and helpful. In 1948 the highly respected Opinion Research Corp., of New Jersey, conducted the latest of a series of national polls among foremen, and found that only 13 percent of those contacted either belonged to or were interested in joining a union. In other words, 87 percent of all supervisors were not interested in organizing for collective-bargaining purposes, but preferred for their own selfish interests to remain a part of management and to deal individually with higher levels of management.

Since we believe foremen are the best witnesses as to their own status, the league has brought to Washington at its expense two foremen to tell their story in their own way, from first-hand, day-by-day experience. These foremen represent different types of industry in different parts of the country. I shall only take time to summarize the reasons why we believe employers should not be required to bargain collectively with supervisors, a complete statement having already been filed with this committee.

We believe the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, that is, the Taft-Hartley Act relating to supervisors should be retained and made a part of any amendment to the National Labor Relations Act for the following reasons:

First. The foreman is a part of management and is the initial point of management contact with the rank and file worker.

Second. As a part of management, the foreman must be responsible only to higher levels of management.

Third. When organized for collective-bargaining purposes, the foreman must follow his union officers rather than company officers, particularly in a closed shop.

Fourth. A foreman's union is a dependent one, dependent upon the cooperation and support of the workers' union for effective collective bargaining, and the unionized foreman therefore cannot properly direct the men working under him.

Fifth. The foreman, as a part of management, advances on merit rather than seniority, and the organized foreman is denied this right.

Sixth. In a shop employing unionized foremen, an extra layer of supervision must be added to represent management with the workers, thereby decreasing the foreman's value and increasing the cost of production of the company's product.

Seventh. When the National Labor Relations Board recognized foremen's unions, strikes were rampant, tying up production workers as well as the foremen themselves. Since the effective date of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, only one strike of foremen is of record in the Nation.

Eighth. The effort to organize foremen for collective-bargaining purposes resulted from maladjustments incident to abnormal production for war. It is reliably estimated that today 87 percent of supervision in American industry neither belongs nor desires to belong to a union.

Again, as stated by Justice Douglas:

> If foremen are "employees" within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, so are vice presidents, managers, assistant managers, superintendents, assistant superintendents and, indeed, all who are on the pay roll of the company, including the president.

In the interest of peaceful industrial relations and a prosperous national economy, both of which will be so greatly influenced by legislation to be enacted by this Congress, we respectfully urge that this fundamental distinction between the worker and management be recognized and that management not be legally obligated to bargain collectively with a large segment of itself.

Gentlemen, I shall be happy to attempt to answer your questions, and I hope you may invite remarks from these two gentlemen who have accompanied me, both of whom are foremen.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you not believe that the foremen should have their own organization?

Mr. JEFFREY. I do not believe that any part of supervision should be organized for collective-bargaining purposes. When a man voluntarily leaves the production workers' ranks and steps up to management as a part of management, he cannot effectively serve if he is organized for collective-bargaining purposes. That has been the experience of this Nation for the past 5 years.

Mr. KELLEY. How are they going to protect their own interests?

Mr. JEFFREY. How shall——

Mr. KELLEY. How are they going to protect their own interests if they do not have some organization to look after them?

Mr. JEFFREY. Just exactly the same, Mr. Chairman, as all of the other elements of management do, by their individual initiative and by their individual approach to higher levels of management.

Mr. KELLEY. I do not see how without some organization to work for their betterment, they are going to obtain any better wages or better working conditions. Certainly the individual foreman cannot do it. If he goes to management and asks as an individual, he is handicapped to start with. They do not necessarily have to interfere with management to do that, I believe, to have an organization. I am after information now, of course.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir; and I shall do my best to try to reply, and supply whatever information I may be able to supply.

Prior to the enactment of the Wagner Act in 1935, for all practical purposes, there was no such thing as a union of foremen or supervisors, and foremen or supervisors, I think, by and large, as history shows, were pretty well able to take care of themselves. And as proof of that, I refer, Mr. Chairman, to the hearings before both Houses of Congress when the Wagner Act was enacted. That record is absolutely bare, both in committee and on the floors of both Houses, of any reference to foremen's difficulties obstructing the free growth of commerce, and when the Packard Motor Car case, which was determinative to the United States Supreme Court as to whether the original Wagner Act covered foremen and supervisors, reached the Court, both the majority opinion of Mr. Justice Roberts and the minority opinion of Mr. Justice Douglas refer to the fact—I think it is both; I am sure it is one, and I think it is in both—that obstruction of commerce through collective bargaining action on the part of foremen was unknown, and that there was no indication in the hearings in the Congress that foremen were either held back or that their progress was retarded or that they were not receiving the proper consideration. It was almost 7 years after the Wagner Act was in effect before any case came before the NLRB which even suggested that foremen were covered by the act.

So I think history shows that foremen were not handicapped by not being organized.

Now, from 1942 through 1945, there was a series of foremen's strikes, and I think, as again was commented upon in that opinion, those arose largely, and the effort to organize foremen arose largely, by reason of factors growing out of the war. The Wage-and-Hour Act did not permit higher levels of management to elevate the foremen's wages promptly as overtime incident to production for war, made the men's wages increase under him. The demand for a large number of additional foremen and supervisors, because of the expansion of plant, made it impossible for either proper selection of material or proper training.

Take those elements out of our national economy, as has been the case, roughly from 1946, and you have not had it. Again, I point out to you the experience of foremen as free bargaining agents. I shall not bore the committee with all of this, but I have a study here that has been made from time to time—since 1942 on through March of 1948—wherein foremen were interviewed, and the vast majority of foremen had responded to that, "We do not want a union; we do not need a union to advance our own individual efforts."

Mr. KELLEY. Do I understand you, then, to say that the law should prohibit the unionization of foremen?

Mr. JEFFREY. Just as emphatically, I say "No." The law should read——

Mr. KELLEY. You mean, leave it alone?

Mr. JEFFREY. Leave it as it is, because section 14 of the present law says:

> Nothing herein contained shall prevent a foreman from becoming or remaining—so his constitutional rights are protected.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jeffrey, you have already testified that the Foremen's League is a nonprofit corporation organized for the purpose of furthering educational work among the foremen and supervisors. Its work is financed by more than 250 industrial concerns, both large and small, located throughout the country.

Just what do you mean by that term "nonprofit"?

Mr. JEFFREY. Just the same as any other nonprofit corporation, Mr. Bailey. No profit can result from its operations to any member. If a corporation subscribes for membership in the league and there is any money left over, after its purposes have been accomplished, the money cannot go back. There is no profit accruing to any individual or any subscriber.

Mr. BAILEY. You also make this statement, that more than 250 industrial concerns are in it. How many more than 250?

Mr. JEFFREY. I would be glad to give you a definite figure, and the reason that I cannot is that the figure changes from day to day. That is, the X-Y-Z Corp. will subscribe $100 for membership for a year, and on March 8, that membership expires. So unless the corporation renews it, it is automatically out. The last count, as I remember it, was 266, I believe. But I am speaking from recollection. That is a varying figure.

Mr. BAILEY. Now, Mr. Jeffrey, is it true that your Foremen's League pays the sum of $1,000 a month plus $5,000 annual retainer to William Ingalls?

Mr. JEFFREY. It is not, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. It is not true?

Mr. JEFFREY. Mr. William Ingalls was retained as a lobbyist, or legislative representative, for the league last year, but he has not been retained by the league since December 31, 1948.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to say in that connection that Mr. Ingalls' lobbying registration statement filed last year showed that he received $1,000 a month from the league.

Mr. JEFFREY. I think that is in error. I am sorry. That is not my end of it. I am the attorney for the league, but as I remember it, Mr. Ingalls received either $500 or $600 a month. I could be wrong, but I am pretty sure that is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. Were you aware at the time he was serving your league that he was also a registered lobbyist for the Inland Steel Co., the Allis-Chalmers Co., the Fruehauf Trailer Co., the J. I. Case Co., and the Falk Corp.?

Mr. JEFFREY. I do not think I could answer. I do not know——

Mr. BAILEY. And the lobbying registration certificate showed that he received $1,700 a month from those corporations.

Mr. JEFFREY. I know nothing about the other representation: no. He represented the league as legislative representative or lobbyist, as I remember it, for about a year, and I believe his compensation was $500 a month. We do have a legislative representative in Washington today, but it is not Mr. Ingalls.

Mr. BAILEY. What services did Mr. Ingalls perform as your representative?

Mr. JEFFREY. He represented us as a lobbyist in the interests of legislation relating to foremen.

The Foremen's League takes no interest in any single question other that the compulsory recognition by management of foremen's unions. We have no part of and take no interest in any other type of legislation. Mr. Ingalls was employed to inform the officers of the league as to proposed legislation with respect to the unionization of foremen and to carry out such other duties down here as a lobbyist performs, I presume.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you know whether or not Mr. Ingalls appeared before the committees of the Senate and House last year in connection with the labor legislation?

Mr. JEFFREY. Last year?

Mr. BAILEY. 1948.

Mr. JEFFREY. I am sure he did not. I am sure that the league had witnesses, but I am certain that he did not testify.

Mr. BAILEY. Has your organization a constitution and bylaws?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. You do not have a copy of that accessible to the committee?

Mr. JEFFREY. I should be glad to provide it, if you desire.

Mr. BAILEY. I think it would be in order.

Mr. JEFFREY. A copy of the constitution——

Mr. BAILEY. And bylaws.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir; we would be very happy to provide it.

(The constitution and bylaws referred to were subsequently received and were filed for reference.)

Mr. BAILEY. And how many members do you have? I believe you testified you had 266.

Mr. JEFFREY. No; that is not correct. The league is supported by membership subscriptions of industries. Each industry which subscribes for membership is entitled to name a member on the basis of $100 per year per member. I cannot out of my head give you the membership, but it is something in the neighborhood of 500. It is more than 500. I am afraid to guess on the number.

Mr. BAILEY. What rights do these members have?

Mr. JEFFREY. The members of the league vote for trustees and the trustees in turn vote for the officers, as is true in any corporate structure.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Jeffrey, I would like to contradict, in a way, some of the testimony you have given, since I am familiar with the building trades. I know historically that the foremen of all the various trades, the 19 or 20 that are in the building trades, belong to their unions. That is historical, I believe. That has been true for years and years. There are many hundreds of thousands of mechanics, semiskilled workers and unskilled workers, working in the construction and building industries. I have heard no complaint that they did not want to be represented. I would feel more favorable to any testimony here if I was sure that this was an organization of the foremen themselves requesting that they do not want legislation enabling them to bargain with their employers or requiring their employers to bargain with them.

That is all. I just wanted to make that statement.

Mr. JEFFREY. May I comment on what Mr. Irving has stated?

Mr. IRVING. Certainly.

Mr. JEFFREY. I believe, Mr. Irving, there is no difference between what I have stated and what you have stated. It is certainly historically true that over a long period of time in some of the building-trade crafts, in the printing industry, and, I believe, some branches of the maritime industry, some levels of supervision have been affiliated as union members with the rank-and-file production workers. But I believe it is not true that either in any of those industries that have been named or any other industries over a long period of time there has been an organization of foremen or supervisors, by whatever name.

Yes; it is true that in those three branches of industry, some foremen have been affiliated with the production workers' unions, but not as an independent union of supervisors and foremen. I understand, for example, that in the carpenters' union a member may be assigned on a job that week as a workman with a hammer, and tools, and so forth, and 2 weeks later he may be functioning as the foreman on that job. I think that in large part explains the experience of that union.

Mr. IRVING. That is substantially true. However, if a man qualifies as a foreman, he usually follows that line of work pretty steadily.

I would like to qualify your remarks with my experience, that not only some but the majority of foremen in those trades are members of their respective unions.

That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Jeffrey, I would like to clear up one matter here that has rather got me puzzled. You say that you have industries as sustaining members. I suppose there are some 250 industries; is that correct?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And they pay $100. But as I understand it, for each $100 that each industry contributes, it can name one foreman in your organization. Did I understand you correctly?

Mr. JEFFREY. No; that is not true.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you explain that to me, please?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes; I will be happy to. The Foremen's League exercises no voice or control over whom the individual companies name. If the X-Y-Z Company gives $100 to the league for the year 1949 for a membership, it may name its president; it may name its vice president or its director of personnel. We make no claim, Mr. Congressman, that the Foremen's League has members who are not foremen. That is not true. The Foremen's League was organized to promote work among foremen. Now, there are organizations in this country such as the National Association of Foremen, which has a membership of some 14,000, the National Council of Industrial Management Clubs, which is affiliated with the YMCA——

Mr. JACOBS. That goes beyond what I am trying to find out. You have 35,000 members. Do each of those members pay dues?

Mr. JEFFREY. No. I am sorry; I have confused you.

The National Association of Foremen, which is a foremen's organization, has some 40,000 members. This organization of which I am speaking this morning has somewhere between 500 and 600 members. It has not numbers.

Mr. JACOBS. That clears it up.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, as I understand it, your view is that the foreman is an adjunct to management, and should not have the benefit of the National Labor Relations Board to protect him if he does organize and bargain collectively? Is that about your position?

Mr. JEFFREY. No, sir; that is not my position.

Mr. JACOBS. What is your position?

Mr. JEFFREY. A foreman is not an adjunct to management. A foreman is a part of management. In many respects, he is the most important part of management.

Mr. JACOBS. Regardless of the time, what I wanted to know is, is it your position that foremen should be forbidden to organize or that they should not have the benefits of being in collective bargaining?

Mr. JEFFREY. The latter.

Mr. JACOBS. The latter.

Mr. JEFFREY. I think that would be unconstitutional—the former.

Mr. JACOBS. That is what I understood it to be.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you know how many foremen there are in the General Electric Co., for example?

Mr. JEFFREY. Sir, I think in my office at home I may have some figures on that. I have some figures on various industries.

Mr. JACOBS. Can you give us any notion, from your memory, as to how many there are?

Mr. JEFFREY. I cannot as to that particular company.

Mr. JACOBS. How about General Motors?

Mr. JEFFREY. You can get all kinds of figures. The most recent figures made available to me were that there were perhaps 2,000,000 men and women, foremen and supervisors. Of course, that takes in the higher grade of supervision.

Mr. JACOBS. What would be the fewest number of foremen you would think would be in General Motors? That is what I want to know.

Mr. JEFFREY. Mr. Chairman, I would not have any intelligent answer on that. I simply do not know.

Mr. JACOBS. You are testifying as an expert in regard to the matter of foremen. Do you not have any notion at all? I am not going to hold you to it, but within a thousand?

Mr. JEFFREY. I am sorry; I am a very poor expert; but I simply would not know.

Mr. JACOBS. You would agree that General Motors would not have less than 4,000 or 5,000; would you?

Mr. JEFFREY. I would think that would be a very reasonable figure.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Let us take that as the place to start off.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think that the individual foreman is able to stand up and bargain with General Motors for his salary?

Mr. JEFFREY. Very definitely. Experience has proven that to be true, in fact.

Mr. JACOBS. I thought you mentioned a moment ago that the workers' wages even outstripped the foremen's during the war; is that not right, for a while?

Mr. JEFFREY. There were incidents during the war when the Wage and Hour Act did not permit companies to raise the wages of any employees without getting authority. And when they had to get that authority it sometimes slowed down.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, just a moment. My time is limited; so I want to cover the point.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS It is a fact that there were times when the workers' wages actually advanced beyond the foremen's wages; is it not?

Mr. JEFFREY. There were isolated instances of that during the war period.

Mr. JACOBS. All right.

Now, what I want to get at is this: Do you put it upon the ground that the foreman represents the employer and therefore he could not have his own union and remain loyal to the employer? Is that your position?

Mr. JEFFREY. That is only one. I think that is a very good reason, but that is only one of the reasons.

Mr. JACOBS And what are the other reasons?

Mr. JEFFREY. Well sir, I shall not trespass on your time. I have filed a written brief here in which I have tried to state those concisely in the conclusion on page 8. If you care to, I will read them.

Mr. JACOBS. I am referring particularly to the General Electric questionnaire, which I think you are familiar with. Are you familiar with the General Electric questionnaire?

Mr. JEFFREY. The General Electric questionnaire?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes; the questionnaire that General Electric has prepared and disseminated, for answering 18 questions. You are not familiar with that?

Mr. JEFFREY. I am not; no.

Mr. JACOBS. That was placed upon the ground that the foreman could not retain his loyalty to the company, and that is one of your grounds?

Mr. JEFFREY. I think that is very definitely true, and it has been shown in experience at that Ford plant and various other places.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I do not know. I am still trying to figure this out. You are a lawyer; are you not?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And I suppose that you and I have both had the experience of accepting a fee from a client and putting on our hat and coat and going over to court with him, and when we got there, we owe that client every bit of loyalty and all the powers of adequacy that we have: do we not?

Mr. JEFFREY. I have not felt the slightest that way in this case, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not mean that. We do, do we not, for our client, when we go to court? Do you agree with that?

Mr. JEFFREY. It all depends on the individual, of course.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I want to lead up to something else.

Mr. JEFFREY. Go right ahead.

Mr. JACOBS. After we get through with that, maybe we did not get our fee before we went to court. We come back to our office and we sit down behind our desk and the client takes the easy chair, and we put a fishy eye on him. You know what I mean; do you not? We are leading up to something.

Now, understand, we owe considerable loyalty to him. But when we start telling him what our fee is the relation of an attorney to client ceases to exist. It is an arm's-length proposition; is it not? Do you agree to that?

Mr. JEFFREY. It all depends on our relationships. If you are on a retainer fee with the man, that is something else.

Mr. JACOBS. No. I never got at that point in my practice. I just had to take them as they came. In fact, I always sort of liked it that way.

But when you start asking your client for a fee, it is not a question of his loyalty to you or your loyalty to him; it is a question of an arm's-length deal; is it not?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes. I expect in every case to be properly paid for the work that I do.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Then do you not think that is about the case with the foremen, where they have a lot of them, that they owe their loyalty to the employer, and the employer owes loyalty to them, but when it comes to fixing the employment contract, it is an arms-length deal; is it not?

Mr. JEFFREY. I fail to see any analogy between that and collective bargaining. Maybe you can point it out. I do not know.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, do you think that if 5,000 foremen work for General Motors, they should each make their individual bargain with General Motors? Is that correct?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes. But 5,000 foremen do not work in any one plant of General Motors, as I understand it.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, let us suppose there are 1,000 in one plant.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think that each one of those 1,000 should make his own individual bargain with General Motors?

Mr. JEFFREY. I do. And I think experience has demonstrated that he has selfishly promoted his own best interests in that fashion over a long period of time.

Mr. JACOBS. And that he has the economic power to make a fair bargain.

Mr. JEFFREY. Oh, definitely; that has been proven.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I would like to sketch for a moment the organizational structure of a typical factory.

Now, this is intrafactory; that is, not taking in the board of directors, of the company, or anything of that sort. It starts purely at the factory level, from the office door out. It is usually headed up by a shop superintendent; is that not correct?

Mr. JEFFREY. I think in many instances; yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. If the factory is a large one, and has a number of divisions—we will say it is an automobile factory, so that it has a forge division; it has a motor division; it has an axle division; it has a trim divison; a parts division, and so forth and so on, and each of those has a division superintendent?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. And each of those divisions has departments and those departments are usually headed up by a foreman.

Mr. JEFFREY. We have one such man at the table today; yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. And from that foreman, then, there are people with various duties, such as group leaders, set-up men——

Mr. JEFFREY. Lead men.

Mr. BURKE. They used to call them straw bosses in the old days.

Now, where in that organizational set-up of that typical factory would you suggest that the law become operative, prohibiting the organization for purposes of collective bargaining?

Mr. JEFFREY. I think that is a very important question, and I think it is one that this committee, and the committee, of course, on the other side of Congress must think about. I think, if I may suggest, the test is where the man begins to speak for management. I do not say that the definition of the Tart-Hartley Act is perfect, but in this respect I think it is good, where he does not exercise duties of a simply clerical nature, but exercises responsibility in the direction of the worker, where he speaks for management as a whole. I think that is the breaking-off point. I think that is what Mr. Justice Douglas suggested in his famous dissenting opinion in the Packard Motor Car case.

Mr. BURKE. We will take the case of the group leader, for instance. You might say he assists the foreman in scheduling the work out

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. And the foreman tells him in the morning, "We will run part No. so-and-so through the line today, because that is what the production schedule calls for." So he goes down and gets the set-up, and they set up the machines and they start that particular part down through the line.

Now, would you say that that group leader is a foreman? Bear in mind, he has no power to tell anyone, "You are fired because you did not get out enough production."

Mr. JEFFREY. No, sir; based on the premises you have stipulated, I think he belongs in the production workers' group with full rights to organize and with compulsory recognition of collective-bargaining rights. I think that is one thing the working of the Taft-Hartley Act with respect to foremen has done; it has clarified that division line in many industries. It has forced management where they were negligent about it, to define sharply, or at least more sharply, and they have made this man a part of management and this man definitely a part of labor. The man you have defined, I think, should be classified as a worker with full rights of compulsory bargaining.

Mr. BURKE. Now, I would like to go from the hard and practical to a little on the philosophical side.

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. Prior to the enactment of the Wagner Act, and particularly mass production, which I know best, in mass-production factories, there was a time when the fellow below the level of division superintendent or shop superintendent, whether he was a department foremen or not, was not very well treated by management. And has it not been since the introduction of unions in the mass-production industry, largely, that management has taken a little more vital interest in that?

Mr. JEFFREY. I think that is a very fair statement. I think just as all labor leaders are not good, so is all management not good. In many cases management is far-sighted and sees the value, of course, of treating the supervisor correctly. Others have been driven to it by the necessity of keeping their foremen loyal, by the necessity of distinguishing them from the mass-production worker. I think your statement is very correct and very well put. It has had a salutary effect both ways.

Mr. BURKE. I think, then, that really puts the finger on the reason for describing some places for a foreman to work and bargain collectively with his employer, feeling that he has a right as an American worker—and that is all the company ever treated him as, a worker—to say to that company, or to say collectively to that company, "Well, these are our terms of employment, and we want this type of pay, this many hours," and so on.

Is that not true?

Mr. JEFFREY. Of course, under the Taft-Hartley Act they had the legal right. They simply do not have recognition or standing before the National Labor Relations Board. Higher levels of management are not legally bound to recognize them. I appreciate that.

Mr. BURKE. That was the reason, basically, for the foremen's strike that you referred to.

Mr. JEFFREY. Oh, no. I think the foremen's strikes, particularly in the Detroit area, grew out of the war, the necessity to pick up 100 foremen overnight without adequate screening to see that they had the qualities demanded in a foreman for leadership, without adequate training and without the ability under the wage-and-hour restrictions to increase their wages promptly.

No. I think that is in very large part an outgrowth of the war, and it subsided since. Again, the best proof of the pudding is in the eating.

Mr. BURKE. There was a time when management treated their foremen just about as ruggedly as they treated the fellow on the line, too.

Mr. JEFFREY. I do not think you can generalize that way at all. I do not want to take your time, but I could point out to you instances in this country where foremen have occupied a very fine place in the management group over a large period of years; and, equally, there are others where they have been neglected. I would be the last one to claim anything else.

Mr. BURKE. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I see by your outline here that you have clubs throughout the United States.

Mr. JEFFREY. No. The Foremen's League does not have clubs throughout the United States. The Foremen's Leagues gives financial support to other organizations which do have foremen's clubs throughout the United States. The National Association of Foremen has received financial support from the league. It has some 40,000 members. The National Council of Industrial Management Clubs, affiliated with the YMCA, has some 35,000 members of foremen. They have received financial assistance; yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. It is a little different from your outline here. I would gather from it that you are somewhat organized around the Nation. At any rate——

Mr. JEFFREY. I am sorry; I did not mean it to be misleading.

Mr. WIER. At any rate, is there a club in existence in Minneapolis, Minn.?

Mr. JEFFREY. You mean, does the National Association of Foremen have——

Mr. WIER. Are you representing a Minneapolis club here today?

Mr. JEFFREY. No, sir; definitely I do not represent any club here today.

Mr. WIER. That takes care of that, then, because I know something about the club up there. That takes care of them.

But the thing that I am amazed at is that you take the position, if you take the position you do take, that there must be some engineers, or foremen, as you call them, or supervisors who feel that they have a place in the organization movement; is that correct?

Mr. JEFFREY. The latest information which I have shows that 4 percent of the foremen in the country belong to unions; that another 9 percent say they would be interested in belonging to a union, and that 87 percent say just as definitely that they neither belong to nor are interested in becoming a member of a union.

Mr. WIER. Isn't the only requirement that is necessary for your group what you point to in this presentation, that those are affiliated with your group shall not participate in collective bargaining?

Mr. JEFFREY. With respect to the National Association of Foremen, yes; its members do not participate in collective bargaining; and that is true of a number of other organizations.

Mr. WIER. Then why do you want to deny that privilege to the organizations who want to try it?

Mr. JEFFREY. The Taft-Hartley Act does not deny that, as I understand it. It is suggested the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act be retained. And it means that foremen's unions do not have to be recognized by management and that management is not legally obligated to bargain with them, and management cannot be cited before the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. WIER. Are you sure of the language you are using now; are you sure it is the language in the law?

Mr. JEFFREY. I will be happy to read it to you. I have it in front of me, if you have any doubt.

Mr. WIER. I have some doubt.

Mr. JEFFREY. May I read it to you?

Mr. WIER. Never mind reading it.

Then you are not here asking that foremen be not recognized under the Taft-Hartley Act for collective-bargaining purposes, is that it?

Mr. JEFFREY. Would you repeat that?

Mr. WIER. Then you are not here asking that foremen's organizations, or foremen, as such, shall not have recognition under the labor law?

Mr. JEFFREY. I am here asking that the present provisions shall be retained, and that foremen, foremen's unions, or supervisors' unions be not recognized by the National Labor Relations Board, and that complaints not be taken to them, and that employers not be legally obligated to bargain with unions or foremen.

Mr. WIER. That is what I asked you a few minutes ago. Your position was positive that you do not wish to have foremen and supervisors in the field of collective bargaining?

Mr. JEFFREY. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. Only the language of an attorney makes it sound different.

Mr. JEFFREY. I think there is a very basic distinction. It would be bad to deny them the right, and the law does not do that.

Mr. WIER. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Howell?

Mr. HOWELL. I have no questions.

(The prepared statement of Mr. Jeffrey is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF HARRY P. JEFFREY, SECRETARY, ON BEHALF OF FOREMEN'S LEAGUE FOR EDUCATION AND ASSOCIATION

The Foremen's League for Education and Association is a nonprofit corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Ohio, with its offices located at 512–520 Harries Building, Dayton 2, Ohio. The purpose of the organization is to foster and promote educational work among foremen and supervisors throughout American industry. Its work is financed by membership subscriptions received from more than 250 industrial concerns, both large and small, located throughout the United States.

RELATIONSHIP OF FOREMEN TO MANAGEMENT

Throughout the life of American industry, the foreman has been a part of management and the direct representative of management at its initial point of contact with the rank and file or production worker. This has been the traditional position of the foreman. It is his position today. He is the first link in the management chain and this is true whether he is employed in a small or a great mass production enterprise.

The opinion of the National Labor Relations Board in the Maryland Dry Dock case (49 NLRB 733) contains the following:

"We are now persuaded that the benefits which supervisory employees might achieve through being certified as collective-bargaining units, would be outweighed not only by the dangers inherent in the commingling of management and employees' functions, but also in its possible restrictive effect upon the organizational freedom of rank-and-file employees."

Again, in the case of Packard Motor Car Company v. National Labor Relations Board (330 U. S. 485), Justice Douglas in his dissenting opinion, at page 496, states:

"It [the Wagner Act] put in the employer category all those who acted for management not only in formulating but also in executing its labor policies. Foremost among the latter were foremen. Trade-union history shows that foremen were the arms and legs of management in executing labor policies. In industrial conflicts, they were allied with management. Management indeed commonly acted through them in the unfair labor practices which the act condemns. When we upheld the imposition of the sanctions of the act against management, we frequently relied on the acts of foremen through whom management expressed its hostility to trade-unionism."

FOREMEN'S ASSOCIATIONS AS UNITS OF MANAGEMENT

For many years, foremen have associated themselves together for self-help through education and association while opposing the principle of collective bargaining.

The National Association of Foremen was originally organized in 1922 and today has approximately 40,000 members in either industry-wide or city-wide clubs scattered over 34 States. The constitution of this organization specifically forbids its members as such or its affiliated clubs to engage in collective bargaining for its membership.

There is attached hereto as exhibit A a copy of a letter dated February 16, 1949, signed by B. A. Hodapp, president of this organization, which was mailed to all of its members. This letter contains the following statement:

"It is to insure a continuance of the opportunity to further this voluntary cooperation within management without such outside interference that we urge continuance of the supervisory provision."

The National Council of Industrial Management Clubs Affiliated With YMCA's of the United States likewise has been in existence for many years and has approximately 35,000 members scattered throughout the industrial cities of the country. These clubs likewise do not and cannot engage in collective bargaining on behalf of their membership.

In addition to these two national organizations, there are literally scores of scattered clubs made up of foremen and men and women from the lower ranks of supervision which are not affiliated with either of the large national organizations.

The principle upon which all of these organizations proceed is that their membership is a part of management and that the best interests of their membership is served by management affiliation rather than through collective bargaining with higher levels of management.

In 1948 a national poll was conducted among foremen by Dr. Claude Robinson, of Opinion Research Corp., Princeton, N. J. This poll revealed that only 13 percent of the foremen contacted either belonged to a union or were interested in joining a union.

HISTORY OF EFFORT TO ORGANIZE FOREMEN FOR COLLECTIVE-BARGAINING PURPOSES

Prior to the enactment of the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act), efforts to organize foremen as such for collective-bargaining purposes were unknown. Indeed, this condition prevailed for a period of almost 7 years after the passage of this act. The National Labor Relations Board functioned under the act from 1935 until late in 1941 before any case was brought before it claiming that foremen were employees within the meaning of the act and as such were entitled to the protection and benefits which it conferred.

The industrial unrest incident to production for war during the period from 1941 to 1945 did give rise to efforts to organize foremen for collective-bargaining purposes. There were many contributing factors, among which were restrictions on wage and salary increases and the need for vastly increasing the number of foremen without opportunity for proper selection or training. This effort was concentrated largely in and around the Detroit area and was carried on principally by an organization which had no official connection with any of the great international unions. The largest number of foremen claimed to have been organized for collective-bargaining purposes during this period was about 100,000 and probably never exceeded 75,000. At the present time, it is estimated that the number of foremen organized for collective-bargaining purposes and operating under collective-bargaining contracts is less than 5,000.

LEGAL HISTORY OF FOREMEN'S UNIONS

The National Labor Relations Board was first called upon to decide whether foremen were employees under the terms of the Wagner Act, as previously stated, after the act had been in existence for about 7 years. By a split decision, the Board first held that foremen were "employees" within the meaning of the act and later reversed this decision. In subsequent cases the Board completed another about-face and finally ruled that foremen and supervisors, regardless of the amount of authority which they exercised, were "employees" within the meaning of the act. The United States Supreme Court, by a 5 to 4 decision, in the case of Packard Motor Car Company v. National Labor Relations Board (330 U. S. 485) affirmed this decision.

After the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, the constitutionality of the section of the act relating to supervisory employees and excluding them from the coverage under the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act) was tested in the case of National Labor Relations Board v. Edward G. Budd Manufacturing Company. The United States circuit court of appeals upheld the constitutionality of the act in August 1948 in case No. 10259 on the docket of this court in the sixth circuit, and in case No. 415, styled "Foremen's Association of America v. Edward G. Budd Manufacturing Company," the Supreme Court of the United States refused to review this decision on January 10, 1949.

It has been finally determined, therefore, that the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act relating to foremen and supervisory employees are constitutional.

PROVISIONS OF THE LABOR MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, 1947, RELATING TO FOREMEN

The Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, popularly known as the Taft-Hartley Act, so far as its sections are pertinent to this discussion, became effective August 22, 1947.

Section 2 (3) defines the word "employee" and provides that the term "shall not include * * * any individual employed as a supervisor." Section 2 (11) defines the term supervisor in the following language:

"The term 'supervisor' means any individual having authority, in the interest of the employer, to hire, transfer, suspend, lay off, recall, promote, discharge, assign, reward, or discipline other employees, or responsibility to direct them, or to adjust their grievances, or effectively to recommend such action, if in connection with the foregoing the exercise of such authority is not of a merely routine or clerical nature, but requires the use of independent judgment."

Section 14 of the act provides as follows:

"Nothing herein shall prohibit any individual employed as a supervisor from becoming or remaining a member of a labor organization, but no employer subject to this Act shall be compelled to deem individuals defined herein as supervisors as employees for the purpose of any law, either national or local, relating to collective bargaining."

It is to be noted that the act does not forbid the unionization of foremen for collective-bargaining purposes. This is carefully spelled out in section 14 quoted above. What the act does do is to distinguish supervisors as therein defined as a part of management in contrast to production workers and to provide that management shall not be required to bargain collectively with organizations of supervisors.

This legislative action is a recognition by the Congress of the important basic principles set forth by Justice Douglas in his dissenting opinion in the Packard case, supra, and the performance of the invitation for legislative action on this question as suggested in the majority opinion of Justice Roberts in the same case.

EXPERIENCE OF FOREMEN UNDER THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT AND THE LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT, 1947

The attempt to organize foremen for collective-bargaining purposes was the source of much industrial strife during the important war production years of 1942–45. The testimony of General H. H. Arnold before a House appropriation subcommittee in 1944 contained a severe indictment of this organizational effort as it affected our production of materials for war. Since the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, and over a period of almost 18 months, there is only one strike of record involving a foremen's union.

The first report of the Joint Committee on Labor-Management Relations of the Congress of the United States was issued on March 15, 1948, some 7 months after the act had been in effect. The following appears on pages 29 and 30 of that report:

"The committee has observed a growing trend of employer attempts to make their foremen a part of management. In many of the plants visited, we found new programs designed to give more responsibilities to the lower ranks of supervision and to acquaint them not only with the policies of management but the reasons therefor. Not only has the exclusion of supervisory employees from the benefits of the act failed to produce the work stoppages predicted by opponents of the provision, but it has served to promote the establishment by employers of plans creating many new benefits for supervisory employees."

CONCLUSION

The provisions of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947 (Taft-Hartley Act), relating to supervisors, should be retained and made a part of any amendments to the National Labor Relations Act (Wagner Act) for the following reasons:

1. The foreman is a part of management and is the initial point of management contact with the rank-and-file worker.

2. As a part of management, the foreman must be responsible only to higher levels of management.

3. When organized for collective-bargaining purposes, the foreman must follow his union officers rather than company officers, particularly in a closed shop.

4. A foremen's union is dependent upon the cooperation and support of the workers' union for effective collective bargaining, and the unionized foremen therefore cannot properly direct the men working under him.

5. The foreman, as a part of management, advances on merit rather than seniority, and the unionized foreman is denied this right.

6. In a shop employing unionized foremen, an extra layer of supervision must be added to represent management with the worker, thereby decreasing the foremen's value and increasing the cost of production of the company's product.

7. When the NLRB recognized foremen's unions, strikes were rampant, tying up production workers as well as the foremen themselves. Since the effective date of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, only one strike of foremen is of record in the Nation.

8. The effort to organize foremen for collective-bargaining purposes resulted from maladjustments incident to abnormal production for war. It is reasonably estimated that today 87 percent of supervision in American industry neither belongs nor desires to belong to a union.

Again, as stated by Justice Douglas, "if foremen are 'employees' within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act, so are vice presidents, managers, assistant managers, superintendents, assistant superintendents, and indeed, all who are on the pay roll of the company, including the president."

In the interest of peaceful industrial relations and a prosperous national economy, both of which will be so greatly influenced by legislation to be enacted by this Congress, we respectfully urge that this fundamental distinction between the worker and management be recognized and that management not be legally obligated to bargain collectively with a large segment of itself.

EXHIBIT A

THE NATIONAL ASSOCIATION OF FOREMEN,
Dayton, Ohio, February 16, 1949.

DEAR FELLOW MEMBER: Only a matter of utmost concern to you and me—as members of NAF and as responsible managers upon whose decision rests much of the fate of our American industrial system—warrants this personal communication with every member of our association.

What should be done about continuing, as a law, the supervisory provision of the Taft-Hartley Act?

The position which NAF takes, as stated in the attached editorial which will appear in Manage magazine for March, is not new. Rather it expresses publicly, for the first time, a stand which NAF has gradually adopted in recent years.

Good progress toward management unity has been made while the supervisory provision has held in check the outside interferences which tend to divide. It is to insure a continuance of the opportunity to further this voluntary cooperation within management without such outside interference that we urge continuance of the supervisory provision.

Any other stand foreshadows a tragic future for foremen. A leading authority, in presenting the case for foreman unionization, today acknowledges that the only workable future for it (except in a few nontypical industries as printing, for example) is on a basis wholly independent and isolated from the big rank and file unions. Therefore, if the foreman is alone and wedged between the big unions and management, then in truth and in fact he will be neither fish nor fowl, because those forces which divide would lower the status of the very job itself and would totally destroy his future opportunities as a management man.

If this letter and the editorial express your individual position, you may wish to write or telegraph Senator Elbert Thomas, chairman of the Senate Committee on Labor, Senator Robert A. Taft, ranking minority member of the committee, and your own Senators and Representatives. It is entirely proper and our duty, as citizens and men of management, that we express ourselves to our governmental servants on subjects which concern us, just as others are doing.

Sincerely yours,

B. A. HODAPP, President.

MR. JEFFREY. Might I suggest you let the two working foremen read a short statement to you? I think you might be interested in the experience of these men.

STATEMENT OF GEORGE DRIESKE, DEPARTMENT SUPERVISOR, MURRAY CORP. OF AMERICA, DETROIT, MICH.

MR. DRIESKE. My name is George Drieske. I live at 8490 St. Clements Street, Centerline, which is right outside of Detroit, Mich. I am a department supervisor or foreman at the Detroit plant of the Murray Corp. of America. Murray makes automobile-body stampings, frames, and fenders for big automobile companies. I believe that Murray generally hires about 10,000 people in all its plants.

My department makes body assemblies. As department supervisor, I have charge of about 300 people. There are seven section and shift supervisors under me.

I am against a foremen's union because I firmly believe that a supervisor is a direct part of management. He is the connecting link between the workingman and the executive.

I came up the hard way through the ranks. I am not 36 years of age. I was born in Detroit, Mich., and went to school part of my time in Detroit and part in country schools. I had 2 years of high school. In order to obtain the education for the job I now hold, I attended night technical schools while working in the daytime.

I started at Murray in March 1934 as a student assembler at the rate of 40 cents an hour, or $16 for a 40-hour week. After 8 years, in 1942, I became a section supervisor, and in 1947, a department supervisor. Today I am earning $525 a month for a 40-hour week, plus more for overtime. I hope to keep on going higher by hard work. While I was working as an hourly worker, I belonged to the UAW-CIO Local No. 2. I believe that unions for the rank and file are a good thing. But a union for supervision is different. A union is no good for foremen.

A supervisors' union would not help any supervisor who has the necessary qualities and the determination to advance. In fact, he would be held back because of seniority provisions. I want to get ahead by hard work and ability and not be held back by some other man only because he has a longer service record.

We have supervisors who have been with Murray for over 20 years. They did not need organizing to help them retain their jobs and get ahead. I feel I can do the same.

To do his job properly, a supervisor must operate on the theory that he is paying the costs of labor, maintenance, and equipment from his own bank account, just like he was running his own business. He is entirely responsible for the production costs, maintaining quality, production schedules, maintaining discipline, and settling labor disputes in his own department.

All supervisors are a part of management and must think and act as a part of management.

At Murray's, supervisors participate in management. We supervisors are consulted by top management on many management problems. We are consulted about questions raised during the negotiating of the contract with the workers' union. We are asked about production, quality, and efficiency. Many suggestions given by supervision become Murray policy.

I know that the Foremen's Association of America takes in foremen of different levels of authority. One thing I would like to know about is, How could I act for the company and maintain discipline from seven supervisors working for me if I belonged to the same foremen's union with them?

I feel that if supervision belonged to a form of organized labor there would be deals between workers and supervisors. How could I, as a supervisor, maintain discipline for the company over workers under such conditions? If there was a workers' union and a different supervisors' union, I am afraid that the workers' union would soon control.

In my opinion, a union of foremen or supervisors will not work.

Mr. KELLEY. Does Mr. Wilson have a statement?

Mr. JEFFREY. Yes.

STATEMENT OF ALEXANDER H. WILSON, FOREMAN, ROBERTSHAW THERMOSTAT CO., YOUNGWOOD, PA.

Mr. WILSON. My name is Alexander H. Wilson, and I live near Youngwood, Pa., with my wife and three children. I am employed as a foreman at the Robertshaw Thermostat Co., which is a division of the Robertshaw-Fulton Controls Co. This division of the company is located at Youngwood, Pa., and employs normally about 1,200 to 1,400 people. We manufacture thermostatic controls.

I completed high school and went to work for this company when I was 20 years old. I worked for 9 years as a machine operator and was a member of the Steel Workers of America, CIO, from 1937 until I became a supervisor.

I was promoted to a working supervisor in 1942 and was again promoted in 1943 to a foreman in charge of a department. I have been a foreman for more than 5 years. Since becoming a supervisor, I have not been a member of a union. I believe the production worker needs a union, but I also believe a foreman is a part of management and should not belong to a union.

I have about 50 employees working under me. It is my job to schedule production, direct the labor force in getting out production and administer company policy. It is up to me to make recommendations for additional workers when needed and to pass on their work after they have been sent to my department. As foreman I have the right to qualify or disqualify men who are sent to my department to work. It is also my duty to recommend disciplinary measures for the workers and I take care of the first steps in the grievance procedure with the shop stewards.

There are two assistant foremen working under me, one on each shift. These men are on salary and are not members of the union. Grievances are reported first to them and through them to me.

I do not see how my assistant foreman and I could carry out our work and belong to a union. In my case I must control both my assistant foremen and the workers.

We have good labor relations at our plant. If I have any complaint or question I take it up directly with my supervisor. I can go independently to the boss and don't have to have someone go for me or get his permission. This system allows a foreman the greatest freedom and in my judgment is better than attempting to operate through a foreman's union.

When I left the production ranks I was chosen on merit and not by seniority. This is the way I want to continue to work and advance. If I belonged to a union, I could not do this. As a foreman I am a part of management and this is the position I want to keep.

The foremen at our plant have a club called the Robertshaw Foremen's Association. I am a past president of this club and we are affiliated with the National Association of Foremen. Our club meets once a month and we have speakers on educational subjects for foremen. This club and its members do not engage in collective bargaining. I believe the club's greatest value is the chance it gives to associate with other foremen.

Mr KELLEY. Are there any questions?

Mr. PERKINS. I have no questions.

Mr. BURKE. There are a couple of questions I would like to address to the gentleman—Mr. Drieske, first.

You are not opposed to the organization of foremen, as such: that is, in a club, or anything of that sort, so long as the organization does not participate in collective bargaining; is that how I understand your opposition?

Mr. DRIESKE. I am sorry, sir. I am having a little trouble hearing you.

Mr. BURKE. I said that you stated opposition to foremen's organizations, and what you mean by that is organizations of foremen which participate in collective bargaining?

Mr. DRIESKE. That is what I mean.

Mr. BURKE. You work for a company that has a pretty good record of labor relations, is that not true?

Mr. DRIESKE. I believe they have.

Mr. BURKE. So, if they handle their foremen all right the chances are their foremen will not want to become a part of an organization for the purpose of collective bargaining. However, would you oppose the idea of foremen of some other shop, maybe, down the street, whose management is not quite as good, organizing for their own protection and for the purposes of collective bargaining?

Mr. DRIESKE. I can only speak from my own personal opinion. I am not in position to quote someone else's troubles or their ideas. I know that I am satisfied with conditions as they are where I work, and I do not know of anybody, and I have not run into anyone in my building, or number of buildings there, who has any desire for a union for the purpose of collective bargaining.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to ask Mr. Wilson some questions.

You used the term in your statement that has caused quite a bit of discussion in labor relations generally throughout the country for some few years now, and that was working supervisors. Do you believe that a working supervisor should come under the terms of a collective bargaining agreement of the plant of the production and maintenance employees, generally?

Mr. WILSON. Not as we used working supervisors: no sir. I do not think they should enter into collective bargaining.

Mr. BURKE. A working supervisor, as is generally known, is an individual who may schedule parts through a line, or schedule work at times, and at other times actually operate a machine and turn out the product, is that not true?

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir, to some extent that is how we operate, except that a working supervisor, in my experience, has had the supervision and direction of people.

Mr. BURKE. But when an individual is called upon as part of his daily work to do work that is under the terms of collective bargaining, say, for instance, that work has piece rates on it, when you come within the purview of collective bargaining, is not that right; if that work has piece rates on it is it not right for the union to expect that the individual who does that work, even though it may be only part-time, be under the terms of the collective-bargaining agreement?

Mr. WILSON. I should think so, as you describe it.

Mr. JEFFREY. May I answer that, too? I think you put your finger on a very important problem, and I think both in the small shop of this gentleman, and the large shop of the other gentleman, that effort has got to be made to make a hard and fast line there between management and the worker and, I think, the man you describe should be a part of the production worker's union, and should bargain collectively for that group.

Mr. BURKE. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I am going to address my questions to either one of them. I do not care particularly which one answers.

Do you men pay any dues or contribute to this organization at all?

Mr. WILSON. Do you mean the National Association of Foremen?

Mr. IRVING. Whatever one you belong to.

Mr. WILSON. Yes, sir, we pay dues to our club, which is called the Robertshaw Foremen's Association, and those dues are $1 per month. Our dues to the National Association of Foremen, however, from our club for each individual member is, I think, $4 per year. It is in that neighborhood.

Mr. IRVING. And does your club pay dues into the league?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. IRVING. Do you know of any members who might want to belong to a foreman's union, or do you know they all do not want to belong?

Mr. WILSON. I hesitate to speak for them. I do not know any foremen who would like to join a union. I would not speak for them as a whole.

Mr. IRVING. It seems to me it would be a little more solid if the men themselves formed the organization. I have grave doubts as to the general set-up. I cannot see why, if it becomes very active, such organizations could not be financed by employers and industries to work the same way for other employees to slant down the wage scale.

That is all I have to say, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Howell?

Mr. HOWELL. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much.

Mr. JEFFREY. Thank you, sir, and members of the committee.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Richter, you may proceed when you are ready.

TESTIMONY OF WALTER C. RICHTER, MANAGER, PATERSON PARCHMENT PAPER CO., BRISTOL, PA.

Mr. RICHTER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the committee, my company, the Paterson Parchment Paper Co. of Bristol, Pa., greatly appreciates the opportunity of being heard before this body.

The Paterson Parchment Paper Co. was founded in 1885 and has been continuously in business from that date. From 1885 to 1945, 60 years, this company never had a strike or work stoppage.

This company is a small company employing approximately 500 people and is engaged in the manufacture and sale in interstate commerce of parchment paper, principally for packaging food products. The company requested the privilege of appearing before your committee so that it might place before the committee members its experiences during the last six months of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, three of which were consumed by a strike resulting in a loss to the company of $336,500 and to its employees of approximately $225,000.

In 1945 the National Labor Relations Board certified the International Brotherhood of Papermakers, A. F. of L., and Bristol Local 500 as the exclusive bargaining unit for the production and maintenance workers of the plant. Following this certification by the National Labor Relations Board, the company entered into a written contract with the union. That contract was changed by mutual agreement from year to year until August 15, 1947, at which time a contract was executed by both parties which remained in full force and effect up to and including the incidents to be referred to hereinafter.

The company recommends labor legislation that amply provides for protection of the public, employees, union and employer. This request is based upon the experience of the company, under the contract entered into on August 15, 1947, pursuant to Federal labor law then in force and which law is now before you for consideration and/or total repeal.

We urge that there be retained in the law a guarantee of full freedom of speech for all and that the rights of the public be at all times protected in connection therewith. With respect to the rights of the public, we include within the definition of that term persons who constitute personnel as employees, employers and representatives of the Union and that much larger segment so generally spoken of as the public.

The company further believes that there should be inserted in any labor law the right of any employee to demand a secret ballot as to whether or not a substantial number of employees wish to return to work during a work stoppage.

A Federal law is now in force which for all practical purposes forces an employer to enter into a contract with a union. This company entered into such a contract in good faith in 1947 when the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947 was in effect. At the time this contract was negotiated the Labor-Management Relations Act provided that suits for violation of contracts between employer and a labor organization representing employees could be brought in a Federal district court. The company, therefore, is in a situation where Congress enacted a law compelling the company to enter into a contract presumably the same as any other business contract. When the company entered into this contract it felt that it was fully protected by the laws enacted by Congress in the enforcement of this contract, the same as it might enforce any of its other business contracts.

It has been publicized that it is the intention of this Congress to repeal in toto the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 including the right to sue for damages for breach of contract and the right of freedom of speech.

We are not here to discuss the desirability or nondesirability of all of the various sections of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. We intend to discuss briefly only those phases of the act which have affected the company's dealings with the union during the 3 months' work stoppage last summer.

It is the company's feeling that the sanctity of a contract, and the realization by the parties to it that all obligations thereunder must be performed, is the foundation of every constitutional government and the very foundation of American free enterprise. Our Constitution recognizes and provides that no law shall abridge such a contract. Every constitution in the various States contains a similar provision. The Constitution itself is a contract by which the people among themselves, through the colonies, agreed they would abide. It is from that constitutional agreement by the people that the Congress receives its authority. The fundamentals of constitutional government should not now be undermined in the promulgation of a doctrine of irresponsibility in fulfilling contractual obligations. Inadequate provision for the complete enforcement of contractual obligations in labor contracts is producing one of the greatest difficulties facing the American public today. The nonfulfillment of contractual obligations is the cause of one of the greatest difficulties in the world today.

We feel that Congress should not saddle an employer with a contract whereby he is subjected to suits and at the same time permits labor organizations and their top-ranking representatives to escape the corresponding obligations imposed upon them by such a contract. An employer should know for a definite period of time his cost of labor, for without this he cannot project his activities and commitments. This is equally true with respect to the employee, because he has the right to know in advance what his rate of pay will be in the immediate future, and that contractual right should not be taken from him without redress against those who caused the breach of the contract, depriving him of his right to work.

The company also urges the right of full freedom of speech to employee and employer. In this connection the company also believes that the employer should have a right to know, once a strike is in progress, whether or not his employees wish to return to work under such terms as he has offered.

The foregoing recommendations are based upon the experience of this company during a strike at its plant from August 20 to November 20, 1948, the application of which follows:

In June of 1948 the company and the union began meetings for the purpose of attempting to agree upon changes in the then existing contract. There were seven meetings held, during which time the union indicated that, unless the company met its demands, it would call a strike. The company directed the attention of the union to the provisions of the contract then in force, reading:

> This agreement shall be in effect from August 15, 1947, to August 15, 1948, and thereafter from year to year, provided, however, that either party may terminate the same on not less than 60 days' written notice given to the other prior to the anniversary date.
> However, should there be a delay in negotiating the new agreement, this agreement shall remain in full effect until such time as a new agreement is completed.

No notice of termination was given by either the company or the union.

On Friday, August 20, at or about 4 o'clock, the union notified the company that its members had voted to begin a strike on Monday, August 23, at 7 a. m. Within 2 hours thereafter, the union had thrown a picket line around the plant.

The company, believing that a majority of its employees desired to return to work, inserted advertisements in a local newspaper inviting them to do so. The company had reason to believe that a majority of its employees desired to return to work.

Four weeks after the strike started, the company and also the union met with a Federal conciliator. The company requested the union, through the conciliator, to have a secret-ballot vote at a membership meeting to determine whether or not a majority of the employees wanted to return to work on the basis of the offers made by the company. The union refused such a request on the basis that it was not bound to place before the employees the question of reconsideration, or the question of whether or not a majority of the employees wanted to return to work on the basis of a previous offer made by the company.

The company was so strong in its belief that the strike was not the desire of the majority of the employees that it obtained the services of an independent agency to mail a secret ballot to each of its employees. The company advertized this fact in the paper. The company also advised all of its employees by letter of its offers prior to the strike.

Of the replies received by the agency, the vote was 11 to 1 for returning to work.

The union promptly filed with the National Labor Relations Board a charge of unfair labor practice against the company, assigning as one of its grounds the fact that the company had attempted to determine the real attitude of its employees on the question of returning to work. The company was convinced then, and is still convinced, that the full situation was not adequately presented to its employees before the strike.

The company persisted in trying to talk to its employees through newspaper advertisements. As the employees read these advertisements, it became more evident day by day that they were receiving the benefit of the right of the company of free speech, as provided for in the Labor Management Relations Act. Had not this right of free speech been granted the company in the act, it is doubtful if this strike would have been settled even today.

This is an example where freedom of speech, permitted by the Labor Management Relations Act, ultimately benefited the employees as well as the employer.

In addition, the company resorted to a Pennsylvania court of equity to enforce its rights and those of its employees by injunctive proceedings. This right, however, did not extend to an adequate suit for damages, which was begun in the Federal District Court under the Labor Management Relations Act.

During the strike, the company lost as fixed charges $336,500, exclusive of loss of profits.

The employees lost in wages approximately $225,000, although the officers and representatives of the international received their regular salaries and expenses during this period of time.

That the law should provide the employer or the employee the right, upon written demand to the union, a secret ballot as to whether or not the employees wish to return to work, is made apparent by the circumstances in this case. The company had an agency mail a secret ballot to determine whether or not the employees wished to return to work. Of the replies received by the agency, the ratio was 11 to 1 in favor of returning to work, on the basis of offers made by the company.

The employees themselves circulated an open petition for signature. In this petition, almost 40 percent of the entire union membership requested a secret ballot on the question of returning to work. This was steadfastly refused by the union until after the court of equity had permitted the petition to be offered in evidence and issued a preliminary order permitting those employees who wanted to work to do so unmolested.

If freedom of speech or exchange of viewpoint in ideas between the employer and employee is denied, then there is placed in the hands of a few individuals an opportunity to suppress facts and to continue a strike to the detriment of the majority for an indefinite period of time, without having the true facts presented to the employees.

The company in this instance cannot, of course, recover for its employees the financial loss they suffered, but the company may, unless the right is frustrated by Congress, recover some of its loss.

We wish to impress upon the committee that for permanent long-range legislation affecting the relationship of employer and employee, each must be treated equally and fairly. No union organization should be placed above the rights of the employee and employer by exempting it alone from suit for violation of a contractual obligation.

There is no equitable, legal, or moral precedent to be found whereby a union organization ought to be exempt from damages for its breach of a contract with which the union expects everybody else to comply.

We believe that our labor law should provide for strict adherence to contractual obligations on the part of employers, employees, and unions, with the right of full freedom of speech in connection with all labor-management relations. We also believe in the right of a secret ballot at any time, at the request of an employer or employee, on any question affecting the right of either party.

Mr. KELLEY. You say that strike was called without due notice?

Mr. RICHTER. The strike was called, Mr. Kelley, on Friday, August 20. We had a series of seven meetings. At the fifth meeting, the committee, in discussion, suggested the possibility of a strike, but on August 20, the union had a membership meeting at about 2 o'clock. The committee came back to us about 4 o'clock and said that unless they got their demands they were going to strike on Monday. We had patiently explained to them that we had made our best and final offer. That same day, about 5 o'clock, they had placed a picket line around our plant.

Mr. KELLEY. How long was it from the time you first knew of the termination of the contract until they did strike? In the provision it says not less than 60 days.

Mr. RICHTER. The contract was never terminated. Neither the company nor the union terminated the contract, and the final clause in the contract provided it would continue in full force and effect until any change had been agreed upon.

Mr. KELLEY. Then you say they did not do that?

Mr. RICHTER. No termination notice was given; that is correct.

Mr. KELLEY. What was the purpose of striking?

Mr. RICHTER. The question of wages.

Mr. KELLEY. You had no organization before 1945?

Mr. RICHTER. In 1945 the National Labor Relations Board conducted an election, and after the election the International Brotherhood of Papermakers was certified.

Mr. KELLEY. Before that, it was an open shop?

Mr. RICHTER. It was an open shop; that is correct.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Not having had the pleasure of hearing the gentleman's testimony, I most certainly will refrain from asking him any questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I am going to refer to the phrase in the contract, the phrase that you made a part of your testimony here, which says:

However, should there be a delay in negotiating the new agreement, this agreement shall remain in full effect until such time as a new agreement, is completed.

Mr. RICHTER. That is correct.

Mr. IRVING. Actually, I cannot see anything definite about that. I mean, it could be a delay for a period of weeks or many months. Did you have any arbitration clauses in your contract?

Mr. RICHTER. There is no arbitration clause, sir, covering negotiations. There is an arbitration clause under the grievance procedure.

Mr. IRVING. For settling grievances?

Mr. RICHTER. That is correct.

Mr. IRVING. So, of course, from your point and from the union's standpoint, I would say it was a very weak clause.

Mr. RICHTER. That clause, I might add, was in the contract from the first contract in 1945, and was placed in there at the insistence of the union. It is a union clause but not a clause of the company.

Mr. IRVING. In my opinion, it is still not a good clause, whoever put it in.

I want to say I believe in sanctity of contracts, and that they should be lived up to once they are entered into, but I think this testimony here proves almost conclusively that under the present law it would be possible for a company to more or less promote a dispute or a strike which could break the local union. If that was the procedure in a number of instances affecting local unions, it could break the international union. I am not insinuating in any way that that was the purpose or intent of your company. I heartily believe it was not.

Mr. RICHTER. May I assure you that was not the case. In 1945, when the Board ordered the election, the union was chosen as the bargaining agent. Out of 370 votes cast, the union was chosen by a majority of only 12 votes. The company, hoping good labor relations would result, immediately entered into a union-shop contract and a check-off of dues, and we still today are operating under the same contract. It has been a union shop since 1945, including a check-off of dues. That would certainly indicate the company did not have any intention of placing any logs, as you might call it, in the way of the union.

Mr. IRVING. I thought I made myself clear that my opinion was your company did not have any intention of doing that.

Mr. RICHTER. That is correct, sir.

Mr. IRVING. Would you care to expose anything about what your offer was?

Mr. RICHTER. I would be very glad to, sir. The company's offer was 5 cents across the board, with time and a half for all Saturday's work, as such, and double time for all Sunday work, as such, with an earnest plea to the negotiating committee that in the face of business conditions last summer they accept the 5 cents, and when business conditions warranted we would talk to them again about wages just the same as we had done before.

Mr. IRVING. The pattern, you know, was 9 cents; was it not, Mr. Burke?

Mr. RICHTER. When you speak of pattern, are you speaking of our industry?

Mr. IRVING. National.

Mr. RICHTER. In our industry the pattern was not 9 cents.

Mr. IRVING. The reason I ask that is that I happen to know that the best offer of industry was 2½ cents, and that finally it was settled on the basis of 15 cents.

Mr. RICHTER. In the paper industry, there were a number of contracts that were settled for 2 cents, and some of them without any increases at all.

Mr. IRVING. I bring that out because there is a great difference between a final offer of 2½ cents and a final settlement of 15 cents. I just wanted to bring that out.

I think that is all the questions I have.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Richter, what was the outcome of the charge filed against your company before the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. RICHTER. When the strike was settled and the committee of the union agreed to return all employees to work, the union agreed to withdraw the unfair labor-practice charge, and it never went to a hearing.

Mr. JACOBS. You started your negotiations in June?

Mr. RICHTER. We started in June of 1948.

Mr. JACOBS. And were there any written demands served upon you, or were they oral?

Mr. RICHTER. I did not hear that question.

Mr. JACOBS. Were the demands written or oral?

Mr. RICHTER. There was a written contract presented by the union, including their demands.

Mr. JACOBS. So at any rate you had notice in June that there was a demand for a change in your contract?

Mr. RICHTER. That is right, which was in keeping with our past practice with the anniversary date of the contract approaching.

Mr. JACOBS. I suppose there was a number of final figures given back and forth?

Mr. RICHTER. That is right. There was an exchange of proposals.

Mr. JACOBS. And threats to strike, and saying, "This is as far as we go," and so forth?

Mr. RICHTER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Just a good old American horse-trading custom, I suppose, that has found its way into the bargain?

Mr. RICHTER. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. You would not have the committee believe when the strike occurred in August it was a complete surprise to you? You had been jawing around about the thing for about 3 months, then?

Mr. RICHTER. It was a complete surprise from the standpoint of knowing our employees and knowing the happy labor relations as they had been going on for a period of many years. We did not think that the employees would strike over the question.

Mr. JACOBS. That is what I am getting at. There is something here I do not understand. Was there something that happened somewhere?

Mr. RICHTER. I think, sir, the strike was called and promoted by a very small group, most of whom were on the negotiating committee, and the strike was not the desire of the majority of the employees. That is the best answer I have for the situation and is the opinion of all of the management members of our company.

Mr. JACOBS. Prior to the time the negotiations commenced in June had your labor relations deteriorated to any extent?

Mr. RICHTER. They had not, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. So far as you could tell, they were good?

Mr. RICHTER. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, that occurred under the Taft-Hartley law. And you got no solace under the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. RICHTER. Except the right of responsibility and contractual obligations on the part of the union.

Mr. JACOBS. I assume you have read considerably about the history of the negotiations between management and labor, and I think you and I will both agree when they get to fighting there are lots of law suits and they are dismissed when the strike is settled, generally?

Mr. RICHTER. I would not want to say "generally."

Mr. JACOBS. Generally speaking, when they go back to work, the same thing happens to the law suit that happened to the charges against your company before the Board; they dismiss them and forget it?

Mr. RICHTER. I have had no previous experience with suits against unions, so I cannot say that is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Incidentally, that brings us to another subject.

Mr. RICHTER. I say again, I have had no previous experience with suits.

Mr. JACOBS. You seem to be under the impression that the union could not be sued until after the Taft-Hartley Law was passed.

Mr. RICHTER. The union, under the laws of the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, could be sued for a breach of contract, but it would be very difficult, because the international union, as the name implies, is a union from coast to coast, and also outside of the country, it would be difficult to sue all individuals involved. It would have to be on an individual basis.

Mr. KELLEY. Would you yield?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Have you heard of any corporations being sued by a union in Pennsylvania?

Mr. RICHTER. Not in Pennsylvania, I have not, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. I have not either.

Mr. JACOBS. If you will have your lawyer get in touch with me I will be glad to tell him how he can sue in Pennsylvania without suing all the unions in Pennsylvania.

Mr. RICHTER. We have legal counsel, but as you well know, I am not a lawyer.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to get to the subject of freedom of speech now, for a minute.

Do you know of any case—I did not mean to be discourteous about that, but you will find out what I say is true about bringing law suits against the union.

This freedom of speech thing, are you not aware of the fact that under the Wagner Act the employer can insert advertisements in the paper and talk to his employees and try to get them to go back to work? Did you ever know of them being restrained from doing that under the Wagner Act?

Mr. RICHTER. No; but I think under the present labor-management relations act an employer can say what he feels and believes with more confidence than he could under the Wagner Act.

Mr. JACOBS. The question I put to you is this: Did you ever know of a case where an employer was held guilty of an unfair practice for issuing a call to return to work, as you said you did, by mailing notices to workers, and putting notices in the paper inviting them to return to work? Did you ever hear of an employer being held guilty of an unfair labor practice for doing such a thing?

Mr. RICHTER. I know from experience that employers have been cited for many things.

Mr. JACOBS. Were they ever cited for saying anything like that; can you cite me any case of that kind?

Mr. RICHTER. Offhand, I cannot, sir.

Mr. JACOBS You are not a lawyer, I take it?

Mr. RICHTER. I have said that I am not.

Mr. JACOBS. I think what you mean is this—were you in here this morning when the first witness testified?

Mr. RICHTER. I was, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. He was an attorney for the bus association.

Mr. RICHTER. Yes, that is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Did you hear his answers to the questions I put to him?

Mr. RICHTER. I did.

Mr. JACOBS. Does that clarify it in your mind to any extent?

Mr. RICHTER. I do not recall the exact testimony. I have been here all day and have heard a great deal of testimony.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you realize that the Taft-Hartley Law not only provides that what the employer says will not constitute unfair labor practice, but it also provides that it shall not be evidence of an unfair labor practice?

Mr. RICHTER. I heard that testimony by you this morning; yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you believe if a man says something about another man, and then a court, or a judicial body in inquiring into the conduct of the one who made the statement, that what he said should be heard in evidence in order to cast light upon his motive, or have I made it too involved?

Mr. RICHTER. You are getting a little involved.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us suppose that I have said regarding someone that I think he is a rascal.

Mr. RICHTER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. And has generally evidenced it by hostility towards him, and let us suppose, for example, that that appears in a newspaper, and I am accused of being the author of that libel; do you understand that?

Mr. RICHTER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think that when the trial comes up that it would be evidence, some evidence that I was the author of the libel, to prove that I had been saying that he was a rascal?

Mr. RICHTER. I would say so, sir; yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, do you think there should be a different rule made in the labor law to protect the employer?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has 1 minute left.

Mr. RICHTER. I think an employer should have the right to communicate with his employees at any time, just the same as I have a right to communicate with Members of our Congress, and go just so far.

Mr. JACOBS. I agree with you on that, and I do not think the law has been any different, but that does not answer the question. Do you think, as a rule of evidence, my attitude towards you, as expressed by my words, should be provable in court if you claim I have abused you or violated the law against you in any way?

Mr. RICHTER. I think it should be provable in court.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you do not think a different rule of evidence should apply in a trial of an unfair labor practice, do you?

Mr. RICHTER. I do not think so.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not either. I say this to you, and I think that you want to be a fair man——

Mr. RICHTER. That is our intention, sir, at all times.

Mr. JACOBS. You investigate for your own benefit—I am just suggesting this investigation for your own benefit—all this propaganda that has been going around about the freedom of speech thing, and you talk to a lawyer about it and ask him if it is not a different rule of evidence than obtains in any other field of jurisprudence, and satisfy your own mind, and see if your employers have not been victimized by a propaganda campaign on that one question.

That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Howell?

Mr. HOWELL. I just wanted to ask Mr. Richter on these questionnaires that you had mailed out by this agency, you said they turned out about 11 to 1 to return to work. What proportion of the workers answered this?

Mr. RICHTER. There were 360 questionnaires sent out, and 117 were returned to the agency, which was about one-third, and the ratio of the one-third returned was 11 to 1. We also learned that when they were delivered in the mails the committee was aware of the fact that we had sent these questionnaires, and they gathered up as many as they could so they would not be returned to the agency. On the one-third that was returned the ratio was 11 to 1 to return to work.

Mr. HOWELL. On this petition that was circulated you say about 40 percent of them signed it?

Mr. RICHTER. That is correct, an open petition.

Mr. JACOBS. How long had the strike been going on at that time?

Mr. RICHTER. When the petition was circulated?

Mr. KELLEY. Do you yield?

Mr. HOWELL. Yes, sir.

Mr. RICHTER. I think the petition was circulated at about the end of the sixth or seventh week of the strike.

Mr. KELLEY. Have you finished, Mr. Howell?

Mr. HOWELL. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all.

Mr. RICHTER. Thank you for the privilege of appearing today, gentlemen.

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will stand adjourned until 10 o'clock tomorrow morning.

(Whereupon, at 3 p. m., the subcommittee adjourned until 10 a. m., Wednesday, March 9, 1949.)

(Due to an all-day executive session on Wednesday, resumption of the hearing was postponed until 10 a. m., Thursday, March 10, 1949.)

Representative ANDREW JACOBS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR REPRESENTATIVE JACOBS: Enclosed for your information and possible interest is a copy of a letter which I have today sent to Senator Thomas, chairman of the Senate Labor Committee, and Representative Lesinski, chairman of the House Labor Committee.

Also enclosed is a copy of a message which has been included in our employee newspapers and in daily newspapers in communities where the General Electric Co. has plants.

This message is simply an attempt in the public interest to get some of the more important basic questions of labor law calmly before our employees and their neighbors, and possibly thereby to encourage individual citizens to give thoughtful and temperate consideration to this matter.

Very truly yours,

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., January 26, 1949.

MR. CHARLES E. WILSON,
President, General Electric Co.,
New York 22, N. Y.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I have your kind letter of January 21, 1949. As a member of the Committee on Education and Labor I will favor permitting your representative to appear before our committee to testify regarding labor legislation.

This was a courtesy not extended to me, and to a number of people, by the architects of the Taft-Hartley law.

Very truly yours,

ANDREW JACOBS,
Member of Congress, Eleventh Indiana District.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 9, 1949.

Subject: Labor legislation.

MR. CHARLES E. WILSON,
President, General Electric Co.,
New York 22, N. Y.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I received your questionnaire, entitled "How Would You Revise Our Labor Laws?", containing 18 questions, in ballot form, requesting a straight "yes" or "no" answer.

My response must be by more extended statements than categorical "yes" or "no" answers. The questions will be repeated verbatim and marked with the answer obviously expected. They disclose the inadequacy of a "yes" or "no" answer.

Interrelated questions will be grouped. I shall ask you to comment upon my views. I trust you will respond, and I assure you respectful consideration of your opinions. We can use all the help and wisdom available to enact a fair labor law.

I—THE EMERGENCY STRIKE

(Your questions No. 1 and 2)

"1. Do you believe that labor laws should, in general, preserve the employee's right to strike? Yes ☒ No ☐"

"2. Do you believe labor laws should give the President of the United States the right to seek, through courts of law, to delay a strike that would cause a national emergency endangering the health and safety of the entire country? Yes ☒ No ☐"

A labor questionnaire put question No. 1 to me as a candidate, but not No. 2. My response was as follows:

"The right to strike is necessary in a free economy, which I would defend for reasons presently stated herein. However, one limitation is necessary to avoid destruction of free economy and that is the closing down of an entire vital industry, whether by strike or lock-out.

"Industry-wide strikes will bring irresistible public demand for Government control over such industry, which in turn results in wage, and ultimately price fixing; hence, a controlled economy.

"A controlled economy inevitably results in socialism, communism, fascism, or some form of state monopoly, under which the government exercises all the power inherent in mass wealth. Again the inevitable final results of such concentrated power would be forfeiture of personal liberty to entrenched officials.

"Curtailment of labor's right to strike is proper only to the extent of preventing industry-wide cessation of production which would create the pressure indicated above, and curtailment of any combination of industry, or any governmental action having like effect, should be likewise treated."

This response illustrates how a categorical answer would not clearly disclose one's honest opinion to the single question. And I believe, Mr. Wilson, that your position in industry, and mine in Government, demands our being rather specific upo this dangerous problem.

In order to help me, would you please give me the benefit of your views upon the following questions:

1. An emergency strike (or lock-out) is unsettled after the period of legal delay expires. How would you deal with the problem then?
2. Specifically, would you favor compulsory settlement?
3. If wages were fixed, would not prices also be ultimately fixed?
4. What, if any, other approach is there to this problem?
5. The Taft-Hartley law provided a union membership vote on the employers', but not a stockholders' vote, on the union's last offer. Do you think this ommission discloses any basic lack of objective and unbiased thinking in the construction of the law?

II. TWO EXAMPLES OF BIAS IN LEGISLATION ON LABOR DISPUTES

(Your questions No. 18 and 12)

"18. Should labor laws provide that a striker who has been replaced in the course of an economic strike—not involving any unfair labor practice—be permitted to vote in an election to choose a bargaining agent at the conclusion of the strike? Yes ☐ No ☒"

While this is your last question, it goes to the heart of the Taft-Hartley law. Therefore, I discuss it early in this letter.

You refer to section 9 (c) (1) (A), and 9 (c) (3), permitting an election for decertification of a union during, not merely "* * * at the conclusion of the strike," as your question implies. The Taft-Hartley law provides:

"Employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall not be eligible to vote." Section 9 (c) (3). [Italics added.]

This makes quite a difference. This is but the first step in requiring the Government to use its full power as a strikebreaking force; without regard to the merits of the dispute. Here is how it works:

1. Union A strikes for higher wages.
2. Company A employs "replacements," or "strikebreakers"; term depending upon one's bias.

On this subject Business Week, December 18, 1948, had this to say:

"Given a few million unemployed in America, given an administration in Washington which was not prounion—and the Taft-Hartley Act conceivably could wreck the labor movement.

"These are the provisions that could do it: (1) Picketing can be restrained by injunction; (2) employers can petition for a collective bargaining election; (3) strikers can be held ineligible to vote—while the strike replacements cast the only ballot; and (4) if the outcome of this is a 'no union' vote, the Government must certify and enforce it. (And this is the point where the mandatory injunction against all union efforts is prescribed.)

"Any time there is a surplus labor pool from which an employer can hire at least token strike replacements, these four provisions, linked together, presumably can destroy a union." [Italics and parenthetical comment added.]

(Passing strange indeed that Business Week, and others, Fortune and Life included, should, after the election, tell the people what I had claimed throughout the campaign.)

3. Replacements can petition for election to obtain decertification of union A and probably succeed since they, by working are already in disagreement with union A.

4. Strike by union A becomes an unfair labor practice by virtue of Taft-Hartley law, section 8 (b) (4) (B) and (C), which provides:

"(b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents * * *

"(4) to engage in, or to induce or encourage the employees of any employer (including their own erstwhile employer) to engage in, a strike or a concerted refusal in the course of their employment to use, manufacture, process, transport, or otherwise handle or work on any goods, articles, material, or commodities or to perform any services, where an object thereof is: * * *

"(B) forcing or requiring any other employer to recognize or bargain with a labor organization (the decertified union) as the representative of his employees unless such labor organization has been certified as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9;

"(C) forcing or requiring any employer to recognize or bargain with a particular labor organization as the representative of his employees if another labor organization has been certified (by decertification election, at the petition of a new union formed by strikebreakers, or replacements, during a strike) as the representative of such employees under the provisions of section 9;" (italics and parenthetical comment added).

The precise effect of the Taft-Hartley law up to this point is to permit the struck employer (company A) to manipulate the decertification of the union of his old employees (union A). Thus a condition is created whereby the old union and its members commit an unfair labor practice if they even try peaceably to induce the strikebreakers to join them to hold up the wage scale.

The right to picket, take note of nonunion workers in order "to seek their acquaintance * * * visit them at their homes * * * and at all other suitable places, discuss with them the mutual benefits of the union, and the importance of their quitting work" was a nonenjoinable right recognized by the courts 44 years ago. Karges Furniture Company v. Amalgamated Wood Workers Local 131 (1905) 165 Ind. 421.

Thus the old employees are forbidden to exercise this early right, now outlawed by Taft-Hartley, but which was recognized even in the days when the yellow-dog contract was upheld as sacred.

But this is only a relatively minor and preliminary application of the Taft-Hartley law. It provides that (1) the exercise of this early right is an unfair labor practice after such decertification; and (2) that a complaint on such case "Shall be made forthwith and given priority over all other cases" and "the regional attorney * * * shall, on behalf of the Board, petition * * * for appropriate injunctive relief * * *," immediately. Thus without regard to merit, if the employer can procure pliant replacements, he can force the Government to enjoin even peaceful persuasion, picketing, boycotting, etc.

Now, there is the whole story involved in the subject posed by your Question No. 18. In short, by simply employing unemployed people, the employer can enlist the whole power of the Federal Government as a strikebreaking force. Perhaps, Mr. Wilson, you would never consent to do such a thing. But could you meet the competition of a concern who did employ this "gimmick" on a trend of rising unemployment? With the national debt we have today we must expand, not palsy our economy. You, as an enlightened businessman, know that purchasing power for your product comes from the earnings of the people at large, and the lack of that purchasing power will stagnate business. I fear, now, the effect on purchasing power the unreasonably high prices of the last 3 years may have.

I have three questions to ask you regarding this point:

1. Do you agree with my analysis?
2. If you do not, give me your analysis of all the provisions discussed.
3. Do you think the Taft-Hartley law is fair in this regard?

Your question No. 12

"12. Do you believe labor laws should make it unlawful for a union to compel an employer to engage in featherbedding; that is, to pay money for work which hasn't been done or won't be done? Yes. ☒ No. ☐"

Had you asked if I opposed featherbedding I would say "Yes." But I oppose a law forbidding such.

I oppose whisky. But I don't favor prohibition. We tried it.

But if I did favor outlawing featherbedding by labor, I'd have to favor similar restrictions on business.

Featherbedding means, as you indicate, the acquisition of pay for doing nothing. The laborer asks extra help or stand-by men, usually to spread the work and hence the pay.

Let me give you an example of featherbedding in industry and business. I am a stockholder (somewhat substantial for me, although really a comparatively small one) in one of your competitor corporations. It has never paid a dividend. I wrote, as a stockholder, (without disclosing my office) and asked to purchase a television set at factory price. I was advised that the retailer was entitled to his profit, hence, I must pay the full retail price. There is quite a difference, too.

I use considerable dictating equipment, purchased from the manufacturer, a representative of which admitted a mark-up of at least 600 percent. There must be some featherbedding in this, over and above a fair profit, especially in such a well-established business.

Last year I bought a radiophonograph. This year, with labor costs no less, I saw it advertised for less than 50 percent of what I paid.

1. Are these things not in the nature of getting pay for nothing?
2. What is your opinion as to whether or not, if featherbedding is to be outlawed, you would favor price fixing, at least, in cases of unconscionable profits by a well-established business?
3. Do you believe the problem is simple enough to regulate fairly in a free economy?

III—SECONDARY BOYCOTTS AND JURISDICTIONAL STRIKES

(Your questions No. 3 and 4)

"3. When two or more unions are fighting each other over who shall do a job or who shall represent the employees, and a strike is called to compel an employer to give to the members of one union the work or recognition being given to the other union—that is a jurisdictional strike. Should labor laws prohibit such strikes? Yes ☒ No ☐"

"4. Should labor laws prohibit secondary boycotts—that is, prevent an employer and his employees, where there is no labor dispute, from being damaged by a union seeking to coerce another employer having a labor dispute? Yes ☒ No ☐"

Jurisdictional strikes, where the employer is taking no sides in the primary dispute, should be prohibited. Jurisdictional disputes should be made subject to an appropriate election (in cases of plant or department representation; i. e., where permanent employees are selecting a union to represent them.

In case of different work of an intermittent nature for the same employer, as in craft trades, and particularly in construction, a far more serious and complicated question is presented.

Here, decisions, to be effective, must be reached with dispatch; else the question becomes moot, the work having been stopped or finished.

Nor does this type of dispute lend itself to a fair settlement by election among interested workers. Usually the employer is dealing with several crafts who belong to unions laying general claims to the disputed work. If craft A outnumbers craft B the election results would be a foregone conclusion and without much regard to the competence or skill of the parties in dispute.

The problem of skill might, standing alone, warrant the conclusion that the employer be the sole arbiter, but the opportunity to use this power to favor or destroy one union is a factor we cannot disregard if you ask us to legislate upon the subject. Stated otherwise, can you honestly ask us to say to the carpenters and the machinists, "Your historical jurisdictional dispute is handed to the employers for their decision."

Do you not see the tremendous bargaining power the employer would be thus handed by the law? Each group would be tempted to underbid the other in its bid for the employer's decision.

Nor does this mean that I do not appreciate the plight of the employer who desires to complete his work without being caught in the crossfire between two competing unions.

But over-all, this points up the pressure of conflicting interests in any legislation. Every man who comes before our Labor Subcommittee proclaims his undying faith in "free enterprise." I, for one, believe they all mean it, but most of them have blind spots when they view the prospects of free enterprise for the other fellow.

For example, let us take two measures. First, the Fair Labor Standards Act on which we are now holding hearings. Almost every witness agrees that a minimum wage is desirable in our economy. But it should not apply to the special circumstances of his own case. When we are impressed with those special circumstances (as we often are) and try to phrase the act to avoid his special case, we complicate the law almost beyond understanding. The employer complains that the regulations go too far. They protest in the name of the eighteenth century interpretation of the commerce clause. They say regulation is bad for the country. But the workers think these regulations are necessary.

Now, let's see the reaction of the parties to Taft-Hartley regulations. The positions change. Business has forgotten all about the commerce clause. Labor thinks the Government is going too far with regulations.

Naturally, but perhaps both are partly right and both partly wrong. We in Congress are supposed to be right.

I read this essential difference between the Taft-Hartley provisions and the administration proposals.

Under Taft-Hartley, the jurisdictional disputants were forbidden to strike, regardless of whether or not the Board had, or even could possibly, hear and make a decision in time to be applicable to the job in question.

Under the administration proposal, the jurisdictional strike is forbidden if the Board (or legal arbitrators) have decided the jurisdictional dispute. Until there has been a decision or award, the parties are not restrained by legal inhibition. This is not a complete remedy. However, some situations defy remedy. Is this such a situation? Let's test it by an example.

Take the case where crafts A and B contend for assignment of 10 days' work on building construction. Neither A nor B will yield. A hearing and determination within 10 (perhaps 30 or 60) days is impossible. Employer C awards the work to B. A either acquiesces or strikes, if the law permits. He has his day in court; true, a rugged court, the court of economic endurance.

But suppose the law forbids. A awaits the decision. Suppose A wins. Who should pay? Suppose further, both B and C were in good faith. Would they stand to be penalized? Or would it be fair to penalize either of them?

Remembering that the very purpose of the remedy is to avoid work stoppage, will you tell me how to fairly meet this problem?

True, we could avoid the entire stoppage, and the dispute, too, by simply making the employer the sole judge. In fact, all labor disputes could be thus stopped. But I don't believe either you or I want that sort of settlement. At least, it indicates the question is not as easy as the question itself suggests.

Do you agree?

A secondary boycott, where the second employer is not participating in the primary dispute, should be prohibited as an unfair labor practice.

1. What do you think should be the case where the employer is participating in the dispute?

As an example to illustrate: Employer A is struck. Employer B manufactures the same goods or furnishes the same service. Employer B takes over A's struck work. Taft-Hartley forbids B's employees from refusing to perform the struck work. But no law forbids B and A from agreeing that B undertake to do the struck work and thus starve out A's employees. The law permits this combination of the two employers but forbids a countercombination of the two groups of employees.

1. Do you deem this fair?

IV—FREE SPEECH

(Your question No. 7)

"7. Should labor laws give to both employees and employers the freedom to express their own points of view on employee relations problems—provided such views, or arguments, or opinions do not promise bribes or threaten reprisals? Yes ☒ No ☐"

No law, including the Wagner Act, ever denied the employer free speech. What the employer, the press, and many misinformed people have called denial of free speech was simply the application of the law of evidence. Example: The employer expressed his utter dislike for unions. Then he fired the union leaders—if for union activities, it was and is an unfair labor practice. At a hearing on this question; i. e., "Was the discharge because of union activity?" the employer used to hear his own words given in evidence as tending to prove his motive. The same rule of evidence applies in every field of jurisprudence, and did in the labor law until the Taft-Hartley Act provided (sec. 8–(c)) that, unless the statement contained a "threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit" that it should "not be evidence of" an unfair labor practice.

A man's expressed dislike of another has always been deemed competent and probative evidence of his motive when his conduct or treatment of the other person becomes the subject of judicial inquiry.

An excellent example of the application of this section is disclosed by the following quotation from the case of—

Intermediate report in the Matter of Greensboro Coco-Cola Bottling Co. and International Brotherhood of Teamsters, Chauffeurs, Warehousemen and Helpers of America, A. F. of L., Local 391—Case No. 34–CA–25

"CONCLUSIONS AS TO THE DISCHARGE OF HODGE

"Inasmuch as Hodge was discharged by Parker after obtaining approval from Carter, and immediately upon the conclusion of Carter's talk to the employees, it would normally be presumed that Carter's speech might throw some light on Hodge's discharge, and help to clarify Parker's charge that Hodge was 'dissatisfied,' a term which, without clarification, is vague and ambiguous. If, for example, and as the general counsel contends, this 'dissatisfaction' amounted to nothing more nor less than his activity in organizing the employees, it should be helpful in determing the respondent's motivation—the thing at issue—to know whether Carter expressed a dislike of unions or of union activity.

"Reasonable as this course might seem, and firmly rooted in legal precedent as it is, the undersigned is prohibited from following it by the language of section 8 (c) of the act. Not that he may not examine the speech and construe it. In fact he has done so. He has been impelled to do so because if it had appeared that its declarations were favorable to union organization, that the respondent, for example, preferred to deal with a collective-bargaining agent rather than with all its employees individually, that would be persuasive evidence that Hodge's discharge was not connected with his union activity and that the term 'dissatisfied' had reference to something else. And there would be no difficulty in using the evidence for such a finding. For section 8 (c) forbids only the use of views, arguments, or opinions, not associated with threats of reprisal, or force, or promise or benefit, as evidence of an unfair labor practice. In other words, the undersigned may use Carter's words for the respondent but not against the respondent, odd as such a result may appear to the lay mind.

"Actually, Carter's speech strongly opposed unions and the undersigned may not, therefore, use it in making a finding that Hodge was discharged immediately afterward, and without perceptible change of pace, in violation of the act. The finding hereinafter made, that Hodge was discharged because of his union activity, is based on other evidence entirely.

Do you believe a different rule should apply in labor relations?

V—CLOSED SHOP AND UNION CONDUCT TOWARD EMPLOYER

(Your questions Nos. 13, 16, 15, 5, 9, 10, 11, 14)

These questions are all related to the problem of the closed shop and the union's conduct toward the employer. Hence, they are all treated under this heading, and in the order set forth above, because they seem to me better related in that order.

(Your question No. 13)

"13. Should labor laws permit the forcing of an employer to hire only workers who belong to a given union? Yes ☐ No ☒

Of course, you know the law never required the employer to grant a closed shop. The question of the closed shop was a matter of bargaining. Taft-Hartley forbid the bargaining, or the bargain either. The question of the closed shop has been obscured in platitudes and epitaphs. The closed shop simply provides that the employer employ union men. You apparently oppose this. O. K.; but you want the Government to join you in opposition.

But let's examine the real issue. Is it not something of a question of free enterprise? Are you asking the Government to write for you the favorable provisions of your labor contracts?

Are not the employers, like they accuse the unions, trying to enlist governmental aid in winning at the bargaining table?

I cannot extend this letter to examine all the phases of the closed-shop question, but I think it only proper to point out a few of the obvious facts of industrial life.

Closed shops are not peculiar to labor. Recall I couldn't buy a television set from a company in which I have money invested. That company and the retailer have a closed shop. Do you have a similar closed shop?

Now let's take a very practical aspect of the question: When your company bargains with your employees it is not weakened by any factional stockholders' groups at the bargaining table. You, the management, present a solid front. It is natural that the union should seek like unity. It is to management's advantage that the employees be divided.

This is best illustrated by three quotations:

"A UNION SPEAKS

"The theory of the open shop as a permanent arrangement presupposes a stable balance of power as between the employer and the workers, if not a safe preponderance of power on the side of the former. It breaks down in practice as soon as one or the other party attempts to alter the balance. It breaks down when the employer feels himself sufficiently powerful to endeavor to rid himself of whatever restraints the activity of the mere presence of the organization imposes on his freedom. It breaks down, likewise, when the organization gains in power relative to the employer and uses this ascendancy to secure from him recognition for itself and concessions for its members that he would not voluntarily grant. In practice, therefore, the tendency of an open shop is either to degenerate into a nonunion shop or to develop into some form of union shop with union recognition or participation." Amalgamated Clothing Workers of America, the Clothing Workers of Chicago, 1910–22, page 330 (1922).

"AN EMPLOYER SPEAKS

"A rather frank employer speaking on a resolution before the New Idea Convention in 1921: 'It is unpopular to say you don't believe in the open shop, but I confess I do not quite know what the open shop means. To my mind it is a good deal of a question of a nonunion shop or unionized shop, and I hate to be a hypocrite under a resolution or anything else, or to vote or declare in favor of open shop when my own policy is not to carry that out, but to hit the head of the radical in my shop whenever he puts it up.'" Nation, 112: 529 (April 13, 1921).

AN EMPLOYERS' ASSOCIATION SPEAKS

That this thinking is not dead is illustrated by this very enlightening (though not enlightened) quotation from a 1948 Employers' Association Bulletin, "Anti-Union Campaigns":

"How far management can go in its efforts to keep a union out of its plant is something most employers would like to know a great deal more about."

Then this bulletin, sent to all employers in a great industrial state, proceeded to inform upon the subject. The executive secretary of this Employers' Association informed me that he favored unions. I had the bulletin in my pocket at the time. No, I didn't flash it on him.

But it is living proof to me that some men haven't yet changed too much. This is a factor which Congress must keep in mind if the laws it enacts are to be fair and effective.

In my opinion, the evils of the closed shop have been used as a pretext to create a divided front for labor at the bargaining table.

The closed shop has been abolished before. The Landis Commission once awarded an open shop in building construction at Chicago. The employers disdained the award within a few months.

Where I want to do so I could name employers who have entered into closed-shop contracts since Taft-Hartley, not from force, but because they prefer such. The watch-dog committee complained of such contracts calling them bootleg contracts.

But you will never stop labor's efforts to create for itself a single front to match the strength the employer finds in unity. In practice there is both justification and often abuses; abuses I will discuss under the last heading.

(Your Question No. 16)

"16. Do you believe labor laws should protect individual workers in the right to join or not to join a union—to remain or not to remain members—just as they individually wish? Yes ☒ No ☐"

The workers should have the right to contract with the employer that only those who bear their share of the expense of collective bargaining, and help sustain the employees' side be employed. This means union membership. I would not favor a law providing you had to agree to the closed shop nor that you couldn't.

However, I have been asked by a large union to support legislation retaining the Taft-Hartley union security election with the proviso that when the union won, union security would become a part of the contract by operation of law. I rejected the idea. It didn't fit my philosophy. But if you say the workers must twice win their right to bargain for union security shop, perhaps it is logical that, having won twice, the employer should not have a veto. I think the workers should have a say but when they select the bargaining agent, it should mean "the" not "one of many" bargaining agents. Again, remember the employer presents a unified front at the bargaining table. Here he asks the Government to forbid the union to bargain for a vital right; one sometimes important to its existence.

(Your question No. 15)

"15. Do you believe foremen and other supervisors could properly perform their management duties of serving the balanced best interests of employees, customers and owners alike, if the bargaining for supervisors by unions should be included in the labor laws? Yes ☐ No ☒"

I agree the foremen should not be permitted to belong to the production workers' union. But beyond that let's examine the point.

You speak of the foreman's obligation and loyalty to management. In that you are right. But is the foreman's contract of employment dictated by his and the company's loyalty to each other? Or is it a case of getting down to "the captain and the cook" where arm's length bargaining takes place? Remember there is just one company.

1. In your plant, how many foremen are there?
2. Doesn't one foreman loom pretty small across the bargaining table from General Electric?

(Your question No. 5)

"5. Should labor laws provide that an employer cannot deduct union dues or assessments from wages unless the employee gives his personal O. K.? Yes ☒ No. ☐"

Now we find the employer again advocating something he says will protect the worker—his employee. But coincidentally that proffered protection, if accepted, will also weaken the union. If the union has been selected as the bargaining agent, the workers should support it. Even Senator Taft agreed to this. But all sorts of devices are invented to discourage membership. Iowa required the wife's written consent. A double shot at an anti-union veto. I am sure many men are honest in advocating such a measure. But are they practical?

I am reminded of Justice Brown's comment in 1898 in the case of Holden v. Hardy (169 U. S. 366). Here the employer contended a Utah law providing an 8-hour day in the mines was unconstitutional. The opinion remarked rather dryly:

"It may not be improper to suggest in this connection that, although the prosecution in this case was against the employer of labor, who apparently under the statute is the only one liable, his defense is not so much that his right to contract has been infringed upon, but that the act works a peculiar hardship to his employees, whose right to labor as long as they please is alleged to be thereby violated. The argument would certainly come with better grace and greater cogency from the latter class."

I recognize abuses in the use of union funds. They are discussed under the last heading.

(Your question No. 9)

"9. Do you believe that labor laws should require both union officials and company officials to swear they are not Communists or Fascists or members of any party or organization which plans to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence? Yes ☒ No. ☐"

Again your question is misleading, if it is meant to sustain the Taft-Hartley law; inadvertently so, I am sure. The Taft-Hartley law does not require officials (union or corporate) to swear they are not anything. It denies legal remedies to the union if its officers do not swear they are not Communists or subversive.

Of course one is expected, from a political viewpoint, to support that section. It bears the label "anti-Communist." But I'll risk castigation to examine the provision and its effect.

What is the result of a union officer's failure to so swear. The employer can engage in unfair labor practice with impunity. The union can't get its case of unfair labor practices or question of representation before the National Labor Relations Board.

Strange is it not, that in every provision, said to be designed to protect the worker and to prescribe patriotism and honesty somehow by practical application, the employer stands to benefit. As in the case of the financial report, not one provision of the Taft-Hartley Act affords any remedy to the union member who demands an explanation of the prescribed financial report, to protect his rights against a dictatorial labor official, except to forsake his union. No provision for democratic government (by which to oust Communists and dictators in the American way) or a look at the books (without fear of capricious expulsion) if the union official is dishonest and all-powerful in the union.

Recently, J. Mack Swigert (author of Saturday Evening Post articles: October 25, 1947, The Taft-Hartley Law: Does It Really Hurt Labor? and October 30, 1948, Should We Repeal the Taft-Hartley Law?) and I debated the Taft-Hartley law before the Indiana State Bar Association. He said (and wrote) that if international union officials didn't swear to anti-Communist affidavits, or thus qualify, the locals could "secede." Brilliant idea, but wrong on two counts: First, legally a local cannot secede if the union constitution prohibits such, as they all do. (Martin v. Smith (1934), 286 Mass. 227; *Harris ex rel. I prefer to cleanse and preserve, not destroy, unions.

Secondly, the thought of secession illustrates the philosophy of the Taft-Hartley law. Every child that has read American history knows secession means destruction of the union.

(Your question No. 10)

"10. Do you believe labor laws should require unions to make appropriate reports to members and Government as to handling of funds—just as companies are required to make appropriate reports to owners and Government? Yes ☒ No ☐"

Here is a question very dear to my heart. I tried to get Members of the Seventy-ninth Congress to sponsor such legislation. I tried again in the Eightieth and with failure.

The Taft-Hartley law only adds the financial report as an added impediment to the union in presenting its bargaining claims to the employer and in prosecuting unfair labor practices.

Furnishing a financial report means nothing unless the examiner can also look at the books. Taft-Hartley does not provide the right to look at the books. Of course, we know this in inherent. But in practice how does it work?

Taft-Hartley does not provide a remedy if the worker is expelled for demanding a look at the books, or for any other reason, for that matter. I can cite you a local union president who announced he would demand, as a delegate to the international convention, an explanation of the following item in an international treasury report:

"Special organizing, $1,101,025.03." That's all.

He said he would ask who got the money and what the union got in return for it. A fair question I would think. Wouldn't you? He was expelled before he ever reached the convention floor. I successfully prosecuted his case for reinstatement to judgment in the civil courts.

I had also called this case to the attention of Congressman Hartley (March 12, 1947). Mr. Hartley answered me 7 months later, October 7, 1947. He wrote that the Taft-Hartley bill was now law and the man should file a complaint with the Labor Board. I immediately wrote back and asked Mr. Hartley to inform me what section or provision of the Taft-Hartley law afforded this man any remedy. Mr. Hartley never answered that question, dated 16 months ago. Can you give me the information? I have been unable to find where the law provided a remedy. It only immunizes the employer, in case of the failure to furnish a formal report. The union I am talking about always furnished reports which balanced, but there was a large embezzlement, which we proved when we went behind another report. But it took an expensive common-law remedy to procure a judgment reinstating the man who had the courage to raise the question. And that judgment is yet ineffective because it is on appeal, almost 3 years after expulsion. This man is entitled to a more efficient and reasonable remedy.

I have been about all the evils in unions there are to see and I favor remedying them by wholesome legislation, not by destroying the union and immunizing the employer that engages in unfair labor practices.

I would appreciate your comment upon these problems.

(Your question No. 11)

"11. Should labor laws make it clear that a collective-bargaining contract must be honored by both parties? And that each has an equal right to sue the other for breaking the contract? Yes ☒ No ☐"

J. Mack Swigert, a law partner of Senator Taft wrote in the Saturday Evening Post that there had been more nonsense written about this point than any other. Though he was my worthy adversary in a recent debate, I am forced to agree with him. Why? Because a union has always been suable. (See Duplex Printing Press Co. v., Deering (1921) 254 U. S. 443; Laylor v. Locwe (1915) 235 U. S. 522.)

The truth is the Taft-Hartley law favored the union member in this regard at least. It limited liability to the union treasury whereas previously the members own funds or property was subject to levy. Mr. Swigert also pointed this out, and I agree with his conclusion.

I sicken at the utter misunderstanding the public gets from such propaganda that only under the Taft-Hartley was the union suable. The facts are many suits are and were generally filed in connection with labor disputes. Few judgments are rendered because when the dispute is settled both sides quit lawing each other and went back to work. Not a bad idea.

(Your question No. 14)

14. Do you believe it should be unlawful for an employee to be prevented from working by the use of violence, force, or intimidation? Yes ☒ No ☐"

Certainly, I agree; and it is unlawful and always has been. I am also against sin. Of course, the same should apply to the employer, who in recent years has been less prone to violence than in the past, and always less prone than the employee. But the employee has never had a complete monopoly on violence though the employer usually acts by proxy.

The employee, however, lacking economic strength to match the employer, is naturally more prone to use violence as a substitute for economic power. Violence is foolish, ineffective and wrong; it always has been and should be forbidden to all men.

VI—UNION RESPONSIBILITY TO PUBLIC AND MEMBERS

(Your question No. 6)

"6. Do you believe labor laws should see to it that both employers and unions be required to bargain in good faith? Yes ☒ No ☐"

To this question I can say "Yes" without further comment.

(Your question No. 17)

"17. Should labor laws make clear that both unions and employers can now so affect the public for good or ill that the labor-management relations of both should be regulated equally by law? Yes ☒ No ☐"

Now we are getting to the meat of the question. In my experience with men no difference in basic characteristics have appeared, whether the man was trying to plow a straight furrow in a stumpy field with a balky mule; working at a factory bench or at the director's table, or perhaps even legislating in Congress; though my experience here is very limited.

In each case the man is trying to better himself, his place in society, perhaps financially; maybe socially, or in political preferment or in the esteem of his fellow creatures, or in all those respects.

But none are divinely anointed by virtue and few are utterly depraved.

Another thing pretty clear is that combinations of men whether corporate or union, spell power.

Furthermore, Government has but one rightful claim to exist; i. e., to protect its citizens from the unwarranted exercise of power from within or without its borders.

With those indisputable facts understood, how could any man deny that unions as well as corporations should be fairly regulated? The question is the fairness of the legal regulation, and that we in Congress refuse to "rook" one or the other. To avoid doing so we must be on our guard against propaganda emanating from those of greater experience than ours.

Such regutations should be as simple as clarity permits. They should leave as much to individual decency as experience warrants. But a government that fails to recognize the necessity when it exists and cries out for remedy, is a static government and has lost all claim to respect, or if it becomes too lax, to the support of its owners, the citizens.

With that in mind I shall answer your only remaining question.

(Your question No. 8)

"Should labor laws protect the employee against unfair practices by unions and management? Yes ☒ No ☐"

Of course. No combination should be permitted to crush the individual. But we must, as reasonable men, agree upon what should be unfair labor practices, and be fair in that determination.

Until the Railway Labor Act, I believe legal unfair labor practices were nonexistent. The employee was a pawn, almost an expendable material in the employer's hand. His only defense was unionization. He fought an uphill fight against the "yellow dog" contract. Only the Wagner Act fully outlawed the "yellow dog" contract. It prohibited the employer from wringing a promise from the employee not to organize. The law finally recognized that the employer's power was so great the worker was forced to sign by duress. Thus, the ancient common-law principle of duress was for the first time made applicable to the labor contract. Like the lender who was restrained by usury laws in dealing with the borrower, the employer was restrained in his absolute power by the Wagner Act. For a half century Congress and State legislatures struggled to enact such protective legislation. But the lawmakers were always thwarted by the courts.

Finally the courts recognized the evils.

In the meantime, unions had struggled to some positions of power in some crafts. Then their power increased. Their power was not, and never has been, (generally speaking), equal to the power of the employer. Wealth is power. No one knows that better than you. When people speak and write of the amassed wealth of unions, they think in terms of their own personal holdings, not in the terms of corporations having more assets and employees than there is wealth and population in many States. Statistics disclose that the combined treasuries of all international unions is about a quarter of a billion dollars. This is but a minor fraction of the wealth of any one of several corporations—one thirty-second the value of American Telephone & Telegraph Co. and the Metropolitan Life Insurance Co., and but one-fourth of your own company, General Electric.

However, the union's wealth and prestige is tremendous when applied to the individual, or individuals, in one local. Some union officials have wantonly abused this power of wealth and position, and such abuses affect the working terms and conditions of its members and their fellowmen of the same trade.

The Taft-Hartley law regulated, not the use, misuse, or abuse of this power, as directed against these individuals, but curbed that power as it was pitted against the greater power of the employer for the benefit of the individual member.

Taft-Hartley proponents have inveighed against the closed shop. But I challenge the closed union, from which stems much of the abuse. California has, by common law, decided that it is tortious to deny membership in a union which controls work in a craft or area. Thus the single front in collective bargaining is preserved; but the worker is not denied membership necessary to a job and protection on the job.

I have heretofore, and will again in the Labor Committee, advocate legislation to prescribe that union officers be elected, in fair elections; to prohibit an international officer from making a local captive and handle all its funds and negotiations, and conclude its contracts without submission of terms to a vote.

I suspect, Mr. Wilson, that you have not had experience with this particular type of abuse. But I have seen men in a captive local union working alongside men in a free local for 25 percent less wages. I won't say why it occurred that way. The fact that it occurred is enough. And when democracy was reestablished, the inequities ceased.

I have seen men expelled because they demanded decency in the union they needed and supported, and without effective remedy, Taft-Hartley claims notwithstanding; and Taft-Hartley remedies all the while nonexistent. Yet it was held up as a bill of rights for labor.

I have talked to union men, leaders, if you please, in as high a rank as president of internationals, all agreeing that remedies in these matters are long overdue. But they mortally fear any legislative move in this direction because it is upon these abuses that the architects of the Taft-Hartley "gimmicks" seized to justify their provisions: provisions which do not strengthen nor sustain decency, democracy, or justice in the unions; but which add further burdens to break them down. The workers in those few unions that abuse democratic processes would welcome legislation affording remedies. But they don't want their unions destroyed.

I know that many honest and sincere union leaders would welcome legislation, fairly designed, to:

1. Provide secret elections in local unions; including delegates to national or international conventions.
2. A remedy for fraud or duress in such elections.
3. A right for any member or body to look at or audit any of the union books.
4. Provisions regulating seizure and holding of captive locals; allowing only reasonable discipline of locals and members.
5. Remedies for capricious and fraudulent impoition of heavy penalties and prohibition against violation of the principles of due process of law generally.

Incidentally, all these rules are now the law of the land by common law. But the remedy is expensive, slow, and generally ineffective. A worker hasn't the means to pursue these remedies, nor to sustain himself while he waits for them. They should be codified and the remedy made more accessible to a man of moderate means.

For emphasis, let me repeat, Taft-Hartley set its provisions against the union leaders who stood staunchly for their members' rights in bargaining with a usually stronger entity, the employer. It ignored, in all practical respects the abuses of the union leader who oppressed his own members.

I sincerely hope both these errors will be corrected.

In closing, I wish to say to you, Mr. Wilson, that the problems upon which your questions are predicated are not as clear as those questions are transparent to one with a mite of experience. I doubt if you prepared them, or possibly comprehended their import and the mischief their leading effect might have. That they might mislead the people—since they were printed in daily newspapers—is obvious. And that they might affect Congress is possible. Hence, your responsibility in this regard is tremendous. It has been said that to whom much is given, much is expected. Therefore, I invite you to give us in Congress some broader and well-reasoned comment upon the subjects concerning which I have inquired.

None of us can know too much, even in that area of the broad field of legislation assigned to our committee, and even in that area we "fear a doubt as wrong."

For my part, I feel I know a little, yet far too little, about the subject of this letter. But, and you may find it difficult to believe this, I had no burning ambition to be a Congressman. And I believe I would not have sought the office had it not been for my interest in this subject, and a desire to help construct some fair legislation in the place of what I knew was unfair. That I am going to try. In so doing, I will probably incur enmity of some folks on both sides. Perhaps that will be the best proof that I am doing the right thing.

But in trying, I and my associates would be heartened by a more objective approach by men of your position and standing than by broadsiding us with a meaningless, or at least confusing, questionnaire ballot barrage. They are balanced by mail from the other side. You can't estimate logic by weighing your mail, or counting induced pros and cons.

One good logical letter, outlining facts, and pointing to specific and fair remedies, would help us more than a million questions marked by persons obviously confused by leading questions of great cleverness.

I trust you will accept this letter in the spirit intended and give me the benefit of your considered judgment upon these several matters.

Most sincerely yours,

ANDREW JACOBS,
Member of Congress, Eleventh Indiana District.

GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.,
New York, N. Y., February 25, 1949.

HON. ANDREW JACOBS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. JACOBS: I am sorry that, due to my having been away from my office, your letters of February 9 and 15 have just come to my attention.

It was our earnest hope that our questionnaire, dated January 21, would stimulate thoughtful consideration of the important issues involved in any revision of labor legislation. As we stated in our questionnaire, we were hopeful that the reexamination by all Americans, through our Congress, of these important issues would be both calm and thoughtful. Your 22-page letter is one of the most stimulating and extensive evidences we have seen along these lines.

I shall be most happy to accept your invitation to comment upon your views, and I am sure that every American citizen should appreciate your thoughtful consideration of all of the issues and information which you may receive on these matters, and which you are kind enough to indicate you will give to my comments. I will give you my answer as soon as possible. Naturally, I will want to consider carefully and thoughtfully the questions you have raised.

As you may know, I wrote the chairman of this Committee on Education and Labor and each of the members thereof on January 21, requesting that we be given an opportunity to be heard before such committee with respect to these matters. You may be interested to know that I have not as yet received any indication that our request will be granted or even that hearings will be held before the Labor-Management Act is repealed.

Very truly yours,

CHARLES E. WILSON, President.

CONGRESS OF THE UNITED STATES,
HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Washington, D. C., February 28, 1949.

Mr. CHARLES E. WILSON,
President, General Electric Co.,
New York, N. Y.

DEAR MR. WILSON: I thank you kindly for your response of February 25 to my letter of February 9, in which I responded to the questions you asked me by letter of January 21. I cannot, however, refrain from saying that I am sorely disappointed that you did not respond to a single question I asked you.

My knowledge of your views is as important as your knowledge of mine. After all, I must act in this matter.

Regarding your statement that you have not received any indication that your request to appear before our committee will be granted, may I point out that in my letter of January 26 to you, I stated that I would favor permitting your representative to appear before our committee. I now change my position. I have already served notice that I will insist upon your appearance. I trust that you will be prepared to help us at that time. Nor will we be able to cover the Taft-Hartley law with 18 questions. Give due consideration to the questions I asked you in my letter and you will have full opportunity to answer them before the committee.

Very truly yours,

ANDREW JACOBS,
Member of Congress, Eleventh Indiana District.

(The following correspondence, subsequently received and made part of the record of March 15, is inserted here to preserve continuity of the subject.)

GENERAL ELECTRIC CO.,
New York 22, N. Y., March 10, 1949.

HON. ANDREW JACOBS,
House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. JACOBS: A little over a week ago I wrote informing you that your letters of February 9 and 15, in comment in our labor law questionnaire, had just come to my attention and that I would furnish you our views as soon as possible. We have taken the liberty of setting forth at some length our opinions, as you have requested, which I hope are responsive to your very thoughtful and stimulating letter.

In view of the considerable thought you had obviously put into your letters and the importance of the issues and questions you discussed, I wanted our comments thereon to represent not only my own general opinion, reached after fuller consideration of your views and questions, but also the views of my associates who are more intimately familiar than I am with both the practical or operating aspects of these questions and with the technical aspects of the law. Accordingly, I am setting forth in this letter more or less briefly some views on each of the subjects covered in your letters and in our questionnaire, and I am then enclosing a more detailed discussion of the issues involved and the questions you have raised which has been prepared by the staff of Mr. L. R. Boulware, vice president in charge of employee relations.

It appears from your letter that we are more or less in accord as to objectives, that what we both seek in common with all good Americans are laws which will adequately protect the paramount interest of the public and are fair to the employees, unions, and employers. As you point out in your letter, "We can use all the help and wisdom available to enact a fair labor law."

Accordingly, I was somewhat disappointed when I realized that in reading our General Electric questionnaire, How Would You Revise Our Labor Laws?, you assumed that our questionnaire was devised to sustain the Taft-Hartley Act as such. I get this impression from most of your questions. Such an assumption is entirely unwarranted.

On the contrary, I agree fully—and in fact this was the very reason that prompted our questionnaire—with your suggestion for the need of an "objective approach to these important problems." I would like to suggest that you again read the introduction, conclusion, and suggestions contained in the box at the end of our questionnaire. An employer is rarely credited with objectivity in as emotional a field as employee relations present, but I can certainly assure you we used our best efforts to state these questions objectively and fairly. We supplied this questionnaire to each of our employees (including more than 125,000 members of our many unions) and to many of their neighbors. We hoped to encourage them to give thoughtful consideration to the individual ingredients making up the issues involved as distinguished from the too-prevalent emotional assertions.

You must, of course, be familiar with the ridiculous characterizations of the present law which have appeared in many union publications. I am sure that you do not feel that we, or anyone else, should not suggest that employees and their neighbors consider the basic questions involved. By our questionnaire we simply hoped to initiate some objective thinking which, if continued, would gradually make our employees and their neighbors proof against such obvious untruths, intemperate emotional appeals, and encouragement of class hatred as have continued to appear in the union press.

We are all human. The learned psychologists who have studied human beings quite accurately tell us that, despite our best intentions, we are often more persuaded by emotional factors than we are by our God-given reason. I believe that this present controversy about the Taft-Hartley law is a perfect example of that. Discussion of the Taft-Hartley law has tended too much to be in the area of sheer emotion. Too much significance has been attached to labels and too many epithets have been used, such as the "Slave-labor law" or the "Tough Heartless Act" or—on the other side of the fence—the "Save Labor Act" or the "Labor Emancipation Act." Too little calm and intelligent consideration has been given to this highly controversial measure by too many of us.

It seemed to us that the only intelligent thing for people to do was to forget the epithets, for the proposals to go back to some former and abuse-strewn phase of our labor legislation, and, instead turn our attention to a fresh attempt to create a more nearly perfect law in the public interest, based of course upon the experience we had had under present and past legislation and the evidence as to how well or how badly those laws have worked.

Accordingly, our aim in devising the questionnaire was in getting away so fas as possible from the emotional influences and stigmas attached to either the Taft-Hartley label on one side or the Wagner Act label on the other. We believed, just as we continue to believe, that it would be very helpful for all of us if we could reexamine the fundamental laws regulating the relations of employees, unions and management with each other and the public in the absence of emotional entanglements and solely on the basis of the really pertinent issues involved.

Accordingly, we selected what we thought were 18 of the more important questions that had been raised in the current discussions of the law up to the time the questionnaire was issued. We put considerable effort on preparing a questionnaire which would be as objective and impartial as possible and yet would be susceptible to a "yes" or "no" answer. Our best advice had been that it was necessary to have this simple question and answer type in order to get interest and response.

In this complicated field it would be difficult to devise a series of questions that would adequately cover all of the aspects of the problem in detail. We make no pretense of having done anything more than attempt to initiate some interest and then get public reaction on a few of the important issues under consideration.

You have suggested that the questions involved cannot be completely answered by a "yes" or "no" answer. Your feeling that categorical answers to our questions are difficult to make without qualification would be equally true no matter how the questions had been framed and equally true of any equally complex subject. I think the presentation of issues in such a simplified way for public expression lies at the very root of our democratic system, otherwise no one but experts would ever be allowed to vote. After all, there is no greater simplification—I might say oversimplification—than that which is basic to our American Government itself: The act whereby the people in the solitude of the voting booth resolve all the different issues pro and con into a choice between two candidates for President—or even for Congress.

In preparing our questionnaire, we were entirely mindful of the value of comments. It was for these reasons that we suggested that people "add any comments" they might have on our questions "and any others" they might have. I agree with you that "good logical letters, outlining facts, and pointing to specific and fair remedies" would in many cases help all of us, in and out of Congress, more than mere "yes" and "no" answers to any questions. Fortunately, a great many people have, I understand, made ample comments on the questionnaire itself and many, many more have written letters prompted by the questionnaire.

Your first answer in your letter to me illustrates a common difficulty with comments where it quotes a previous statement of yours in response to a "labor questionnaire" as being applicable to our questions one and two. You then say that "this response illustrates how it categorically would not clearly disclose one's opinion to a single question." I respectfully suggest that if you reexamine these questions it is quite clear that the questions as phrased are clearly capable—and fairly so—of "yes" or "no" answers. Possibly it would be desirable—but not necessary—for an unusually informed person to expand his answers and to go into the ramifications of the issue. But after reading your expanded answer, I confess I do not clearly understand your position.

Nevertheless you will note that we asked people to add their comments and further questions, so that any persons interested in amplifying their "yes" and "no" answers were clearly encouraged to do so. However, it seemed to us that the expression of a view as to the principles involved was the important starting points and accordingly we attempted to encourage and stimulate public interest in those principles.

The average individual naturally feels that the intricacies and the technical involvement in constructing legislation must be worked out by the members of Congress. Few ordinary individuals could be expected to have the necessary background knowledge or experience to be able to make any worth-while contribution to some of the more complex aspects of the issues that must be considered in drafting the actual legislation. But certainly that is no reason a citizen should be deprived of an opportunity to express his opinion.

I hope that more of your associates in Congress, as well as all people out of Congress irrespective of their present opinions, will give these important questions greater consideration. If our questionnaire helps to encourage any of your associates in Congress and some other citizens to give as extensive and thoughtful expressions to their congressional representatives as your letter to me on these important issues, we have exceeded our greatest hopes of encouraging consideration of these matters in the public interest.

I will now try to set forth briefly our views on the 18 individual questions inasmuch as our questionnaire made no attempt to disclose them and your letter indicates you would like to have them.

I will mark the answer boxes as you did in your letter, and indicate thereunder my understandings of your views on the basic issues involved, as expressed in your letter, and the areas of apparent agreement, of disagreement, or of my uncertainty as to your views on such principal issues. In the attached staff memorandum your comments and questions will be considered in very much more detail.

1. Do you believe that labor laws should, in general, preserve the employee's right to strike? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

We have always believed and, of course, still do, that the right of the working man to strike should be jealously guarded—and that it should be curtailed only where the consequences of a strike to the many are out of all proportion to the issues involved for the few. Accordingly, we check "Yes" here.

You also agree that the labor laws should, in general, preserve the employee's right to strike. But you would apparently limit the right to strike much more severely than does the Taft-Hartley law, as you apparently suggest an exception to this general right in any case of industry-wide strikes.

2. Do you believe labor laws should give the President of the United States the right to seek, through courts of law, to delay a strike that would cause a national emergency endangering the health and safety of the entire country? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

I believe what present power the President has to protect the Nation from strikes that threaten the national health and safety mus not be weakened. Since General Electric operates the great plutonium plant for the AEC at Hanford, it naturally watched with concern during the Atomic Energy labor dispute at Oak Ridge last year, in which the President felt he needed all the teeth in the present law and used all six steps the law contemplates. Not only for atomic energy, but in other vital industries, the public interest must have effective protection.

It has been proposed, I believe, in the bill which you are now considering as a committee member that the Nation's labor law contain no provisions to delay or stop national emergency strikes other than a Presidential remonstrance or proclamation begging the cooperation of the disputants in refraining from a work-stoppage as affecting the Nation's welfare.

There is nothing in this proposal to make the disputants accede to the President's request or to accept the investigating Board's subsequent solution. I believe there is no way set forth in the proposed bill to obtain through the courts an injunction to block the strike, and I understand it is all too doubtful if the President possesses any powers of enforcement. In hort, the proposal is that public opinion will be able to stop or defer a national emergency strike.

Under the Railway Labor Act, this sort of public opinion provision has been in existence for several years. According to the latest report of the National Mediation Board (New York World-Telegram, January 31, 1949) which administers this act, it is close to a break-down. In the opinion of the Board's members, it has become weak and ineffective.

This experience demonstrates that any effective labor law must contain adequate specific means—through the judicial process—for enjoining promptly any national emergency strikes. Such a vital point should not be left in the realm of speculation. The labor law should clearly embody proper specific powers for the Chief Executive to use when the power or public opinion shall have failed along with any other means available. Doubt should be dissipated.

So, to the second question, "Should the labor laws give the President of the United States the right to seek, through courts of law, to delay a strike that would cause a national emergency," the answer is "Yes."

We believe firmly with you in the considerations you set forth in your own answer regarding the limitations necessary in special emergency situations to avoid destruction of our free economy. We are particularly pleased that you see so clearly what many do not see, that "a controlled economy inevitably results in socialism, communism, fascism, or some form of state monopoly * * * (with eventual) forfeiture of personal liberty to entrenched officials." We are against compulsory settlements, as we assume you to be from the tenor of your questions. We hold to no particular program for protecting the public in such emergencies, except that adequate compulsory delay should be promptly available and legally effective. Along these lines, we do not feel that the present powers of the President to protect the public should be weakened, since in the past he has felt he needed at least these and has used them all.

I don't believe you stated your views as to whether or not the President should have such a right to delay national emergency strikes. We can conceive of industry-wide strikes that might not be of real national emergency proportions and, on the other hand, a national emergency strike need not be an industry-wide one. In view of this and in view of the present controversy about his power, I believe the President should have a clearly defined statutory right, subject to appropriate statutory limitation, to seek any necessary court action to delay national emergency strikes that would otherwise endanger the health and safety of the country.

3. When two or more unions are fighting each other over who shall do a job or who shall represent the employees, and a strike is called to compel an employer to give to the members of one union the work or recognition being given to the other union—that is a jurisdictional strike. Should labor laws prohibit such strikes? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

You agree that jurisdictional strikes should be prohibited where the employer is taking no sides in the primary dispute. In the case of "different work of an intermittent nature for the same employer, as in craft trades and particularly in construction," you seem to assume that a given self-ordained group has somehow got a clear, inherent, exclusive right to do certain types of work. Do you really believe this? Remember, you have got immediately to face the fact that such a given group has not been able, despite constant effort over a great period of years, to establish that right with others—establish it even with other sister unions or with any top tribunal over this group of unions.

You say you appreciate the plight of the employer who wants to complete his work without getting caught in the cross-fire of two competing unions, but shrug off this whole consideration with "some situations defy remedy." Does not the innocent bystander deserve protection? In this case it is not the employer, but ultimately the public that must pay and should be protected.

It is true that employers and labor have changed their constitutional philosophy on the desirable degree of Federal intervention, depending on the matter at hand. So have all other groups of Americans, including Congressmen of all persuasions. Yet in this matter you yourself agree on Federal intervention, admitting that what you support is "not a complete remedy." Our difference here is not over the desirability of Federal action against jurisdictional strikes, to which

I see no justification for an employer becoming involved in the primary dispute between the disputing unions if there is an effective and adequate prohibition and legal remedy against jurisdictional strikes. I do not seek to have the employer be the arbiter between the two unions. I only want some place the employer can go and find a qualified and disinterested government representative who can come and settle the dispute equitably as between the parties and in the public interest. This settlement is usually not really hard to achieve, and it can usually be effected a week or a month ahead of the need for the actual work being done. Such Government aid in settlement need be sought, of course, only after any voluntary or interunion procedures fail.

Apparently we agree that the answer to this question should be "Yes."

4. Should labor laws prohibit secondary boycotts—that is, prevent an employer and his employees, where there is no labor dispute, from being damaged by a union seeking to coerce another employer having a labor dispute? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

You state that secondary boycotts should be prohibited, where the second employer is not participating in the primary dispute. We agree.

We also agree that where there is a community of interest in the question at issue, clearly demonstrated for instance by an employer taking over work from another's struck plant in obvious effort to assist the struck employer to fight his battle with the union, a strike or boycott against such work should not be prohibited. Incidentally, we don't believe this is properly to be called a secondary boycott at all, but a primary boycott.

I understand that the present law has been so interpreted as to treat a case, where the second employer is participating in the primary dispute, as a primary strike rather than a secondary boycott. I believe this is proper. Apparently, we agree, that the answer to this question should be "Yes."

5. Should labor laws provide that an employer cannot deduct union dues or assessments from wages unless the employee gives his personal O. K.? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

There seems to be little quarrel with the proposition that a man's take-home pay should not be expended in whole or in part for him unless the wage earner authorizes such an expenditure of his money. There do not seem to be any serious complaints by employers or unions as to continuation of the voluntary check-off.

I don't believe you express any opinion in your comments as to whether or not an employer should be prohibited from deducting union dues or assessments from the wages of his employees without the employee's consent and authorization. In your comments on this question, and particularly in your comments on question 10, you indicate that you are fully cognizant of the abuses that sometimes occur in the handling of union funds, amounting in some cases to outright embezzlement and failure, in the one case you mention, to account for more than $1,000,000. I believe it is better to let an employee decide for himself—on the basis of how he feels the union is handling its funds—whether or not he wants deductions made from his wages and paid into such funds, particularly in the light of your rather shocking revelations of the misuse thereof. What we want is good unions, and this hold by its members on a union's purse strings tends to make the union officials responsive to the members' will. I feel that the proper answer to this question is "Yes."

6. Do you believe labor laws should see to it that both employers and unions be required to bargain in good faith? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

I am pleased to see that you feel that both employers and unions should be required to bargain in good faith, particularly since I understand that neither the Thomas bill (S. 249) now under consideration in the Senate, nor H. R. 2032 introduced by the chairman of your committee, and on which hearings are being held, nor the Wagner Act contain any requirement that the union bargain in good faith. I certainly agree with your answer of "Yes." I am told that you have voted twice in favor of a resolution to restore the Wagner Act without change and only thereafter to hold hearings on Wagner Act amendments "consistent with the proposal made by the President." I hope your letter indicates that you are going to reconsider your earlier position.

7. Should labor laws give to both employees and employers the freedom to express their own points of view on employee relations problems—provided such views, or arguments, or opinions do not promise bribes or threaten reprisals? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

Since you state that no law ever denied free speech to the employer, and since your further comments appear to be concerned with the conditions under which some or all of any statements are allowed as evidence, I gather that you are in favor of the law giving both employees and employers clearly the freedom to express their own points of view, as asked by this question. Apparently we agree that there should be no material denial of the right to such expressions and that the answer to this question should be "Yes."

It would seem that there could be no other answer to this question than one which strongly confirms the right of both employers and unions to speak freely on all subjects to anyone who is willing to hear them, provided that no promises of benefit in the form of bribes or other inducements nor any threats of reprisals are made.

8. Should labor laws protect the employee against unfair practices by unions and management? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

Regardless of whether abuses are from the employer's side or from the union's side, the employee must be protected. There should be no quarrel on this score.

You state that "of course" the labor laws should protect the employee against unfair practices by unions and management, but that we must, as reasonable men, agree upon what should be unfair labor practices, and be fair in that determination. We agree. The answer to this question should be "Yes."

9. Do you believe that labor laws should require both union officials and company officials to swear they are not Communists or Fascists or members of any party or organization which plans to overthrow the Government of the United States by force and violence? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

Not only as a private employer, but as a contractor for the Atomic Energy Commission, we believe the labor law should require affidavits of both company and union officials and bargaining representatives that they do not belong to the Communist Party or to any party which plans, teaches, or advocates the use of force or violence to overthrow the Government of the United States. One would have to be naive indeed to think the affidavit could solve the Communist problem some unions apparently have. But we believe we see, at various places, some examples of members in unions having been aided—by the non-Communist affidavit requirement—in making progress toward purging their unions of Communist leadership.

Certainly, the very wonder by union members at some officials' refusal to sign has led to a great deal of new local consideration of the national problem. In a great many cases they have elected new officers where the determining factor seemed to be the belief of the membership that it would be getting new leadership with less Communist taint or certainly with less public suspicion of that taint.

You state that you desire "to cleanse and preserve, not destroy unions." I certainly agree. I go further, and have so testified before the Senate committee, and recommend that this provision be extended and made applicable to all officers and bargaining representatives of both labor organizations and management. Apparently, while you are in favor of cleansing the unions, you do not approve of the effect under present laws of failure to file the so-called non-Communist affidavit. We think the affidavit is helping to cleanse unions.

Secretary of Labor Tobin has testified in the Senate hearings that he believes a law should be passed, making it a crime for a union official to be a Communist. This is a drastic suggestion. But there are those who are more violently shocked by a simple provision obligating union leaders to swear they are not Communists if they are to have access to NLRB.

I would not favor the elimination of the present remedial provision unless and until some other at least equally appropriate method of dealing with this problem is enacted. I feel this question should be answered "Yes."

10. Do you believe labor laws should require unions to make appropriate reports to members and Government as to handling of funds—just as companies are required to make appropriate reports to owners and Government? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

Filing with the Government and their members information as to manner of operation, income and expenditure—cannot but be an aid toward healthier self-government by unions and instill a sense of responsibility.

You mention that this question is dear to your heart and you describe your unsuccessful efforts to get the Seventy-ninth and Eightieth Congresses to sponsor such legislation. I agree fully with you as to the desirability of such legislation and am curious as to whether you or any other member of the Eighty-first Congress has offered a bill or an amendment to H. R. 2032, to accomplish this. I also agree with your suggestion that the present law does not go far enough and provide for inspection of books, etc., but I don't understand why you have voted to eliminate even the first step taken in the present law unless you are intending to offer a stronger substitute. We agree that this question should be answered "Yes."

11. Should labor laws make it clear that a collective-bargaining contract must be honored by both parties? And that each has an equal right to sue the other for breaking the contract? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

As President Truman said in November 1945, "if we expect confidence in agreements made, there must be a responsibility and integrity on both sides in carrying them out."

Those who object to such a provision seem mainly concerned as to whether the Federal or State courts are the proper forum. Actual practice under the present law which has such a provision for suits in it has shown, according to the watchdog committee, that there have been only 45 actions of this nature, and, to date, not one has gone to judgment. Like so many other provisions of the labor law, it may seldom or never have to be utilized, but there is assurance in its existence.

You assert that unions have always been suable. Yet you must recognize the legal impracticability of suits in many States, although you have stressed the inadequacy of present legal remedies in the case of members seeking protection against their unions. If unions have always been suable, why not state so clearly in the law and make the remedy prompt and practical?

We agree with you and Mr. Swigert that a lot of nonsense has been written about this point, and I fear about many others in the present law. I am unable to determine from your comments whether or not you feel both parties to a contract should be required to live up to it and that each should have a remedy for breach thereof. I infer that you favor the provision in the present law insulating union members from suit but making union assets liable to suit if there has been a breach of contract. If so, I agree. I feel that this question should be answered "Yes."

12. Do you believe labor laws should make it unlawful for a union to compel an employer to engage in featherbedding; that is, to pay money for work which hasn't been done or won't be done? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

I am glad you oppose featherbedding. I agree. But I cannot go along with you in your opposition to a law forbidding what you admit is wrong. In view of our own experience and in the absence of any convincing explanation of your position, I feel that this question should be answered "Yes."

Let me briefly tell you of an experience of ours. In the fall of 1947 when General Electric was installing a turbine for the Consolidated Edison Co. at the Sherman Creek station, the local union of steamfitters and plumbers claimed that certain piping which had been done by the factory was a part of their work. The union took the position that this piping work should have been removed by them and then reinstalled by them at regular rates, or the company would have to make a payment of approximately $700 which represented the amount of wages in question. The General Electric Co. wanted to make an issue of this matter but the customer felt it unwise to do so. Faced with the threat that work on the project would have been stopped, thereby causing great loss and inconvenience to the public and to the Edison Co., because of the serious need of this turbine, it was decided to pay the amount in question and not risk a work stoppage.

The whole secret of our ever-higher American standard of living is in production. To the degree that we restrict or limit real production with "made" work we restrict and limit and lower that standard of living.

Featherbedding is morally bad and economically feeble-minded. The reason it needs to be prohibited by law is because the employer and union at the bargaining table are so frequently far from being equally matched.

13. Should labor laws permit the forcing of an employer to hire only workers who belong to a given union? ☐ Yes. ☒ No.

This question brings us to the broad topic of compulsory unionism, and specifically to the problem of the closed shop.

The present Federal law prohibits the closed shop. I am told that 21 States have declared the closed shop and various forms of compulsory unionism to be against public policy. Only severe abuses under closed-shop practices could have brought about all this legislation.

The closed shop is a denial of basic human rights. It is necessary to hear only one of the many stories of wrongs done to individuals to illustrate the point that the closed shop is contrary to our basic American concept of freedom and protection of the individual right of personal choice.

The closed shop can mean expulsion from a given skilled trade and extended permanent loss of livelihood for an individual who happens to be out of sympathy or out of step with the majority or perhaps just the ruling clique in his union. The argument "Doesn't the closed shop seem justified in order to preserve union solidarity?" overlooks the fact that, both under the Wagner Act and the present law, the union is the exclusive bargaining representative when selected by only a mere majority of those voting in a representation election.

To the question, "Should there be a closed shop?" my answer is "No."

I wish you had expressed your opinion on this important question of the closed shop. I had rather assumed from your comments on question 8, that "No combination should be permitted to crush the individual," your comments on questions 1 and 2, indicating that you disfavor Government control over wages and prices, your comments on question 17 indicating "that combinations of men, whether corporate or union, spell power," and the need for fair regulations of unions as well as of corporations, that you would not favor legalizing the return of this restrictive type of organization.

Your comments on this question, although not stating your position specifically with respect thereto, seem to indicate that you favor the closed shop, with proper regulation, but not the closed union. The papers reported that a witness for one of the oldest and most traditional closed-shop unions in the country, in testifying recently before the Senate Labor Committee indicated how effectively the closed shop is used to affect prices and regulate commerce in the industry in which they work. I judge that if you should favor legalizing the closed shop you would insist on close regulation to prevent the abuses to which it is subject—abuses not only restrictive of the freedom of individuals, but also abuses through restrictions on competition and price. I oppose removing the prohibition on the closed shop for the very reasons, among others, you have seemed to indicate in your comments on other questions. I infer that we probably do not agree as to the answer to this question, although you do not state your views specifically.

The closed shop begins by being wrong in its power over the individual employee and the employer. But that soon fades into insignificance as the power increases over a trade or a community or a city government or an industry.

14. Do you believe it should be unlawful for an employee to be prevented from working by the use of violence, force, or intimidation? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

I am glad to see that you feel it should be unlawful for an employee to be prevented from working by the use of violence, force, or intimidation. We agree the answer to this question is "Yes."

General Electric has had experience in this area.

In Schenectady, in 1946, salaried workers, not members of the union on strike and not even included in the bargaining unit, were forcibly prevented from going to work by means of picketing and violence, in defiance of a court order which the Schenectady police force said they could not enforce.

It seems to me, on the evidence, that the labor law should contain provisions that will quickly and effectively stop such violence, which has not been a General Electric experience alone. The Allis-Chalmers strike is of too recent and painful memory. In the past, this kind of violence has continued until it has either gained its point or been eradicated by counterviolence or other measures. Invariably, however, the Federal Government's prohibition against it comes at a time when it is only a memory. The labor law should provide the Labor Board with power to take quick and incisive action where warranted.

15. Do you believe foremen and other supervisors could properly perform their management duties of serving the balanced best interests of employees, customers, and owners alike, if bargaining for supervisors by unions should be included in the labor laws? ☐ Yes. ☒ No.

Supervisors are management. If they are unionized their unions are likely—as shown in the congressional hearings conducted a couple of years ago and in the Senate hearings 2 weeks ago—to become associated with, collaborate with, and even be dominated by, unions representing the working force that they are supposed to lead and manage. The spirit and effectiveness of management goes and the foremen are no longer useful to the employees and to others as mangement.

You state that you feel that foremen should not be permitted to belong to the production workers union. I agree. You apparently have some question, without expressing your opinion, as to foremen's unions, provided they are not a part of the production workers' unions. Whatever may be the theoretical attractions of independent foremen's unions with compulsory bargaining powers, I believe that once in such unions, the foremen will then almost surely begin to be brought under the dominance of the much more powerful unions of the people they are supposed to supervise. I feel this question should be answered "No."

16. Do you believe labor laws should protect individual workers in the right to join or not to join a union—to remain or not to remain members—just as they individually wish? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

First of all, General Electric believes the individual should be protected in his right to join or not join a union. Secondly, he should be protected—if so-called union security clauses are to be permitted—in having at reasonable intervals, the opportunity to implement his decision to remain or not to remain a member. Above all, the individual should be protected against excessive admission or dues requirements or expulsion for any reason other than nonpayment of dues.

I do not believe you answered the questions as to whether or not you feel the law should protect an individual worker's right to join or not to join a union, or to remain, or not to remain, a member, although you indicate you do not agree with the prohibition in the present law against the closed shop with respect to which I have already expressed my views under question 13. You indicate that you do not favor the union shop election provision of the present law. I agree. I certainly commend you upon your decision not to supprt the request made on you by a large union to support compulsory union shop. I believe this freedom to join or not join—remain or not remain—is one of the best ways of insuring a strong union, and strong for good reasons, because of the responsiveness of the officers to the membership. I feel this question should be answered "Yes."

On the question of a compulsory union shop I question whether it is fair to keep a man from earning a living at a particular plant because he disagrees with the majority as to a union. Here again I believe the presence or possibility of free riders is worth all the lack of dues costs the other members, because the union management will be so much more responsive to the membership. Nor do I understand the fear that individual voluntary assignment of dues will not be made by union members. The question seems to assume that unions should be strong at any cost, whether they are good or bad in the opinion of their members. We would assume that a union its members thought good would get its dues by voluntary assignments, while a union its members thought bad would have to mend its ways. My observations lead me to believe members will support their union even when they have considerable doubt as to the probity of what's going on.

17. Should labor laws make clear that both unions and employers can now so affect the public for good or ill that the labor-management relations of both should be regulated equally by law? ☒ Yes. ☐ No.

It is conceivable that several years ago the answer to this question might have been "No." It is an indication of our progress that today most everyone would be likely to answer "Yes."

You state "combinations of men, whether corporate or union, spell power." You also indicate that it is Government's primary duty to protect the citizens from the unwarranted exercise of power from within or without its borders and "that unions as well as corporations should be fairly regulated." Apparently we agree.

18. Should labor laws provide that a striker who has been replaced in the course of an economic strike—not involving any unfair labor practice—be permitted to vote in an election to choose a bargaining agent at the conclusion of the strike? ☐ Yes. ☒ No.

I have understood that the principle involved here originated under the Wagner Act and was contained under the Taft-Hartley Act, namely, that a purely economic striker, once he has been permanently replaced in the absence of any unfair employer practice, is no longer entitled to reinstatement. Hence as a logical result, the present law provides that he is not entitled to vote in an election to determine who shall represent those who are the employees.

You suggest that this rule, developed under present and past laws as indicated, may unduly curtail the right to strike. I can't believe that any such combination of circumstances, as you have assumed in your hypothetical case, could ever result in the possibilities you indicate. Needless to say, an employer should not be—and I am informed under the present law he is not—permitted to take advantage of anything in this provision by inviting a rival union into the plant or by "manipulating the decertification" of a union or by engaging in any other unfair practice to defeat the right of his employees to freely choose their representatives. Those who are more able to weigh all these possibilities discuss your fears more completely in the attached staff report. After weighing what seems to me the practical considerations and the equities involved in this question, I believe the fair answer to be "No."

I think the current reexamination of the present laws regulating the relations of employees, unions, and management with each other in the public interest is an extremely desirable thing. Calm and deliberate reexamination of any law at any time based on factual experience rather than emotional assertions is always a good thing and is always in the public interest. I am particularly in favor of public reexamination of the present law, however, because I think that any intelligent and calm examination of the issues involved will have a tremendously beneficial effect in achieving better understanding by individual members of the public with respect to the elements in that law.

I again wish to emphasize that the purpose in issuing our questionnaire was to encourage people to take a fresh look at some of the issues involved in any revision of our present labor laws.

As I stated before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare, we believe an objective fresh appraisal of each of the ingredients of the present Labor-Management Relations Act will indicate that, although it is a good law and contains a great many important advances in the public interest which need to be retained there may very well be need for two types of revision:

First of all, careful attention should be given to any specific instances in which the law is claimed to have actually operated unfairly against unions, employees, employers, or the public.

Secondly, careful attention should be given to those instances in which the law needs to be strengthened, in order to prevent certain abuses which still are prevalent and which are not adequately provided for under the present law. The law should provide better protection against violent and coercive mass picketing, for example, against featherbedding practices and especially against restrictive practices such as have been effectuated through the use of secondary boycotts, closed shops, jurisdictional strikes, and the like. We have already testified before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare as to some of our own direct experiences with such abuses, and we will be glad, at your pleasure, to discuss them further with you.

In closing, I want to say that I was rather interested after rereading your letter several times to note how really closely we apparently were in our thinking on even the specific issues involved, as well as the objectives. I have appreciated the very stimulating letter which you have written, and I am glad that you had it reprinted in the Congressional Record, since any intelligent expression of views should be welcomed by all of us—whether or not we are in full agreement with the views expressed—as an aid to better understanding which in turn is bound to result in a drawing together ultimately of the thinking of all sincere students of these problems.

I shall regard it as a pleasure to see you shortly in our proposed appearance before the House Committee on Education and Labor.

Very truly yours,

C. E. WILSON, President.

MEMORANDUM OF L. R. BOULWARE, VICE PRESIDENT IN CHARGE OF EMPLOYEE RELATIONS DIVISION, GENERAL ELECTRIC CO., RELATIVE TO CONGRESSMAN ANDREW JACOBS' LETTER OF FEBRUARY 9, 1949, ON LABOR LEGISLATION

Mr. Wilson has indicated briefly his answer to each of the questions included in our questionnaire, and has added his comments on Mr. Jacobs' views as expressed in his letter. In this memorandum, as Mr. Wilson has indicated, the employee relations staff discusses in somewhat greater detail Mr. Jacobs' comments and questions.

The following comments follow the order set out in Mr. Jacobs' letter, with references to the page numbers of his letter and to the question numbers of our questionnaire, How Would You Revise Our Labor Laws? indicated in each instance.

RIGHT TO STRIKE AND NATIONAL EMERGENCY STRIKES

(Mr. Jacobs' pages 1–2; our questions 1–2)

Mr. Jacobs believes, as we do, that a fair labor law must, in general, preserve the right to strike; further, we are in accord that such a law must contain some substantial measure of protection for the public from strikes which could wholly disrupt the national economy or an important segment of it.

Mr. Jacobs' statement of his views does not make his position clear to us as to the means whereby these objectives are to be achieved. In this most recent and controversial field concerning national emergency strikes, the wisest policy to follow would seem to be that of experience. Experience under the presently existing procedures has been, on the whole, successful. We do not know that any substantial claim has been made that the emergency procedures have been either abused or have been ineffectual. Until experience demonstrates that these procedures have either improperly limited the right to strike or have failed to give the Nation the protection it requires and deserves, we should proceed with caution before discarding them. Consistent with this thought it appears that the provision in the present law providing for submitting the employer's last offer to the vote of the membership adds little, if anything, to the solution of the problem. Experience having demonstrated its lack of value, it might well be discontinued.

Mr. Jacobs is seemingly willing to take action to curb industry-wide strikes. His quotation, however, is not quite clear as to whether he would limit this to instances where the strike occurs in what he is one place terms a "vital" industry. If he is willing to prohibit all "industry-wide strikes" he goes much further than the present law provides. He also seems to be searching for some procedue and some definition which, in advance, could cover all possible strikes which might seriously affect the national economy. It is our opinion that any atempted definition of "vital industry" or "strikes affecting the national economy" phrased in advance, is likely to be either too broad in prohibiting strikes or too narrow in protecting the public. The wisest course would seem to be to provide clear statutory power to seek compulsory delay, as now, for a factual appraisal by competent authority of each critical strike at the time it is threatened, leaving the precise remedy undertermined in the event the threat continues beyond the legal delay period.

In view of the present controversy as to whether or not the President has a right in the absence of statutory authority to delay national paralysis strikes, as a minimum measure in the public interest it would seem necessary that any adequate labor law give the President a clearly defined statutory right to seek any necessary court action to delay national emergency strikes that would otherwise endanger the health and safety of the country. Doubt should be dissipated.

As to his specific questions at the bottom of page 2, the following are our comments:

(1) He asks for proposals for dealing with the case of a threatened strike after expiration of the legal delay period. The only experience we have under legislation providing for a specifically invoked delay period, indicates that only in some rare instance will the threat of a national emergency strike continue beyond this period. Consequently, he has asked a question which would call for an answer based on theory and speculation rather than experience. It is our thought that there is no set formula for dealing with all possible situations which may arise. Until such a formula is suggested by experience, it would seem appropriate to retain the present provisions of the law. Should these provisions in a particular case prove inadequate special legislation could presumably be quickly enacted by Congress, if necessary in special session. By dealing with special situations as they arise we may build up a body of experience from which an over-all policy could be developed. We lack such experience now and, lacking it, any set formula seems to us undesirable. Our experience in this country, and the much more mature experience in England, would indicate that what is needed in important situations is time—time for the facts to be fully and accurately obtained and objectively viewed.

In the light of our own present inadequate experience in this delicate field, any other procedures of which we know runs the danger of improperly limiting the right to strike or of ineffectually protecting the public.

(2) Specifically, compulsory settlement of any dispute should be avoided. Experience may demonstrate in time that in certain very rare instances it may have to be employed. As yet, we do not feel that there is any group of cases where a policy of compulsory settlement would be justified. We believe compulsory delay is all that is warranted at the moment.

(3) His question as to whether if wages are fixed prices would not also have to be fixed, does more than suggest its answer. We do not dissent from the conclusion implicit in the question.

(4) He asks what other remedies suggest themselves for this problem. Some suggestions have been made that the problem is really one of prevention and lies in the direction of limiting industry-wide bargaining. We do not feel that at this time any conclusive opinions can be formulated concerning this issue; the problem is infinitely complex and one policy may be desirable or, at least, workable as to one industry and wholly undesirable or unworkable as to another: Another suggestion has been made that workers in vital industries should receive special privileges and compensation in return for being denied the right to strike. This seems both undesirable and impractical. It could lead only to a gradual regimentation of all major segments of our economy.

(5) As indicated above, we do not think that the present requirement that the membership vote upon the employer's last offer is important to the present law concerning national emergency disputes. However, the law's failure to require stockholders to vote on the union's last offer does not necessarily indicate lack of objectivity on the part of those who wrote and passed the act. It may well have been that the Members of Congress felt such a provision would be an unnecessary gesture which would make for formal symmetry in the law while disregarding the reality of the situation. Perhaps the same reasoning motivated them in drafting this provision as moved them in requiring non-Communist affidavits from union officers, but not from employers—i. e., based on evidence as to the need in the prior congressional hearings.

MR. JACOBS' HEADING "TWO EXAMPLES OF BIAS IN LEGISLATION ON LABOR DISPUTES"

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 3–5; our question 18)

Our question asked whether labor laws should "provide that a striker who has been replaced in the course of an economic strike—not involving any unfair labor practice—be permitted to vote in an election to choose a bargaining agent at the conclusion of a strike?"

Mr. Jacobs views this provision as going to the heart of the Taft-Hartley law, and treats it as an example of bias in legislation on labor disputes.

To clarify the basic differences in our and his analysis of this question, perhaps a further question should first be asked: Do you believe that a labor law should provide that an employer may keep in his employ a worker whom he has hired as a permanent replacement during the course of an economic strike even if this means denying reinstatement to a former employee who went on strike?

If this question is answered in the negative, such reply would differ with the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court in the case of N. L. R. B. v. Mackay Radio & Tel. Co., 304 U. S. 333 (1938). Not even the original National Labor Relations Board thought that an employer was obliged to discharge permanent replacements to make room for a striker where the strike did not grow out of an employer's unfair labor practice. The Supreme Court, upholding the right of the employer to retain replacements, stated that despite the Wagner Act's preservation of the right to strike, "if does not follow that an employer, guilty of no act denounced by the statute, has lost the right to protect and continue his business by supplying places left vacant by strikers."

The question of whether a supplanted striker should or should not be allowed to vote in an election seems to us to involve only an extension and application of the doctrine of the Supreme Court. The reasoning involved in making such extension is that if the man is not entitled to reinstatement as an employee he should not have an opportunity to vote on who will represent employees. The same reasoning is applicable concerning a man who, because of violence, has lost his right to reinstatement. Is it contended that, although barred from reinstatement because of extreme violence on the picket line or destruction of property, the employee should still be permitted to vote for the representative of a unit in which he is no longer a member?

While it seems to us that Mr. Jacobs' objection to section 9 (c) (3) is fundamentally an attack on the Mackay doctrine, we appreciate that the problem is difficult and the rule of the statute may lend itself, at least theoretically, to some isolated case of abuse. He doubtless recognizes that under the Wagner Act the Labor Board had difficulty in resolving precisely how this question should be handled. It originally held that only the striker could vote, and later that both the striker and the replacement were eligible. The latter rule was obviously an unsatisfactory rule which permitted two employees to vote, although only one was an employee.

If one concedes the correctness of the Mackay doctrine, it is difficult to see how one can quarrel with the eligibility-to-vote rule of the statute. The case of Columbia Pictures Corp., 64 N. L. R. B. 490 (1945), illustrates the rather ludicrous results which can be achieved without the rule of the statute. In that case the employer had committed no unfair labor practice, but in a representation election the Board nevertheless directed that the strikers as well as the replacements vote. The replacements all voted for one craft, and the replaced strikers, who were no longer entitled to reinstatement under the doctrine of the Board's decision in the Mackay case, all voted for another craft. The number of strikers exceeded the number of replacements, which led to the absurd result that the union certified did not represent a single man then at work in the bargaining unit. All the men actually working belonged to a rival union. It was to correct this incongruous situation that the clause to which Mr. Jacobs objects was included in section 9 (c) (3) of the present law.

It seems to us, however, that Mr. Jacobs' extensive comments under this question are not so much a criticism of section 9 (c) (3) by itself as they are designed to point out how in a very elaborate, involved, and wholly hypothetical situation, section 9 (c) (3), together with other provisions of the statute, might be used for "busting" a union.

The hypothetical situation he presents contemplates an unsuccessful strike by union A, the replacement of the strikers by the company, decertification of union A without the original strikers voting, and finally invocation of a mandatory injunction to prevent union A from continuing pressure against the company for recognition.

Our first comment is that this hypothetical case does not establish bias in the present law. The congressional hearings do not indicate any intent to promote such a result. If these various sections—which relate to entirely different problems—could be used (and this is doubted) by an unscrupulous employer in the manner Mr. Jacobs suggests, judging from the legislative reports, it very clearly is not the result of deliberate congressional intent. It would simply mean that this unscrupulous employer had succeeded in his intent to evade the law.

From a practical point of view, we believe this hypothetical case most remote and extremely unlikely even in a period of unemployment which Mr. Jacobs apparently believes is necessary for its occurrence. Any employer embarking upon the program Mr. Jacobs describes would be treading a dangerous path, one small slip from which would subject him to an unfair-labor-practice charge. The over-all scheme is of course an unfair-labor practice in itself; it presupposes the nonexistence of a contract with union A and the absence of an election within the previous 12-month period; it supposes that the company could pick and choose applying replacements on the basis of their union sympathies—another unfair-labor practice in itself; it assumes that the company could engineer the petition for decertification—again an unfair-labor practice, since the company quite properly has no right to petition for decertification itself. The Labor Board has often exposed and prohibited more subtle and ingenious schemes to dominate a union or contribute to its assistance.

We quite frankly do not think that any real danger, of the kind Mr. Jacobs suggests, exists. If we felt that any substantial possibility existed that such practices could be carried out, we would agree that the result is unfair and should be corrected. However, this analysis of Mr. Jacobs is not new; it seems quite similar to analyses made by some unions shortly after passage of the law. If there were any evidence that such maneuvers can and have been carried out by employers, we assume he would have referred to them rather than restating the problem in its original and hypothetical form.

In passing, we might observe that we did not realize until we actually got a copy of the Business Week article, from which Mr. Jacobs quotes, that this highly hypothetical case he presents was reported by that magazine under the heading "The union contention."

The same article from which Mr. Jacobs quotes rather aptly points out that patently the law did not enslave wage earners nor did it do many of the other things which labor charged. It goes on to say that:

"In order to arouse the members, the unions had to put their case in a way which made little sense to business or to anyone else."

We cannot help but take exception to Mr. Jacobs' comment, "Company A employs replacements, or strikebreakers; term depending upon one's bias." We believe with the Supreme Court and the original Labor Board that there is both a realistic and a legal difference in the terms, and that this distinction does not depend upon bias. A Federal statute, commonly referred to as prohibiting the transportation of strikebreakers in interstate commerce, limits its definition to those who are employed for the purpose of obstructing or interfering by force or threats with picketing or other collective-bargaining rights (52 Stat. 1242).

Those who subscribe to the theory that all replacements during a strike are strikebreakers and that no replacement is entitled to keep a job in preference to a striker would seem to encourage economic strikes. Without the possibility that other workers might find the employers' terms acceptable, one of the deterrents of frequent and prolonged strikes would be removed. This would make it practically impossible for a labor union ever to lose an economic strike, pretty much regardless of its merits, so long as union internal discipline remained firm.

One further word apropos strikebreakers. It is common knowledge that many large unions enforce internal discipline during a strike of questionable merit through the importation of professional goon squads. It would be interesting to know whether Mr. Jacobs would favor a Federal law prohibiting the transportation in interstate commerce of professionals whose purpose it is to interfere by force and threats with the right of the individual to refrain from participating in collective-bargaining activities. Since in his fifth specific question he seems to believe objectivity requires imposition of correlative restraints on companies and unions, possibly he would advocate either repeal of the present transportation-of-strikebreakers statute or endorse an equivalent prohibition upon the transportation of professional goon squads.

Concerning the remainder of his comments under this question, it appears that he reaches his conclusion of statutory unfairness by integrating the exclusive right of a replacement to vote in an election with (1) the right of a group of employees (30 percent of the unit) to petition for decertification of their representative; and (2) the prohibition upon a union to attempt to compel an employer to recognize it when another union has been certified as the appropriate bargaining unit.[1]

(1) From the context of his other remarks, we gather that he is not opposed to the right of employees to petition the Labor Board for decertification of a union representative with which they are dissatisfied. This would seem to be one of the least expensive remedies available for members to escape from at least the continuation of the abuses which he, in the latter part of his letter indicates, he is fighting to correct. In his desire to protect against such abuses, for which we heartily congratulate him, we suggest that continuation of the present decertification procedures offers a means for avoiding further abuse; supplemented by whatever legislation he is able to secure to make more expeditious the correction of past faults, the employees would have for the first time a measure of full protection from any unscrupulous leaders.

(2) Forgetting his hypothetical case, we find it hard to believe that he opposes the provisions of section 8 (b) (4) (C) in principle and unconnected with his supposititious case. That section merely states that where an employer, pursuant to a Labor Board determination, is recognizing and dealing with one union, it is an unfair labor practice for a second union, through a strike, to try to compel him to recognize it in clear violation of the directive of the Labor Board. The obviously impossible situation in which an employer would find himself in such cases, we think, is self-evident. On one hand, he faces violation of a Board order if he recognizes the striking union; on the other, he faces gradual destruction of his business if he doesn't violate that order. Does Mr. Jacobs believe it fair that an employer be without relief in such a case? Does Mr. Jacobs further believe that the right to picket exists even though its express purpose is to compel a violation of law?

In his analysis under this section, it is our opinion that he has at least slightly misstated the effect of the present law. Commenting on the effect of certifying the strikebreakers' union, he states, "Thus a condition is created whereby the old union and its members commit an unfair labor practice if they even try peaceably to induce the strikebreakers to join them to hold up the wage scale." In our opinion, this is not true. All that section 8 (b) (4) (C) prohibits is pressure upon the employer through a strike, or through inducing employees to strike, for the purpose of forcing the employer to recognize a different union in the face of a contrary Labor Board determination. In our opinion, the original union remains wholly free to post and keep a picket line in front of the premises for the very purpose Mr. Jacobs says it cannot. Such pickets could, without violating 8 (b) (4) (C), carry signs reading, "We call upon you strikebreakers to hold up the union-wage scale!" or, "To the public: This stores does not pay the union wage scale. Please don't patronize."

[1] We feel quite sure it was an oversight on his part which caused him to state that sec. 8 (b) (4) (B) as well as 8 (b) (4) (C) made a strike by union A (the replaced employees) an unfair labor practice, under the facts as he gave them. He undoubtedly knows that subsec. B applies to situations where a strike is called against one employer with the objective that through him pressure may be brought upon a second employer (any other employer) to secure recognition of an uncertified labor union. Subsec. (B) would come into play only if Mr. Jacobs' hypothetical union A struck an employer for whom A was still recognized in order to put pressure on his hypothetical company to recognize A in the face of a contrary Board certification. Since we are sure this is an oversight, our comments are limited to the two pertinent sections he cites.

To summarize Mr. Jacobs' analysis, and at the same time answer his third question, (a) we believe that the basic doctrine of the Mackay Radio case is fair and therefore find difficulty in finding fault with the provisions of 9 (c) (3) alone; (b) we believe a fair labor law should provide a group of employees, who are dissatisfied with their collective-bargaining representative, an opportunity to have the Labor Board hold an election to determine whether that representative should be decertified; (c) we believe it only fair that an employer who is dealing with a union certified by the Labor Board should be protected from economic pressure which might be exerted by another union to compel him to violate that certification.

Thus each pertinent section, cited in Mr. Jacobs' analysis, affords what we consider fair legal rules governing the major and specific problem at which it was directed. It is only by grouping all these provisions together, in a highly supposititious case, which has not as yet been demonstrated actually to constitute a real problem, that he is able to arrive at his conclusion of unfairness. Even if his supposititious case were sometime found to exist, the legislative problem presented would be to remedy that technical loophole previously uncontemplated, while still providing fair rules for the regular run of individual situations above discussed.

FEATHERBEDDING

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 5–6; our question 12)

Mr. Jacobs states that, although he opposes featherbedding, he also opposes a law forbidding it. Yet the only reason he gives for refraining from legislating his conviction is what we assume he intends as an analogy when he states, "I oppose whisky, but I don't favor prohibition. We tried it." Quite frankly, we do not see the analogy. The notable failure of legislation concerning prohibition can scarcely serve as an argument against all future remedial legislation. Prohibition failed for many reasons, among them being the fact that it attempted to legislate personal and private morals and habits. We do not believe that the practice of demanding and receiving pay for services not rendered has as yet become a widespread personal and moral habit of American workers. However, the fact that some workers and unions can, and do, with impunity, engage in featherbedding, may, of course, make it grow to a much more respected custom than it now is. From this point of view, the absence of corrective legislation is, in the long run, demoralizing to the country as a whole.

If Mr. Jacobs were to legislate against featherbedding, he states that he would favor similar restrictions on business. His illustrations of what he considers featherbedding by business are, quite frankly, puzzling. He apparently thinks that because the corporation in which he is a stockholder declined to sell him a radio at factory price on the ground that its dealer were entitled to a profit margin on which to operate their business, this was a case of featherbedding. Had the company sold to him directly, but insisted on all or part of the dealer's margin with no assumption by the company of the dealer's delivery, installation, demonstration, and service responsibility, we might have agreed with him. His corporation was merely protecting its dealers, without whose services the customers could not be served and the company could not function. We do not think Mr. Jacobs would seriously advocate that his corporation sell radios directly from factory to all who wrote to it direct, and on second thought he should most likely feel the same way about stockholders.

We scarcely suppose he means to suggest that all wholesalers, distributors, dealers, and retailers should be put out of business on the theory that they are exacting money for services not performed or to be performed. We would hate to think that, out of all the business people in Indianapolis engaged in distributing and retailing commerce, none of them perform any functions but instead are making exactions for nothing.

Mr. Jacobs is familiar, no duobt, with the price antidiscrimination prohibitions of the Robinson-Patman Act. We assume he does not believe, just because he is a stockholder in the television-manufacturing company he refers to, that that entitled him to a discriminatory price advanage. General Electric has frequently held stock in various companies but has never supposed that that entitled it to discriminatory price advantages.

We suppose that there are many cases where products have been marked down, as in the case of his radio-phonograph, even at substantial loss to manufacturers or other concerns in order to turn inventories into needed cash, liquidate models superseded by those with new improvements, and free the channels of distribution. It does not seem realistic to us to regard this as any evidence that the vendor had previously at the higher regular price been exacting something for nothing. Specifically, we do not regard any of the illustrations he mentions as in any wise in the nature of exacting pay for nothing. In each of the cases he states, you recognize that something was delivered, while the unfair labor practice covered by section 8 (b) (6) is limited to where such exactions are made for services not performed or to be performed.

We know of no practices in legitimate business where people are compelled to make payments in the nature of exaction for service (or products) which are not performed or not to be performed or delivered. That is all that section 8 (b) (6) of the present law even purports to cover.

As a matter of fact, the present legislation has been practically of no effect in limiting the most offensive kinds of featherbedding.

The general counsel for the National Labor Relations Board has indicated that section 8 (b) (6) will be narrowly construed by his office as applicable only to efforts to extort money for which no services are performed, and not to situations in which a union proffers services for the payment, although the employer may not want or need them. In an address before the American Bar Association, he declared,

"The term 'featherbedding', as it seems to be used throughout the industry, is much broader than the provisions of this section of the act. I have heard it applied in cases where the union rules required an employer to hire six men to do a job that two could do; or to provide 'made' work which normally would be performed incident to general operations; or to the union's requirements for call-in pay; and some have even applied it to paid holidays.

"But, within the purview of this section as it is written, the term has a decidedly narrow limitation. Stand-by crews, for example, who simply are present and do nothing, come within the prescriptions of his section; and it makes no difference whether they are sheet-metal workers hired to stand by while an ironworker does a job because of a jurisdictional dispute or musicians who are held in the anteroom of a radio station while the disc jockey is turning platters in the control room. The gist of this section is that the payment is made for services 'which are not performed or not to be performed'.

"Thus, when the teamsters halted trucks at the mouth of the Holland Tunnel and required the driver to put a member of the teamsters union on the seat in order to qualify to deliver the load in New York City and to pay him a full day's wages for taking the ride, I don't doubt that the owner of the truck called it featherbedding, but I have great doubt that it could ever be brought within the terms of this section of the statute.

"On the other hand, if the driver accepted the option which often was tendered to him of paying the money but waiving the privilege of having his helper ride with him, we have a situation where there were no services performed or to be performed, and probably a violation."

We have had considerable experience with the types of feather-bedding practice which are not presently covered by the law, unless coupled with an illegal secondary boycott. Here is just one example which occurred right here in Washington last year:

During 1948, the medical clinic of Drs. Groover, Christie, and Merritt, radiologists, purchased X-ray equipment for installation in their new additional quarters in the Columbia Medical Building Annex, Washington, D. C.

This equipment was purchased by them for a price which included installation. Other building renovations were being made at the time installation of the X-ray equipment was going on, and the union threatened to boycott and strike the entire job unless permitted to do the work of also installing the X-ray equipment. Because of pressure exerted on the company by the customer, to avoid a serious delay in installation, and a boycott of the entire renovation job and their willingness to assume the extra cost, the job was done by the union.

This procedure cost the purchasers approximately $4,000 more than they had contracted to pay. It was agreed in the purchase contract that, in the event the manufacturer's personnel was not allowed to make the installation, the purchasers would defray the costs of hiring outside labor.

We will be happy to furnish Mr. Jacobs with details of numerous similar experiences which we have had.

As to Mr. Jacobs' concluding specific questions:

(1) As indicated above, we do not believe that his illustrations are in the nature of getting pay for nothing.

(2) To answer his question concerning Government fixing of prices in case of "unconscionable profits" made by a well-established business, would take us far afield from our subject. We know of no generally accepted understanding of the term. Competition, over a period of time, will tend to eliminate anything that could be deemed "unconscionable profits." Generally we think most Americans would dislike the revolutionary change in our accepted ways of thinking involved in price fixing just as they would dislike governmental fixing of wages under the claim that wage demands had become "unconscionable."

(3) We definitely believe the problem of "feather-bedding" is capable of being regulated in a free economy. In fact a free competitive economy would seem to require that it be regulated. The numerous references to "fair profit," "unconscionable profits," and "unwarranted profits" suggests that he has considerable distrust in the workings of a free, competitive economy for establishing a "fair price." If so, of course we unequivocally differ with him.

SECONDARY BOYCOTTS AND JURISDICTIONAL STRIKES

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 6–9; our questions 3 and 4)

Apparently Mr. Jacobs, and everyone else including the President, agree that jurisdictional strikes are bad and should be prohibited. President Truman stated in his State of the Union message in 1947 that:

"Point No. 1 is the early enactment of legislation to prevent certain unjustifiable practices.

"First, under the point, are jurisdictional strikes. In such strikes, the public and the employer are innocent bystanders who are injured by a collision between rival unions. This type of dispute hurts production, industry, and the public—and labor itself. I consider jurisdictional strikes indefensible.

"The National Labor Relations Act provides procedures for determining which union represents the employees of a particular employer. In some jurisdictional disputes, however, minority unions strike to compel employers to deal with them despite a legal duty to bargain with the majority union. Strikes to compel an employer to violate the law are inexcusable. Legislation to prevent such strikes is clearly desirable.

"Another form of interunion disagreement is the jurisdictional strike involving the question of which labor union is entitled to perform a particular task. When rival unions are unable to settle such disputes themselves, provision must be made for peaceful and binding determination of the issues.

"A second unjustifiable practice is the secondary boycot, when used to further jurisdictional disputes or to compel employers to violate the National Labor Relations Act."

It seems to us that the President was eminently correct.

The provisions contained in the present law for the selection of bargaining representatives by election of the employees in the appropriate bargaining unit seem to us to provide just what Mr. Jacobs is suggesting as to the handling of jurisdictional disputes involving permanent employees. Such election becomes a futile gesture if the labor organizations involved are not given a compelling reason for abiding by the result and the Board's ensuing certification.

While Mr. Jacobs unequivocally condemns jurisdictional strikes in plants employing permanent employees, he quite rightly points out that the jurisdictional dispute in a craft industry where employment by a particular employer is intermittent, is infinitely more complex. The fact that it is more complex makes regulation more difficult, but does not excuse its absence.

The President apparently stated that "all jurisdictional strikes are indefensible" and that "strikes to compel an employer to violate the law are inexcusable" and should be prevented. However, in his veto message he indicated his disapproval of the current provisions on jurisdictional strikes on the ground that they would encourage unions to strike or boycott to obtain Board determination of the jurisdictional dispute.

In the building-trades industry where the problems you raise are most acute, the Building and Construction Trades Department of the A. F. of L. and the Associated General Contractors of America have entered into an agreement providing for a joint board to determine jurisdictional disputes in the very type of case which has been generally the most plaguing and difficult because of the intermittent nature of the employment. This we feel is a very healthy step forward. Since jurisdictional disputes arise from internal union policies, it would seem to be the primary responsibility of unions to settle such disputes. To the extent present law has provided an impetus toward establishing machinery for settling these disputes, we believe those provisions have justified themselves.

As of the latest report, we know of, the joint board had received some 40 such jurisdictional disputes and disposed of approximately half of them. We believe the union, employers and joint board are certainly to be congratulated upon establishing this procedure which is certainly in the right direction. Nothing in any way comparable had been developed during the 12 years between the passage of the Wagner Act and the present law.

We recently had a situation of a jurisdictional strike which is of interest, not only because of the rather typical problem it presented to our company as the employer, the United States Navy, for whom we were to develop a 300,000,000-volt synchrotron in the laboratory when completed, as well as numerous other projects under Government contract, and the public interest in general, but because of this illustration of the effectiveness of the provisions of the present law in dealing with such a situation.

We had contracted with a construction company to build this laboratory when a jurisdictional dispute arose between the IBEW-AFL and the Empire State Telephone Union, as to which union was to install the telephone cables. The IBEW threatened to strike the electrical subcontractor unless the telephone company permitted IBEW men to install the cables, rather than the telephone company's own employees who belonged to the Empire State Telephone Union. The telephone union employees took the position that they would not connect the telephones if the IBEW men installed the cables. Our company, as the innocent bystander, urged the respective employers and union representatives to come to some settlement between themselves on the problem. Finally, after the dispute has continued from February until August, the telephone company started to install the cables and 46 IBEW men walked off the job. On the following day we filed, with the NLRB, an unfair labor practice complaint against the IBEW for calling this jurisdictional strike. Two days later the Board examiner arived at the scene to conduct his investigation and on that very day the IBEW international vice president came to us expressing his dismay and surprise that we had filed an unfair labor practice charge and offering to call off the strike if we would withdraw the charge. We reminded him of the prior statement of an IBEW representative that he was very surprised to learn that the men had walked off and that we knew nothing about it whatever, and that certainly it was no action of the union. We then inquired as to his ability to recall the men in the light of his statement and he assured us that he could, and would, do so. In view of the rather highly specialized work involved and the familiarity of the men who had been on the job with the work, we were anxious to get back the same men who had been on the job, although the IBEW representative had indicated that after each of them had voluntarily quit without the knowledge of or influence of any kind by the union, they had all accepted other positions. When we indicated we would consider withdrawing the charge when the men returned to work, the IBEW international vice president assured us he would have them all back the following morning. In view of the charges that we sometimes hear that the Taft-Hartley law has "enslaved" laboring men and that the closed shop and other compulsory union practices are essential to guarantee them their freedoms, the union representative's reply is noteworthy. He said that he could assure us that they would all be back on the jobs even though they would have to quit other employment which they had accepted and in explaining how he could be sure of that he explained that they never could obtain another job in his area, which he went on to say included New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, and some other States, unless they did what he told them to do.

In conclusion, on jurisdictional strikes we agree with Mr. Jacobs that the problem in the crafts is complex, and therefore speedy, effective remedies must be devised. We believe unions and employers concerned can and will work this remedy out provided there is some legal compulsion requiring the unions to settle their internal difficulties promptly. The employer is already under the financial compulsion of trying to get the job done to make him amenable, but should any compulsion toward his effecting settlement be found necessary that too, should be provided.

To us it seems that the proposed law loses the gains made by the present law. It removes the incentive for settling the dispute without going to the Board. It would seem to do just exactly what the President in his veto message feared the present law would do, namely, prolong the dispute until such time as the Board had made a determination.

Turning to Mr. Jacobs' comments on the secondary boycott, we are apparently in full agreement that a second employer, not involved in the primary dispute should be protected, and that action against him should be made an unfair labor practice.

Mr. Jacobs also states that where employer B takes over the work usually done by employer A, whose employees are on strike, present law prohibits employees of B from refusing to perform the struck work and he asks if this is fair.

If this were the law we would agree with Mr. Jacobs that it is not fair. However, he apparently has overlooked the case of Douds v. Metropolitan Architects (21 L. R. R. M. 2256), decided by the District Court for the Southern District of New York which held that action by a union against the second employer in such case was not a secondary boycott and was not prohibited by the boycott provisions of the present law. In other words, the court treated the second employer in such case as involved in the primary dispute, and disregarded form to look at the substance of the matter. Thus we believe Mr. Jacobs' fears as to such unfair results will be avoided by sound judicial and administrative construction.

Any realistic consideration of secondary boycotts must include recognition of the manner in which they are used to force "featherbedding" practices and also of the manner in which they often are used to create a monoply.

There seems to be no justification for labor unions to be permitted through their economic power to issue their injunctions against the distribution of products which may lawfully be distributed for the benefit of the buyer. It is one thing to maintain a primary boycott whereby the public is asked not to purchase boycotted articles, but it is quite a different thing to enter into combination blocking the channels of commerce, so that the public is denied the right to express itself through its purchasing power.

The administration bill (H. R. 2032) now before the House Labor Committee permits monopoly boycotts such as were the subject of litigation in Allen Bradley v. Local Union No. 3 (325 U. S. 797). The defendants in that case pursued the policy of excluding from New York City enumerated electrical products made outside the city, regardless of whether they were made by union or nonunion, CIO or AFL, or independent unions, the purpose being to build a protective wall around the city of New York and deny the citizens the benefits of interstate commerce in order that local electrical workers might thus monopolize the market and increase their work opportunities. The defendants admitted they were not concerning with the working conditions or union affiliations of the men who produced the poacher products. The New York market was their private preserve. Obviously monopolistic and exclusionary practices of this kind should not be tolerated. No responsible labor leader has publicly undertaken to defend such practice, and we see no reason why Congress should encourage their resumption by adopting the administartion bill without amendment.

Certainly boycotts have diminished materially and jurisdictional disputes have all but disappeared under the provision of the present law without any evidence of impairing the rightful interests and power of labor.

Since Mr. Jacobs has voiced no other objection to the secondary-boycott provisions of the present law and has condemned such boycotts when the second employer does not participate in the primary dispute, we assume that he agrees with us that the present provisions of the law are more desirable than those now proposed by way of modification.

FREE SPEECH

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 9–11; our question 7)

Mr. Jacobs' answer indicates that he has no objection to Federal labor laws giving to both labor and management freedom to express their own points of view on employee-relations problems, as he asserts that "no law, including the Wagner Act, ever denied the employer free speech." Until 1943, however, when the NLRB changed its policy, the Wagner Act was construed as forbidding employers to say anything at all that might influence employees against unions. In fact, even the most moderate argument, accompanied by assurances that no discriminatory treatment would be meted out to employees who disagreed, was deemed an unfair labor practice per se for many years.

While there was an admonition in a Supreme Court decision, N. L. R. B. v. Virginia Electric and Power Co. (314 U. S. 469 (1941)), that an employer's right to speak to his employees was protected by the Constitution, the Court still left to the Board discretion to find other facts in the case which would justify a holding that the employer's argument was coercive. It was not until 2 years later when the Supreme Court refused to review a reversal of a Board order in N. L. R. B. v. American Tube Bending Co. (134 F. (2d) 993 (CCA 2); cert. den. 320 U. S. 768 (1943)) that the Board abandoned this construction of the act. Moreover, the Board sought to narrow the effect of these judicial pronouncements by holding that if an employer had been guilty of an unfair labor practice at some time or other, no matter how remote this act was or how severable from the speech, he was not entitled to express his views. Monumental Life Insurance Co. (69 N. L. R. B. 247).

Shortly thereafter the Board placed a further limitation upon employer utterances with respect to union representation by declaring that any speech made in a factory during working time to which employees were compelled to listen was illegal per se. Clark Bros. Inc. (70 N. L. R. B. 802).

Moreover, even after the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Board has still closely limited the right of free speech to the specific provisions of section 8 (c) which applies only to unfair labor practice cases. In the General Shoe case (77 N. L. R. B. No. 18), the Board set aside a representation, not because the employer's statements were threatening or coercive but because they were of a character which the Board thought might destroy the "laboratoy conditions" which it felt should prevail in its elections. The reason of the Board majority was that section 8 (c) applied only to complaint cases and, therefore, the Board was free to adopt its own policy rule in representation cases. Yet the Board has placed virtually no curbs on what union organizers could say in preelection campaigns. See Corn Products Refining Co. (58 N. L. R. B. 1441).

In the light of these decisions, we wonder if Mr. Jacobs is still of the opinion that it is unnecessary to include in the National Labor Relations Act any provision permitting both sides to express arguments on labor matters as long as they refrain from threats or promises of benefits?

Mr. Jacobs suggests that what many misinformed people have called denial of free speech under the Wagner Act was simply the application of the law of evidence. The record seems to clearly demonstrate, however, especially as to early cases under the Wagner Act, that in fact what occurred was the misapplication of the law of evidence, which the Taft-Hartley Act attempted to correct. Thus in the conference report it was stated:

"Both the House bill and the Senate amendment contained provisions designed to protect the right of both employers and labor organizations to free speech. The conference agreement adopts the provisions of the House bill in this respect with one change derived from the Senate amendment. It is provided that expressing any views, argument, or opinion or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic, or visual form, is not to constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice if such expression contains no threat of force or reprisal or promise of benefit. The practice which the Board has had in the past of using speeches and publications of employers concerning labor organizations and collective-bargaining arrangements as evidence, no matter how irrelevant or immaterial, that some later act of the employer had an illegal purpose gave rise to the necessity for this change in the law. The purpose is to protect the right of free speech when what the employer says or writes is not of a threatening nature or does not promise a prohibited favorable discrimination" (conference report, H. Rept., 510, 80th Cong., p. 45).

There appears to be confusion in the minds of some, as Mr. Jacobs correctly suggests, as to whether or not under the present free-speech clause a statement, indicative of other unfair behavior, such as discrimination, may not be used in evidence because on its face it does not contain a threat of reprisal or a promise of benefit (see interesting comment on trial examiner's opinion in Minnesota Mining case, contained in the Daily Labor Report for October 13, 1948, p. A–3). While there has been no well-defined precedent on this issue, we agree that if it is not clear whether the present provision has the effect of excluding evidence which should have probative value, some clarification of that part of section 8 (c) which gives rise to the confusion should be considered. (Section 8 (c) provides that the expressing of any views, arguments, or opinion shall not "be evidence of an unfair labor practice" but also shall not "constitute" an unfair labor practice as long as they do not contain threats or promises of benefits. Apparently there is agreement that such expressions should not "constitute" an unfair labor practice, and the only question raised is as to the application of the provision relating to evidence.) However, any clarification should be made with extreme care in order to guard against a return to the unfair and unsatisfactory rulings under the Wagner Act.

Attention is directed, however, to the fact that the Board itself has not placed such an extreme construction upon this subsection as the trial examiner's dictum in the Greensboro Coca-Cola case from whose report Mr. Jacobs quotes. The Board has emphasized that it is only expression of arguments generally which are privileged under this subsection. Consequently, it has held that employers may not invoke this subsection to justify interrogations of individual employees with respect to their union membership. The Board has also decided that advising or instructing employees to take an illegal course of action is not privileged, even though such instructions or advice are not accompanied by express threats.

The NLRB general counsel is an unofficial ruling (CCH Labor Law Reporter 5415) has instructed Board attorneys to ask trial examiners to admit in evidence all statements alleged to constitute or to be evidence of an unfair labor practice, without ruling on whether or not the statements are coercive, leaving that question to be determined by the Board.

CLOSED SHOP

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 11–13; our question 13)

Mr. Jacobs is correct in stating that the Wagner Act did not require an employer to grant a closed shop. Nevertheless, because the provisions of that act were frequently invoked to cover boycotts and other forms of concerted activity for the purpose of forcing an employer to agree to a closed shop, it is not accurate to imply that closed-shop contracts in many industries were not the results of a great amount of economic pressure. He also points out that even though the Taft-Hartley Act forbids closed-shop agreements, a great many employers have voluntarily entered into them despite the act.

The whole problem of closed-shop contracts presents a much larger issue than the question of whether or not employers like or dislike such contracts. The legislative history of the Taft-Hartley Act shows that the restrictions on compulsory union membership contracts were not enacted to help employers, but to protect the individuals who comprise the working force of our country. The Senate committee report (S. Rept. No. 105, 80th Cong., 1st sess.) pointed out that in many industries the closed shop "which requires preexisting union membership as a condition of obtaining employment creates too great a barrier to free employment to be longer tolerated (and) * * * permits unions holding such monopolies over jobs to exact excessive fees." The committee referred to numerous examples of how "union leaders have used closed-shop devices as a method of depriving employees of their jobs and in some cases a means of securing a livelihood in their trade or calling for purely capricious reasons." The report also cites "examples of equally glaring disregard for the rights of minority members of unions."

In view of the efforts and experience which Mr. Jacobs describes in his letter in helping to assert the rights of individuals who have been expelled from unions for demanding to look at the books, or for other reasons, he is probably familiar with a survey entitled "Democracy in Trade Unions" prepared by the American Civil Liberties Union and published in November 1943. The following are a few typical statements from such survey:

"A member of the Musicians Union, Local 802, New York, charged that the 1936 election of officers was fraudulent and urged a new election under impartial auspices. He was brought up before the trial board and expelled from the union. When he sued for reinstatement, a New York court ruled in 1941 in his favor because the trial board which had expelled him contained union officers involved in his accusation (p. 22).

"In a local bill poster's union, a member was opposed to handing over part of his wages to certain union officials. He was expelled for bringing court action to recover these kick-backs. He went to court again and sued for reinstatement as a member of the union. The court ruled in his favor. It held that the grounds on which he had been expelled were invalid; the technical charge was that appealing to the courts to recover kick-backs was a violation of the union's constitutional provision forbidding a member to conduct any union business outside of meeting or executive board rooms (p. 22).

"Another case involved a New Jersey teamster who had been a driver for 19 years. He fought for improvements in working conditions. Despite vigorous opposition by the union administration, he was elected shop chairman for his 'barn.'" Two union members then charged him with making derogatory remarks about the local president and vice president. On this charge he was expelled. He sued for reinstatement and the court found that no charges were served and no hearings were held. Nevertheless, the complaint was dismissed because the worker had failed to exhaust all remedies available to him (p. 22).

"In another case the president of the painters and varnish workers union, AFL, charged a member with seeking to remove him from office. Thereupon the executive board expelled the member from the union." At the time the report of the American Civil Liberties Union was issued, court action in this case was pending (p. 23).

"Another instance of the extremes to which union leaders may go in combating opposition is the way Maj. George Berry handled the New York printing pressmen's strike in 1923. This local struck without the international's sanction and in violation of an arbitration clause. Berry thereupon revoked the local's charter, suspended the entire membership and telegraphed pressmen's locals throughout the country to send men to New York to take their jobs. Despite strong opposition, Berry retained power and won acceptance of his policies.

"In another case, bitter conflict broke out between two locals of the furniture workers union. In support of the group favorable to its interests, the administration of the international suspended the opposition local, deprived it of its charter and records without notice and transferred its assets to the rival organization. The suspended group tried to appeal from the acts of the international, but the union's appellate tribunal ignored its communication. On these grounds, a court ruled that the suspended local be reinstated and its assets returned" (p. 25).

Mr. Jacobs may recall one of the striking illustrations Mr. J. Mack Swigert gave in his article "The Taft-Hartley Law: Does It Really Hurt Labor?" (Saturday Evening Post, October 25, 1947.)

"On October 30, 1940, E. C. Pfoh, who was past president of Lodge No. 132, Brotherhood of Railroad Trainmen, sent a circular letter to fellow members of his union endorsing Wendell Willkie for President of the United States. The top brass of the brotherhood was supporting Franklin D. Roosevelt. The letter was a technical violation of a rule in the union constitution that all circular letters signed by members must first be submitted to International President A. F. Whitney for censorship. Mr. Pfoh's local was directed by President Whitney to 'see that charges are promptly filed against Brother Pfoh and the constitution enforced against him for the violation of his obligation and our law.' The local tried Mr. Pfoh and acquitted him. Mr. Whitney appealed the acquittal and the board of directors of the union ordered the local to retry Brother Pfoh. The local dutifully tried him again and acquitted him again. Mr. Whitney filed a new appeal, which the board also sustained. This time the board went further. It kicked Brother Pfoh out of the union. Under a closed-shop contract, this would have cost Pfoh his job. Fortunately for Pfoh, this could not be done in his case, because the Railway Labor Act, in effect for many years, does not permit compulsory union membership. The union could not lawfully deprive Pfoh of his job for exercising his constitutional right of freedom of speech during an election campaign. Similarly, under the Taft-Hartley law a worker in industry can be expelled by his union for any reason it considers sufficient, but if nonpayment of dues is not the issue the workers' job is safe and he can continue to support his family by following the trade he has learned through years of experience."

We understand that the administration bill now before the House Labor Committee not only wipes out any prohibition against the closed shop but is intended to override all State laws which in any way prohibit or qualify the closed shop. Moreover this overriding of State statutes permits agreements not only requiring the payment of union dues as a condition of employment, but permits deductions from wages and salaries for the purpose of meeting all "membership obligations" which may be construed to include deductions of an amount to cover fines and penalties imposed by the union.

In this connection attention is invited to information published in the Journal of the United Mine Workers of America in 1922, listing disciplinary actions taken against union members in their closed-shop industry, which in the aggregate show that within a period of 16 weeks 1,236 members were expelled for varying periods totaling 66,784 years and fined a total of $171,852.

The Boilermakers, Iron, Shipbuilders, and Helpers Union published a record or four or five hundred expulsions and fines for the period of about a year. Fines ranged from $5 up to $9,999.99. Expulsions ranged from 1 to 99 years.

According to the statement of Mr. Samuel Gompers, expulsion from a union in an organized trade was equivalent to "capital punishment." Even men who come out of prison after the commission of offenses against society are supposed to be allowed again to work at their trade, but extreme disciplinary action by the union, as above set forth, if carried out, bars men from their trade for their lifetime.

We believe that Mr. Jacobs does not meet the real issue when he suggests that "employers who favor these restrictions in the Taft-Hartley Act are trying to enlist Government aid in securing favorable provisions in bargaining contracts." Even if it is assumed that the employer incidentally benefits from the prohibition of the closed shop, the real issue is not that but whether the individual worker and the community should be exposed to the abuses peculiar to the closed shop? If the law forbids—as it rightfully does—an employer to bargain for a "yellow dog" clause under which no employee is free to join any union, why should not a clause providing that a prospective employee must become a member of a particular union in order to be employed be equally repugnant to public policy?

Mr. Jacobs' argument in favor of the closed shop is based upon the assumption that unless such an agreement is in effect labor cannot present a united front at the bargaining table. That, of course, is the historic defense of the closed shop. It might have possessed some validity before the passage of the Wagner Act. Once legislation was enacted, however, which protected a union applicant or union employee from discrimination and which made the labor organization selected by the majority of employees the exclusive representative for collective bargaining purposes, the need for a closed shop vanished. In passing the Railway Labor Act of 1926 Congress perceived this. Consequently, that act specifically prohibits all forms of compulsory membership agreements.

We wonder if Mr. Jacobs believes that all or any of the railway labor organizations have been unable to present a united front to the carriers at the bargaining table?

Mr. Jacobs also says "Now let's take a very practical aspect of the question," towit: "When your company bargains with your employees it is not weakened by any fractional stockholders group at the bargaining table. You, the management, present a solid front. It is natural that the union should seek like unity."

His underlying assumption that a union which does not have a closed shop is divided at the bargaining table seems entirely erroneous. Under the provisions of section 9 (a) of the present law (and of the Wagner Act) an employer must deal exclusively with the union designated by the majority of the employees in any given bargaining unit. Thus in a plant in which, let us say, the United Electrical Workers, CIO, has been certified as the sole bargaining agent, the management of our company can bargain only with that union on matters affecting the employees in that unit. Yet some of the employees in that plant belong to other CIO unions, some to AFL unions. There are others who do not belong to any. Doubtless many of these employees may not agree with the policies of the majority bargaining representative, just as some minority stockholders may occasionally disagree with the policies of our management. Yet as long as the certified union represents 51 percent of the employees, we must assume that it is speaking for them all, for we are forbidden by law to deal with any of the minority unions. In short, the absence of a closed shop confers no right on the part of the dissidents to be represented at the bargaining table.

It seems to us that closed shop—and especially the closed union which Mr. Jacobs opposes—is an antisocial institution which labor unions can no longer socially or ethically justify. Collective bargaining has been assured by governmental laws which have encouraged the growth of unions, made them secure, and given them recognized status as administrators of collective-bargaining agreements. Having obtained this legal status, unions need no longer rely on the closed shop for their conttinued existence. What may have been necessary in the early days of organization is now the mens of acquiring an economic monopoly with respect to job markets and job availbility. For the unions to assert, as some have, that they have a right to limit the number of members whom they take into the union, based on the number of jobs available in a particular industry or trade, is equivalent to asserting that employers may properly through agreements limit the output of goods and determine the prices to be charged so that they might assure themselves of profit in market which might otherwise be oversupplied.

EMPLOYEE'S RIGHT TO JOIN OR NOT TO JOIN, AND TO REMAIN OR NOT TO REMAIN, MEMBERS OF A UNION

(Mr. Jacobs, p. 13; our question 16)

Mr. Jacobs answered this question by saying that workers should have the right to contract with the employer that only those who bear their share of the expense of collective bargaining and help sustain the employees' side should be employed.

Apparently the authors of the Taft-Hartley Act would not disagree with Mr. Jacobs in this respect. As he is undoubtedly aware, that statute does permit unions, with the approval of the majority of the employees, to negotiate contracts under which all employees in the bargaining unit can be required to apply for union membership and tender their dues and initiation fees. We agree with Mr. Jacobs that the referendum which the present act requires on the union security question could well be eliminated, and we are in accord with his views that if the majority have designated a particular union as their bargaining agent, this designation should be sufficient to empower the union to bargain for any contract clause which is not contrary to the provisions of the act.

In answer to our question, first of all, we think the individual should be protected originally in his right to join or not join a union. Secondly, we think he should be protected—if so-called union security clauses are to be permitted—in having the opportunity at reasonable intervals to remain or not to remain a member just as he may wish. It would seem to be against public policy to permit union security clauses unless an annual escape period is made mandatory.

Turning to the first point, under the old Wagner Act an employee didn't always have the right to vote for or against a union, because of a very queer rule applied to run-off elections where two unions were competing for represetation and neither union won a majority of the votes cast in the first balloting. For example, take a plant where 100 workers are choosing among an A. F. of L. union, a CIO union, and no union. Assume the result is as follows: A. F. of L. union, 24; CIO union, 27; no union, 49.

Since there was not a clear majority favoring any of the three choices, the Board, under the old law, would have thrown the "no union" proposition off the final ballot and left the workers to choose between the A. F. of L. and the CIO unions.

Under the present "slave-labor" law, the Board must hold the run-off election on the two choices receiving the largest number of votes in the earlier balloting. Thus, in the case described above, the workers would be permitted to vote, in the run-off contest, between the CIO union and no union.

Also of great importance is the need to make sure that those who profess to be the representatives of the employees are truly the selected choice of the employees. For this reason, any good labor law should have adequate and precise provisions requiring those who claim they represent a majority to prove it in a democratic method by secret ballot; there should be provisions enabling employees to dislodge a union that no longer represents the majority of them; there should be provisions allowing a harassed employer to demand an election to determine who is the actual representative among competing unions or to determine whether the employees want any union whatsoever; there should be provisions that an election cannot be had prematurely at the instance of any interested parties; there should be provisions making the election final and binding for a substantial period of time.

There apparently is no substantial quarrel with any of the above suggestions except perhaps the argument of those who believe that allowing an employer the right to petition for an election is disruptive of the organizing ability of a union. There is insurance against this through the ruling that an employer cannot insist upon an election until a union has formally requested him to recognize it as the bargaining agent for the union. The watch-dog committee report indicates that of all certification petitions filed under the present law only about 7 percent were instituted by employers.

In connection with Mr. Jacobs' comments on nonunion workers receiving a free ride, the Senate committee in reporting out the Taft-Hartley bill (S. Rept.

No. 105, 80th Cong.) expressed sympathy for the argument that in the absence of compulsory membership provisions "many employees sharing the benefits of what unions were able to accomplish by collective bargaining refuse to pay their share of the costs" (p. 6).

It would not logically follow, however, as Mr. Jacobs suggests that the statute should permit closed-shop agreements. To go this far would mean that applicants for employment or employees who were willing to join unions could nevertheless be deprived of their jobs should the unions enjoying the benefits of such agreements decide to deny them membership or expel them for some reason quite unconnected with their willingness to share the cost of administering the union contract.

ORGANIZATION OF SUPERVISORS

(Mr. Jacobs, p. 14; our question 15)

Although Mr. Jacobs feels there is some impropriety in a foreman belonging to the same union as the production workers, he implies that if the foremen are given the right to bargain collectively through a union not affiliated with the production workers that an entirely different issue is presented. Presumably this means he would favor the amendment to the Wagner Act sponsored by the Foremen's Association of America in the last Congress, which would require employers to bargain with supervisory organizations provided they were not affiliated with rank and file unions.

Viewed purely in the abstract, such a proposal is plausible since it would seem to meet the problems of conflicting loyalty, which may have prompted Mr. Jacobs to state that "foremen should not be permitted to belong to the production workers union." As a matter of practical industrial relations, however, this conflict of loyalty would still remain.

At the time he commented on our questionnaire, Mr. Jacobs of course did not have the opportunity of reading the testimony of Mr. Gossett of the Ford Motor Co. before the Senate committee, in which he explained why his company, after entering into collective bargaining relations with the foremen's association for some years felt constrained to discontinue. He cited several instances to show that the foremen's association, even though nominally independent, was under such obligation to the United Automobile Workers, that the members of the foremen's union were unwilling to discipline any members of the production workers union. The same observation was made by the NLRB in the Maryland Drydock case (49 NLRB 733) and, although glossed over, in the Packard case (61 NLRB 4) where the Board reversed itself.

The record of that case shows nevertheless admissions by counsel of the foremen's union that when his association struck "there was a direct and express agreement between us and the responsible CIO leaders that members of the CIO maintenance and production workers union would not be permitted to take the place of foremen," Packard Motor Co. (61 NLRB 31), and that on occasions agreements were made with the CIO, pursuant to which both unions respected each other's picket line (id., p. 31).

In the Chrysler case (69 N. L. R. B. 1424), the Board subpenaed correspondence between the officers of the foremen's association and various CIO unions. This correspondence revealed that the foremen's association had received letters from 22 different UAW-CIO locals offering to organize foremen's chapters in their plant, that the foremen's associations had requested UAW locals to submit a list of supervisors to whom it could send its literature direct, and that Mr. Keys, the president of the foremen's association, had conferred with Philip Murray, Walter Reuther, and other CIO officials to work out problems of mutual concern in connection with organizing drives for supervisory employees.

In the light of this well-documented history, it is obvious that the so-called independence of the foremen's association was purely fictional. It is apparent too that the realities of industrial relations would tend to make any group of organized foremen subservient to the powerful rank and file unions.

If they are unionized their unions will—as shown clearly in the congressional hearings conducted a couple of years ago—become associated with, collaborate with, and even be dominated by, the unions representing the working force that they are supposed to lead and manage. The spirit of management goes and the entire operation becomes inefficient. The foremen tend to become simply another group of workers, instead of a true part of management. The union may discipline, fine, suspend, expel—and under the old form of union shop—actually fire these men from their jobs for merely doing their work properly and carrying out the orders issued to them by the employer.

In the debates at the time that the present law was adopted, the situation was aptly summarized as follows:

"* * * When the foremen unionize, even in a union that claims to be independent of the union of the rank and file, they are subject to influence and control by the rank and file union, and, instead of their bossing the rank and file, the rank and file bosses them. The evidence shows that rank and file unions have done much of the actual organizing of foremen, even when the foremen's union professes to be 'independent.' Without any question, this is why the unions seek to organize the foremen.

* * * * * * *

"The evidence further shows that rank and file unions tell the foremen's union when the foremen may strike and when they may not, what duties the foremen may do and what ones they may not, what plants the foremen's union may organize and what ones it may not. It shows that rank and file unions have helped foremen's unions, not for the benefit of the foremen, but for the benefit of the rank and file, at the expense of the foreman's fidelity in doing his duties."

Mr. Jacobs is, of course, aware that the supervisory provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act do not forbid employers to deal collectively with the foremen, but simply relieve them from any legal duty to bargain with supervisors. Our foremen are management, and indeed are regarded as probably the most significant management group in their power to affect the company for good or bad. It is true that in some of our plants there are a large number of foremen. This does not mean that with respect to their authority over their subordinates or the discretion reposed in them with respect to production problems, the handling of grievances at the first stage, and the differential between their pay and that of their subordinates, our foremen are any different from the foremen in small companies.

Although the argument is sometimes made that in a big company where there are several thousand foremen, their problems are more serious than those in smaller companies who are employing only 20 foremen or less, it has never seemed to us that this argument is particularly sound. During the war some 30,000 colonels were commissioned, a number vastly in excess of those in our peacetime army. Yet so far as their respective regiments were concerned, these colonel possessed all the authority and discretion enjoyed by permanent officers of similar rank.

It seems to us, therefore, that the problem of dealing with supervisory employees in a statute providing for compulsory collective bargaining is primarily a matter of drawing a line between management and labor. The Taft-Hartley Act attempts to do this not by drawing this line between the workers and the lowest supervisory level, but between the supervisor who possesses actual managerial authority and such minor supervisors as "straw bosses, lead men, set-up men, group leaders and expeditors" whose authority is not sufficiently great to justify any distinction between them and the ordinary employee (S. Rept. No. 105, 80th Cong., p. 4).

If this is not a valid distinction, where should the line be drawn?

CHECK-OFF

(Mr. Jacobs, p. 14; our question 5)

Mr. Jacobs aparently regards the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act requiring the individual workers' consent to the union check-off for union dues or assessments as a provision advocated exclusively by employers. However, this type of protection for workers has enjoyed a much broader advocacy, appearing in various forms in State legislation. The Taft-Hartley Act in permitting deductions for union dues goes no further than the statutes in many industrial States, e. g., Massachusetts, which protect wage earners from the claims of creditors by providing against deductions except where they have been voluntary written assignments, or New York, where no deductions can be made from a worker's wages for the benefit of his employer even where the employee his given his specific consent. The implication of Mr. Jacobs' comment seems to be that any employer who feels that the provisions of existing law with respect to the check-off are sound, is hypocritical in saiyng that this provision protects the individual workers. As a mater of fact, it is much easier from an employers' standpoint if he agrees to a check-off clause in collective bargaining—he does not burden his bookkeeping department with the duty of keeping track of individual employee assignments

We fail to see how the restrictions on the check-off in existing law weaken the union for members that wish to support it. It has been our experience that employees who are sympathetic with the unions' policies will raise no objection to signing check-off cards.

Is it Mr. Jacobs' position that employees should be taxed by a private organization without their consent?

COMMUNIST OR OTHER SUBVERSIVE ORGANIZATION—AFFIDAVITS

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 15-16; our question 9)

The General Electric Co. was quite aware in drafting this question that the present law does not require company officials to sign any affidavit with respect to their political beliefs or connections. As has been indicated, we were not interested in sustaining the Taft-Hartley law as such. We also were aware that the present non-Communist disclaimer is not required of all union officials but is simply a condition precedent to a union's having access to administrative remedies of the Taft-Hartley Act. Our position has been that the same obligation should be applied to both union and management officials. Then if employers fail to conform to the filing requirements of the act they would also, like noncomplying unions, be barred from obtaining relief against unfair labor practices.

We do not quarrel with Mr. Jacobs' conclusion that the provisions of the present act may be too weak to give workers in some unions effective methods of ousting from leadership Communists and dictators. While the platform of the Democratic Party promised to write into law an effective method of ridding unions of Communistic leadership, S. 249, the administration labor bill now pending before the Senate Committee, fails to deal with the problem of subversive leadership in labor unions in any manner whatsoever. Yet this bill is proposed as a complete substitute for the provisions of the present act.

From his comments, we gather that Mr. Jacobs has a more constructive solution of the problem, which we would be interested in learning.

UNION FINANCIAL REPORTS

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 16-17; our question 10)

We are inclined to agree with Mr. Jacobs' view that the section on unions' filing of financial reports in the present Taft-Hartley Act does not afford adequate protection to union members since there is no requirement that the statements which are filed with the Secretary of Labor have to be audited. Moreover, the efficacy of this provision has been weakened by the regulations of the Labor Department which contain no provision permitting union members to inspect the documents upon which the financial reports are based. We read with much interest the summary of his correspondence with Congressman Hartley in which he took up with the Congressman the fact that his client had been expelled from an international union for his temerity in seeking to see a financial report. If he was forced out of his job, however, by reason of his expulsion, it would appear that Congressman Hartley was correct in saying that the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act afforded him some remedy.

Attention is drawn to sections 8 (a) (3) and 8 (b) (2) of the present law. We are in accord with Mr. Jacobs' conclusion that the Taft-Hartley Act gives a member no method of reinstatement in his union and that the common law action to which he had to resort is a slow and cumbersome remedy. We notice, however, that in the administration bill, unions are not only relieved from the reporting requirements, but would also have the right under compulsory agreements to deprive your client of his job. We hope that Mr. Jacobs will agree that in cases such as he reports even the weak remedies of the present act are much better than nothing. But any legislation designed to require the auditing of union financial reports and protecting against retaliation union members who wish to inspect them, deserves support.

MUTUAL AND EQUAL RESPONSIBILITY AND SUABILITY OF PARTIES

(Mr. Jacobs, p. 17; our question 11)

We are glad to note that Mr. Jacobs expresses no disagreement with section 301 of the Taft-Hartley Act which makes both employers and labor organizations suable for breaches of collective agreement, and he has very fairly conceded that the Taft-Hartley Act favors union members by limiting liability to the union treasury, thus preventing the property of an individual worker from being attached and levied upon in order to pay a judgment against an organization.

We believe Mr. Jacobs is mistaken however, in his assumption that in all jurisdictions unions were suable, as such, even prior to the enactment of this section. In neither of the cases which he cites (Duplex Printing Press Company v. Dearing Press, 254 U. S. 443; Lawler v. Loewe, 235 U. S. 522) were unions, as such, the defendants. The Duplex case was a suit against certain named officials, and Lawler v. Loewe was an action for damages against the members of a union in their individual capacities. Of course in many jurisdictions by statute unions were suable, as such, prior to enactment of section 301, but this was not the common law rule. The report of the Senate Labor Committee on the Taft-Hartley Act (S. Rept. No. 105, 80th Cong.) contains a lengthy summary of the laws in the various States under the caption "Enforcement of Contract Liabilities" pp. 15–18

VIOLENCE, FORCE, INTIMIDATION

(Mr. Jacobs, p. 18; our question 14)

We apparently are in agreement with Mr. Jacobs in feeling that the use of violence, force or intimidation to prevent an employee from working should be unlawful. We hope that his suggestion that such practices have always been unlawful does not mean that he is not in favor of what we consider to be the absolutely minimum provisions contained in the present law relating to these serious matters. We can think of no milder Federal legislation to discourage such practices than the provisions of the present law, which merely provide, in section 8 (b) (1), that it shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents "to restrain or coerce" (a) employees in the exercise of their legal rights, or (b) employers in the selection of their own representatives. These provisions should be fortified with specific prohibitions against violence.

It must be remembered, of course, that the law must give an adequate and effective remedy, if the right to be protected from violence is to mean anything.

A most graphic illustration of the importance of having an adequate remedy as well as a legal right was just furnished a few days ago in the recent decision of the N. L. R. B. in the Smith Cabinet Manufacturing Co. case (N. L. R. B. case No. 35–CB–3, made public February 25, 1949).

In this case, the Board found that the United Furniture Workers, CIO and its Salem, Ind., local had indulged in strike violence in violation of the L. M. R. A., 1947. Among the actions which the Board found in violation of he ban on coercion of employees were:

"Carrying of sticks by pickets, and the piling of bricks for use by pickets; blocking of plant entrances by railroad ties, automobiles, raised gutter plates, and tacks; threatening violence to nonstrikers over a loudspeaker; intimidation of nonstrikers as they tried to enter the plant; lacing of pickets in a manner to prevent nonstrikers from unloading a boxcar on a railroad spur to the plant; 'goon squad' mass assaults on nonstrikers, the overturning of a nonstriker's automobile, and individual assaults on nonstrikers; barring a plant superintendent and a foreman from the plant by force and intimidation, and attempts to upset the foreman's automobile or damage it" (New York Times, February 25, 1949).

However, the remedy ordered by the Board was merely for the unions and the union officials involved to cease restraining or coercing employees of the Smith Co. and to post notices announcing that they would cease such activities. But note that the activities themselves occurred in September 1947, while the Board's order was issued in February 1949. It is obvious—shockingly obvious—that as a practical matter there is no protection afforded at all to the aggrieved parties in this particular case by a Board order issued over a year after the incident had occurred.

In the New York Herald Tribune's account of the case (February 25, 1949), this significant statement is made: "The trouble was finally quieted and the plant reopened after the company obtained a court injunction." Presumably the injunction obtained was in a State court. In view of the great variety of State laws with respect to this subject, it seems perfectly apparent that the Federal law itself should provide for adequate, immediate, and uniform relief. We, of course, think that the present provisions of the law which permit injunctive relief to be secured only by the N. L. R. B. and not by private parties are perfectly proper, but we point out that the Board must be able to act promptly if any practical relief is to be granted.

Certainly as Mr. Jacobs says "violence is foolish, ineffective (except to injure great numbers of innocent people) and wrong * * * and should be forbidden to all men," but it would seem that the real question is whether the Federal Government has, or is going to recognize, its responsibility by providing an adequate remedy. It is assumed that his suggestion that employees lack "economic strength to match the employers" is not intended to imply that this justifies violence of the kinds herein described, or of the kind with which Mr. Jacobs is probably familiar as a result of his representation of the individuals convicted for resisting and abusing peace officers by the use of dangerous and deadly weapons in the CIO violence at the International Harvester plant near Indianapolis a few years ago, or of the kinds displayed at the Allis-Chalmers plants in Milwaukee, to mention only a few of them.

BARGAINING IN GOOD FAITH BY BOTH EMPLOYERS AND UNIONS

(Mr. Jacobs, p. 18; our question 6)

Mr. Jacobs' answer to this question is that you "can say 'yes' without further comment." We are gratified, for this would indicate that he feels that section 8 (a) (5) and 8 (b) (3) of the Taft-Hartley Act should be retained as part of the law. We have been inclined to feel that the mutuality of bargaining obligations was one of the important reforms made by the 1947 amendments to the Wagner Act, and we are disturbed, as no doubt he was, to see that the administration labor bill did not include any provisions requiring unions to bargain in good faith.

REGULATION OF BOTH EMPLOYERS AND UNIONS IN THE PUBLIC INTEREST

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 18–19; our question 17)

It is heartening to know that Mr. Jacobs feels that this question should be answered in the affirmative. We agree with him that neither management nor labor has a monopoly of virtue. It has always been our position that, where inequalities exist under the present law, they should be corrected.

UNFAIR PRACTICES BY UNIONS OR EMPLOYEES, AND GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS

(Mr. Jacobs, pp. 19–end; our question 8)

Despite the concluding part of Mr. Jacobs' letter, we do not think that we were as far apart as he implies, inasmuch as he says that he would answer this question, "Of course. No combination should be permitted to crush the individual." He suggests, therefore, that the only difference of opinion between us is in the unfair labor practices which should be agreed upon.

There is no doubt that a number of corporations in this country do have assets which exceed union assets, but it would be unreal not to acknowledge that unions have grown to such enormous power that, as an economist recently declared, they are "the greatest private economic power in the community." Prior to the enactment of the protective legislation, it is also true that many employers abused their power by insisting upon "yellow dog" contracts and other arrangements which were unfair to the workers.

As we think was made clear in testimony before the Senate committee on S. 249, it is not the position of General Electric that we should return to the pre-Wagner Act era. Mr. Jacobs recognizes, as we do, that many unions have also abused their power with regard to individual workers, but he apparently overlooks many of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act when he declares that this statute "regulated not the use, misuse, or abuse of this [union] power as directed against these individuals but curbed that power as it was pitted against the greater power of the employer for the benefit of the individual member." If Mr. Jacobs will examine in detail the list of enumerated unfair labor practices by unions under the Taft-Hartley Act, he will observe that most of them are directed primarily at protecting individual workers against abuses and that any benefit which employers may have received has been incidental.

Section 8 (b) (1) (A), for example, does not protect an employer from restraint or coercion by unions. It specifically protects only employees.

Section 8 (b) (2), moreover, which makes unions liable for causing employers to discriminate, is also protective legislation for the individual worker. As Mr. Jacobs undoubtedly knows, the decisions of the Labor Board are studded with cases in which unions compelled employers by their superior economic force to violate the rights of individual workers. NLRB v. Gluck Brewing Co. (144 F. (2d) 847, enforcing 47 NLRB 1079), Matter of Henri Wines (49 NLRB 511), Matter of Rutland Court Owners (44 NLRB 587), and NLRB v. Electric Vacuum (315 U. S. 685) are some of the cases that come readily to mind. In these cases the union was the moving party in the discrimination from which the employees suffered: but, because the old act penalized only employers, the employers concerned deemed it less disastrous to violate the act than to resist the economic pressure of the unions. Therefore, section 8 (b) (2) is a real deterrent against discriminatory tactics by unions, since it makes both parties liable for such conduct.

Mr. Jacobs is also familiar, of course, with the abuse of the secondary boycott to make workers in one plant who do not wish to join a particular union do so under the pressure from their own employer in order to enable him to continue to get supplies or to obtain a market for his products. See Harold Levinsohn Corp. v. Joint Board of Cloak, Suit, Skirt and Reefer Markers' Union, et al. (N. Y. Sup. Ct., App. Div., 22 LRRM 2153). Section 8 (b) (4) (A) must accordingly be viewed as a protection to the freedom of choice of the individual.

Similarly, section 8 (b) (5), which prohibits the exaction of excessive initiation fees when there are compulsory membership provisions in a collective-bargaining contract, and the amendments to section 8 (a) (3) which make it impossible for unions which practice racial discrimination to prevent workers in minority groups from pursuing their vocation are also designed to vindicate the rights of the individual against the missuse of union power.

It seems to us that the suggestions which Mr. Jacobs makes for replacing these provisions are subject to the objection that they bring the Federal Government too much into the internal affairs of labor organizations. As he is probably aware, provisions almost identical with those which he suggests were included in the original Hartley bill which passed the House. (See subsec. 8 (c) or H. R. 3020 prior to the conference agreement). These included requirements for secret ballots in union elections, opportunity to vote on assessments, equal status and rights among the members, notice and hearing prior to expulsion and suspension, and many others. The Senate conference apparently felt that these provisions were unnecessary as long as they inserted safeguards against the principal methods by which unions occasionally abuse their power over their members; e. g., closed shop, check-off of dues and assessments without consent, excessive fees, secondary boycott, and misuse of union welfare funds.

There should be no objection to a bill which contained provisions to give union members the remedies against union misconduct which Mr. Jacobs proposes, but we think that he would fail to go to the heart of the matter if he omitted the protections which the Taft-Hartley Act also established.

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

THURSDAY, MARCH 10, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10:20 a. m., Hon. Adam C. Powell, Jr., presiding.

Mr. POWELL. The subcommittee will kindly come to order, and our first witness this morning is Mr. H. L. Strobel.

Have a seat, Mr. Strobel, and state your name.

TESTIMONY OF H. L. STROBEL, A FARMER, OF MONTEREY COUNTY, CALIF.

Mr. STROBEL. My name is Hank Strobel. I am a farmer from Monterey County and have no source of income other than my farming operations.

I appreciate very much the opportunity to appear before this committee and to discuss briefly some of the reasons why agriculture thinks the Taft-Hartley bill should remain a law and the provisions of it should remain substantially the same. This legislation has certainly done much to bring about stable labor conditions and relations throughout the country. It provides protection on an equal basis for industry, labor, and the public. It has again clothed the individual worker with that dignity which is his inherent right as a citizen of this country. It has guaranteed him the right of freedom and choice to organize, or not to organize, as he, the employee, sees fit. It guarantees him the right to speak out for or against any question under consideration in his union without fear of economic retaliation by labor bosses. It has again restored to him the right to discuss his individual problems with his employer on a man-to-man basis.

I will not take the time of the committee to enumerate any other benefits this law has extended to the individual worker. It is my firm belief that no right of any individual worker or union has been unfavorably affected by this legislation. Some of the autocratic and dictatorial practices engaged in by labor bosses have been curtailed, but certainly that has been in the best interests of the public and the employees concerned.

With the efforts to repeal this law the problems that brought about its passage in the first place again become pertinent. Hot cargo and secondary-boycott practices; mass-picketing violence; jurisdictional disputes; the closed shop; lack of responsibility on the part of unions for their actions and the actions of their membership; the loss of labor, agriculture, and the public, due to irresponsible and costly strikes, called in many instances, without the full consent of employees involved.

One of the strongest arguments in favor of the Taft-Hartley law is found in comparing the strikes in 1946, the year preceding passage of the act, and 1948, the year immediately following. In 1946 there was a loss of 116,000,000 man-days, while in 1948 there was a loss of 34,000,000 man-days. These figures are from the Bureau of Labor Statistics and furnish the strongest argument in favor of the retention of this legislation. They also provide overwhelming proof that this act has accomplished more for labor, agriculture, industry, and the public than any piece of legislation passed in the last decade.

Inasmuch as agriculture is exempt from the provisions of this act, you may wonder why we are concerned with its retention. The answer is simple, gentlemen. Without the protection of certain provisions of this act, the productive efforts of agriculture are completely nullified. Of what us is it to the public for agriculture to produce and bring to the harvesting period a crop, if from that point on tie-ups over which we have no control and in which we have no direct concern, in transportation, processing or distribution, make it impossible for us to deliver our commodities and have them become available to the consuming public?

As far back as 1932 a systematic and well-organized attack was made on agriculture in California. This original attack was sponsored and carried on by many well-known members of the Communist Party. Unfortunately, during the years these efforts have not been confined to this type of leadership, but added to their efforts have been the efforts of many different unions—principally the teamsters' union and its subsidiaries.

We have had almost every product we produce declared as "hot" at one time or another in the past 15 years. We have had "hot" lettuce, "hot" turkeys, "hot" milk, "hot" oranges, "hot avocados, "hot" lemons, "hot" asparagus, "hot" peaches, "hot" spinach, "hot" peas, "hot" lambs, "hot" cattle, "hot" wool, "hot" strawberries; in fact, gentlemen, just take your pick and we will serve you a meal with no notice whatsoever, piping hot from the union ovens and well-seasoned with violence, hate, and economic disruptions.

The farmer was indeed very discouraged in 1947 and felt that in most cases without some protection such as the Taft-Hartley bill has afforded, he might just as well throw up his hands and quit. You may well ask what protection this act has afforded agriculture. It has done this: It has freed us from the paralyzing effects of hot cargo and secondary boycott bans invoked against our products many times when they were not even a part of the argument in dispute. It offers us protection from such crippling tie-ups as that which existed in 1945–47 in the California fruit and vegetable processing plants. These facilities were denied agriculture for long periods of time because of bitter intra- and inter-union jurisdictional warfare. There is every indication that a reoccurrence of these attacks can again be expected.

Do you wonder then that agriculture is concerned with this legislation and earnestly petitions that you gentlemen do not take away from us the protection we have under this law which, in a measure, makes it possible for us to continue our productive efforts to the end that the consuming public shall always be able to secure and have the foodstuffs necessary to the well-being of the people of this Nation?

I am going to discuss just a few of the instances mentioned earlier in this statement where our products were declared "hot." Let us take milk, for example, and the case of Dan Ryan, dairyman in Marin County, Calif.

Late in the fall of 1937—I would like to correct that, gentlemen: it should be 1936—Mr. Silva, a business agent for the teamsters union, approached Mr. Ryan with the demand that he sign a closed-shop agreement with the union, forcing his milkers into the Milkers' union of which they were not members and flatly stated they did not wish to become members. After several meetings in which Mr. Ryan declined to sign a contract which would force his workers into a union against their will, Mr. Silva sought and obtained sanction of the unions to place a hot-cargo ban against the delivery of Mr. Ryan's milk through the Borden Dairy Delivery Service in San Francisco. That hot-cargo ban was in existence for 600 days during which time Mr. Ryan was not allowed to deliver a drop of milk to the city of San Francisco, or any other plant in which the union had membership or affiliations. These attacks became so widespread that the farmers in self-defense were forced to purchase a stand-by plant in Point Reyes, Calif., at which they could process this "hot" milk. Today, this plant costing some $80,000, is not operating but stands as a bulwark between the people of San Francisco and hot-cargo practices of the union which would deny them their daily ration of milk. Because of the ability of the farmer to handle his milk in spite of the unions in northern California, these attacks have practically ceased. This is not the case, however, in the Los Angeles milkshed where such protection has not been attacked by the farmer.

The Los Angeles milkshed is the largest milkshed west of the Mississippi, servicing a population of approximately 4,000,000 people, who depend upon the producers of this area for their daily supply of milk. In 1946 the teamsters' union through its affiliate, the Dairy Milkers and Milk Drivers Union, declared open warfare upon the producers in this area, seeking to obtain closed-shop contracts and job control of all employment in this industry. Hot-cargo bans were invoked in the creameries and processors' plants against as many as 30 to 40 dairies at one time, causing a daily loss of from twenty to forty thousand gallons of milk. Where independent dairies operated not under union control, delivered milk, their delivery wagons were followed, their customers noted, and individuals in many cases called upon these customers insisting that they cease to purchase milk from that particular source. Intimidation and interference of all kinds was invoked. Many of these dairies under attack were operated by servicemen who had just returned from the armed services and who were seeking to establish themselves in business. The fact that the man involved owned a dairy, was doing his own milking, had no influence on the union whatsoever. They demanded that he either join the union himself or hire a union milker. When these demands were resisted, as I stated before, hot cargo and secondary boycott bans were invoked; efforts were made to cut off their feed supply; and their usual distribution outlet was denied them.

Late in 1946, when it became evident these tactics were going to be controlled by legislation, a truce was declared by the union and no interference was offered during the year 1947 when the act was passed, and in 1948, following the passage of the act.

Now, however, in anticipation that the protection afforded under the Taft-Hartley Act will be withdrawn, the unions are again entering the field and now have two dairies under attack, one operated by Mr. Walter Koning, 13615 S. Woodruff, Bellflower, Calif., and one operated by Roy Hutchinson, 13331 Newland, Westminster, Calif. These dairymen have been threatened with picket lines—not of their own employees because none of the employees of these two dairies have seen fit to join the union, using the protection afforded them under the Taft-Hartley law, which allows them to decide for themselves whether they shall or shall not become members of a union. The output of these two dairies is approximately 500 10-gallon cans per day. The employees of these two dairies are paid well above the union scale. In Mr. Koning's case, five employees are concerned, the lowest of which is paid $390 per month, while the highest averages $460 per month, this with 1 day off per week. These dairies use as their outlet Arden Farms Creamery, in Los Angeles. This creamery operates under a very tight union contract. The unions have informed Mr. Koning and Mr. Hutchinson that unless contracts satisfactory to the unions have been signed by January 31, a hot-cargo ban will be placed on their milk and Arden Farms Creamery will not be allowed to accept any milk from these two dairies after February 1. About 15 other dairymen in the Los Angeles milkshed have been indirectly told they will get the same treatment in case they refuse to sign a closed-shop contract with the union.

Asparagus is a very important crop in California. There are approximately 60,000 acres under production, located principally in Sacramento, Solano, San Joaquin, and Contra Costa counties. This production accounts for approximately 100 percent of the canned, white asparagus and about 60 percent of all the commercially packed asparagus in the United States. The growers of this very important crop have been under attack several times in the last 8 years. In 1941 a strike developed in the fields where unions sought closed-shop contracts covering the entire harvest operations. No points were involved in this strike other than closed-shop and job control. Union demands were resisted by the growers who stated they could not hope to operate their ranches under closed-shop conditions. A severe loss resulted with the growers eventually harvesting a portion of their crop without signing a union contract.

Immediately following this strike in the field, which, incidentally, concerned the harvest of green peas for fresh shipment, a paralyzing strike was declared in the canneries, denying to the growers the use of these facilities for the preserving and canning of their white asparagus. The loss to the growers amounted to about $1,750,000. It is impossible to estimate how much this cost the workers involved, in loss of wages.

From 1941 to 1948, because of war conditions very little interference was offered the producers of this crop. In 1948, however, the CIO union known as the Food, Tobacco, Agriculture and Allied Workers' Union of America, entered the area, demanding a 100-percent closed-shop contract covering all harvest activities in this industry. The demands were preposterous and could not be met by the growers.

A strike was declared and tremendous losses were inflicted upon the growers and workers alike, many of whom did not belong to this union and who would under no circumstances join. This attack was made during the month of May, which is peak harvest season. All types of interference was used: crews who refused to walk off their job were threatened; huge caravans of automobiles patrolled the area intimidating and seeking to frighten those men who remained on the job. Through the loyalty of certain workers and very fine cooperation of the law-enforcement agencies and citizens of this area, peace was eventually restored and the balance of the crop harvested. The loss caused by this strike was estimated to be about $1,250,000 to the growers; to the field workers, loss of wages, approximately $1,250,000; and to the cannery workers, loss in wages, approximately $750,000; a total loss to these three groups of about $3,250,000. The loss to the public cannot be estimated, but was reflected in higher prices for that portion of the crop which eventually reached the consumer's table.

I have cited these few instances, gentlemen, to call to your attention the terrific handicap under which agriculture operates in their daily efforts to supply the American table. Is it any wonder when you consider the handicaps offered by nature which cannot be controlled or overcome, that the farmers of this Nation are becoming very bitter and hostile to those man-made hurdles which are becoming daily more numerous and tougher to scale?

There is one other case I think will be interesting to this committee because it does bring out the direct aid to agriculture afforded by the Taft-Hartley Act. This case is the so-called strike on the Di Giorgio farms in Kern County. I say "so-called strike" because of some 1,200 to 1,500 workers involved only about 25 or 30 actual workers left Mr. Di Giorgio's employ and joined the picket line when this strike was called by Hank Hasiwar, western representative for the National Farm Labor Union, A. F. of L., upon refusal of Mr. Di Giorgio to discuss with him and negotiate a closed-shop contract covering his employees. Some 1,250 of these employees—which was the entire number employed on that particular day—signed a letter, presenting it to the sheriff of Kern County, Calif., saying they were not members of this union and had no intention of becoming members, and petitioning the sheriff to stop interference with them while entering and leaving the ranch to carry on their work. Later, when products from this ranch began to flow to market, the union attempted to invoke hot-cargo and secondary-boycott bans as far away as New York City. In one particular instance where bulk wine was transported from this to the Swiss-Italian Winery in the Fresno area, picket lines were thrown around the winery and across the railroad tracks into the winery, in an attempt to halt the movement of this wine to the winery. Mr. Di Giorgio petitioned the National Labor Relations Board under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, charging the unions with violation of same. The National Labor Relations Board made an investigation and petitioned the courts for an injunction prohibiting the unions from interfering with the movement of all products from this ranch. This order was signed by United States District Judge Pierson M. Hall, on July 15, 1948, docketed on July 15, 1948, book No. 4, page 415, in Los Angeles County.

Again, may I urge, gentlemen of the committee, that in the best interests of the majority of the people of this country that you retain in this act or any amended act, those provisions which restored to the American people certain freedoms which we cannot have without a stable economy; namely, freedom from paralyzing Nation-wide strikes; freedom from arbitrary restrictions on production and distribution of goods and services because of secondary boycotts and jurisdictional rows; freedom from political domination by either corporations or labor unions; freedom from added costs because of stand-by union rules, more commonly known as "feather bedding"; freedom from strikes by Government employees; and above all, freedom of an individual to exercise his rights of citizenship without fear of reprisals by employers or unions; assurances that the officers of unions certified for collective bargaining are not members of the Communist Party who seek to overthrow the United States Government by forceful or illegal means. This could be materially strengthened by requiring the same oath by employers or leaders of employer groups. Any American citizen should be proud to take such an oath.

In the past 16 years many varied and different types of legislation have been introduced—many experiments carried on supposedly in the best interest of everyone concerned. In my estimation the Taft-Hartley bill is the most important of all.

In my conclusion, let me say, in our efforts to make everybody happy, we have made that old saying, "The Lord helps those who help themselves" obsolete. Daily we are leaving less and less for Him to do, and I am not at all sure the current floods and freezing we are experiencing are not His way of showing his displeasure with us for musceling in on His job.

I thank you.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Strobel, you are a farmer?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWELL. You are a member of the Associated Farmers, Inc.?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWELL. Do you hold a position in the Associated Farmers, Inc.?

Mr. STROBEL. I am secretary-treasurer of the Associated Farmers, Inc., a nonpaying job, however.

Mr. POWELL. The Associated Farmers, Inc., a few years ago was investigated by the Senate Labor Committee, was it not?

Mr. STROBEL. Not the Senate Labor Committee. It was a committee headed by Senator La Follette.

Mr. POWELL. It was a special committee?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. POWELL. And since then, the Associated Farmers, Inc., has been a little bit different?

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir; I cannot say it is any different from the time we started out in 1934. There has been no change in our activities or policy of principles.

Mr. POWELL. The Associated Farmers, Inc., has been, what we might say, a separate organization, is it not, or is it subsidized by industrial enterprises?

Mr. STROBEL. Every member is a farmer in his own right. We have members of other types of industries who have a mutuality with agriculture in common interests. That support is brought about by the fact that the Associated Farmers, Inc., do not work entirely in the interests of their own membership. Any interference is attacked by the Associated Farmers, and they are interested and will aid that person, whether he is a member of the Associated Farmers, or not.

Mr. POWELL. The Associated Farmers represent very large farms, do they not?

Mr. STROBEL. From 5 acres to 15,000.

Mr. POWELL. Most of them are large?

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir; I would not say most of them are larger farmers. As I say, we make no difference in the type of farmer. We figure he is a farmer whether he has 5 acres or 5,000, and our membership is a fair cross section of all types of agriculture.

Mr. POWELL. Back to this situation, the Di Giorgio farms——

Mr. STROBEL. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. The Di Giorgio farms or corporation. Was it not true that a majority of the workers on that large farm met around October 1 and held a strike meeting?

Mr. STROBEL. The workers or the employees of the Di Giorgio farms?

Mr. POWELL. Yes.

Mr. STROBEL. They may have had a strike meeting, but not the employers.

Mr. POWELL. The employees?

Mr. STROBEL. The employees under Hathaway, but not the bulk of the employees. There may have been some of the Di Giorgio employees present, but the main group of the employees had no such meeting.

Mr. POWELL. About how many Di Giorgio workers were there, would you say?

Mr. STROBEL. I would not be able to answer that. I was not there.

Mr. POWELL. The sheriff of the county was there, was he not?

Mr. STROBEL. I could not say, because I was not there.

Mr. POWELL. Did not the Associated Farmers come into that strike later, and furnish help to the Di Giorgio Corp.?

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir, we never took any official part in that strike. Mr. Di Giorgio needed no help because his workers did not leave his employ.

Mr. POWELL. I heard that a public relations man of your organization worked with Mr. Di Giorgio during the strike.

Mr. STROBEL. That is not true. We have no public relations man in our organization.

Mr. POWELL. Did the Associated Farmers advise Mr. Di Giorgio not to meet with the strikers?

Mr. STROBEL. I would not say that we exactly advised him not to. It has been our advice to all farmers not to meet with any union representative who is seeking closed-shop contracts, because in most instances they do not represent the employees concerned. They are merely seeking to have a union contract in which they can force you to hire their union members, or force your employees to become members of a union, who do not wish to join, in many cases.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. As you probably know, Mr. Strobel, the Wagner Act excluded agricultural laborers from the definition of the term "employee," and the Taft-Hartley Act does the same.

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. This committee reported out a Minimum Wage and Fair Standards Labor Act yesterday, in which all farm activities were exempted. Farm laborers, therefore, do not have the right to join unions. Would you favor that the act be amended so that farm laborers would have the same right to organize as industrial employees, and that when a farmer hinders himself and his employees in their rights to join unions, he could be charged with an unfair labor practice under Federal law?

Mr. STROBEL. Certainly I would not. You would place the production of the necessary foodstuffs of your country in the hands of power-mad labor leaders who would use any method to bring employees into the union to satisfy their needs. They would have no compunction in starving the public to gain their ends.

Mr. BAILEY. Why would you ask special consideration for the farm group?

Mr. STROBEL. If any farm employee wishes to join the union there is no effort on our part to keep him from joining. We have many employees working on our ranches who are union members.

Mr. BAILEY. Did you not say you advised your members not to deal with them?

Mr. STROBEL. Not to sign closed-shop contracts; yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think the Taft-Hartley Act is fair in permitting farmers to commit unfair labor practices with impunity as far as the Federal law is concerned; but if a union commits an unfair labor practice against a farmer, such as imposing a secondary boycott, the farmer may immediately go to court and have the unfair union practice enjoined? In other words, do you not think that the Taft-Hartley Act should be discarded and a law written so that if farmers have privileges under such a law they will also be subject to all the responsibilities of the law?

Mr. STROBEL. Sir, I would say that if farmers were engaging in unfair labor practices such as you mentioned here, there are ways and means of controlling their activities. You have those ways and means already, and I know of no occasion when farmers have engaged in unfair labor practices against labor and against their employees. If we engaged in unfair practice against our employees, it would be impossible for us to get employees; but in most of the cases that are mentioned, these employees have had no desire to join any union, and have stayed with us and worked with us, and they feel more or less the same responsibility to the public that we do, that we have a job, to produce the food for this Nation, and we have to be free to exercise the rights of management, and to get the job done when it is necessary to be done. We cannot put off from day to day, or until tomorrow, what has to be done, and we cannot argue about whether that man is going to cultivate or irrigate, or this man is going to milk a cow; those jobs have to be done when it is necessary to do them, and we must be in a position to exercise the rights to get the job done, if you are going to eat.

Mr. BAILEY. Since you are from California, you are probably aware that California had a hot-cargo and secondary boycott law. You are also probably aware that in 1947 the State supreme court, in a case entitled "In Re Blaney," held the law unconstitutional because, among other reasons, the act violated the constitutional guaranty of freedom of speech and freedom of assembly. The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act as to secondary boycotts have not yet been tested in the United States Supreme Court, but such a test will be inevitable if these provisions are continued in the new labor law. In view of this, would you not agree that such matters as secondary boycotts and hot-cargo could best be handled by State statutes?

Mr. STROBEL. By what?

Mr. BAILEY. State laws.

Mr. STROBEL. Well, as far as the intrastate activities of agriculture are concerned, yes, they can be handled that way. But you have an interstate problem which is invoked against it to the other side of the question any time it arises, and so in many instances operations which we, in our way, think are purely intrastate, are declared by some administrator of these activities or by bureaucratic dictum to be interstate, and therefore we are faced with a Federal law from which we thought we were exempt. So that was the reason that the secondary boycott and hot-cargo law was passed in California. There is a difference of opinion as to its constitutionality, and I think I can safely say that such laws will again be enacted in California. At least, attempts will be made to enact such legislation on a State-wide basis.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe, Mr. Strobel, you mentioned the Di Giorgio case and the injunction issued by Judge Hall. I do not take your statement to imply that Judge Hall considered the strike to be unjust. All that Judge Hall did was to find that the union engaged in a secondary boycott. Since the court found that a boycott existed, he was required under the Taft-Hartley law to issue the injunction automatically without regard to the merits of the case: is that not correct?

Mr. STROBEL. I do not remember that Judge Hall took any stand whatsoever upon whether the strike was right or wrong. I have some copies of that injunction. If you would like to have them, I will supply them here.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to make that point right here, and I want to read Judge Hall's comment into the record, Mr. Chairman. The case referred to by the witness as the Di Giorgio case is LeBaron v. Kern County Farm Union (23 L. R. R. M. 2077). Judge Hall in issuing this injunction said:

> I want to again emphasize the fact that in my views the power conferred upon the court in such a case as this is a very narrow power and that whatever I have said in connection with this matter, or my conclusions now, or anything that I have said during the course of the hearing, is not to be construed as an indication as to whether the strike is just or unjust, or whether any of the acts or conduct of any of the persons or unions or organizations involved, whether labor organizations or whether otherwise, are or are not unfair labor practices.

Mr. WERDEL. Does the gentleman yield there for a minute?

Mr. BAILEY. I yield.

Mr. WERDEL. Would you put into the record what you are quoting from there and where it came from?

Mr. POWELL. I have it here.

Mr. WERDEL. I notice you are reading from a typewritten sheet. Was that prepared by the Department of Labor? Or what are you reading from?

Mr. BAILEY. I am reading from some notes that I have here, Mr. Werdel.

Mr. WERDEL. I notice you both seem to have the same notes.

Mr. POWELL. I do not have his notes.

Mr. WERDEL. I just wondered where it came from, if we can get it in the record, because the gentleman's time has already expired.

Mr. POWELL. We are keeping track of that, and I will tell him when his time has expired.

Mr. WERDEL. Will you put in the record where it came from?

Mr. JACOBS. On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, is it the province of one member of the committee to inquire of another member of the committee where he procured his notes or information from which he frames his questions?

Mr. POWELL. No, but a member can ask a question. If the other member does not choose to answer, that is all there is to it.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Chairman, when someone reads words of a Federal judge into this record, I take it it is the province of all of us to see whether they are correct.

Mr. POWELL. No.

Mr. WERDEL. I am asking the question of where they came from.

Mr. POWELL. You asked the question of Mr. Bailey where they came from, and Mr. Bailey did not answer.

Mr. Bailey, you have one more minute.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. No questions, but I will reserve my time.

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Chairman, may I ask a question? I understand that you cannot reserve time.

Mr. POWELL. No; they cannot reserve time for another witness. But if another member desires to question the witness, one can yield time to that member.

Mr. NIXON. But he cannot yield time for the purpose of questioning another witness longer. As far as I am concerned he can question him any time, as long as we all follow the same rules. But I want it one way or the other.

Mr. POWELL. That is correct. You cannot yield time on one particular witness in order to question another witness longer.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Strobel, what position did you say you held with the Associated Farmers?

Mr. STROBEL. I am secretary and treasurer of the Associated Farmers of California.

Mr. PERKINS. How long have you been active in that capacity?

Mr. STROBEL. I cannot say exactly, sir, but I think from around either 1938 or 1939 I have been treasurer of the organization, and for the last 2 years I have also been secretary. We combined the two jobs as a matter of convenience.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, I will ask you whether you have any information about some of the officers of the Associated Farmers testifying under oath that their organization was financed by a number of industrial concerns, mainly for the purpose of preventing unions from being organized in rural areas?

Mr. STROBEL. No; I have no such information that any of our group testified to under oath. They may have. We have no control over our officers. I would like to point out to this group at this time that the Associated Farmers of California is an organization comprised of whatever local——

Mr. PERKINS. All right. Just answer my questions. I do not have much time.

Mr. STROBEL. Well, I do not know.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you have any knowledge of any testimony given by officers of your organization to that effect?

Mr. STROBEL. No; I have no knowledge of that. At least, to my recollection, I have no knowledge of that.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, is it not now true that your organization is still being subsidized by members of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association?

Mr. STROBEL. I would say this—there may be some members of the Merchants and Manufacturers Association as individuals or corporations that contribute to our organization but the Merchants and Manufacturers Association or organization, which you speak of, does contribute to our organization.

Mr. PERKINS. To what extent would you tell this committee that they contribute?

Mr. STROBEL. I would say to the extent of close to $20,000 a year, with the allied support that we receive.

Mr. PERKINS. Are you sure that they stop at the figure of $20,000 a year?

Mr. STROBEL. I am absolutely certain of it, sir, because I happen to be the treasurer, and those——

Mr. PERKINS. Do you have that data along with you?

Mr. STROBEL. No; I have not, sir, but I can tell you this, that at no time since I——

Mr. PERKINS. Would you care to put that data in the record and make it a part of your testimony in this case?

Mr. STROBEL. I would not care to put that data in the record. I will state so, and that is just the same as any data that you might get.

Mr. PERKINS. Why do you object to putting it in the record?

Mr. STROBEL. Because I do not have the data here, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Will you furnish the clerk of the committee with it at a later date and let him put it in the record?

Mr. STROBEL. I do not see that there is any point in my furnishing that data. I will state here that we do receive such support, that it is around $20,000 a year now; that it has been as high as $27,000, and that that is the extent of the allied, or industrial support that our organization receives.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not true that a strike of the employees of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. was called on October 1, 1947, following the refusal of the officials of your corporation to meet with a committee of their own employees?

Mr. STROBEL. No. I would say this, in answer to that, Mr. Perkins, that our organization has no control whatsoever over Mr. Di Giorgio's operations. Mr. Di Giorgio handles his own business; he hires his own employees, and our organization never seeks to interfere in the handling of any private individual operation.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you know Mr. Di Giorgio personally?

Mr. STROBEL. I know Mr. Di Giorgio very well; yes, sir. I have known Mr. Di Giorgio for——

Mr. PERKINS. What is his capacity with the fruit corporation? Is he the chief owner or not?

Mr. STROBEL. I understand that it is a corporation, and I am sure that Mr. Di Giorgio is at the present time the chief owner; yes.

Mr. PERKINS. And you know the extent of the ownings of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp.?

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir; I do not know the extent of the ownings of the Di Giorgio Fruit Corp. I know that they are extensive. At least, I believe them to be very extensive.

Mr. PERKINS. About how extensive would you tell this committee they were?

Mr. STROBEL. I could not tell you, sir. I think I can say this, that the ranch in question, which is perhaps one of the subjects you would like to have answered—the ranch in question in Kern County has also been referred to as 20,000 acres by the union——

Mr. PERKINS. To refresh your recollection, I will ask you if according to your information he does not own about 30,000 acres of farm land, the largest farm in the world, and either controls or influences the fresh fruit and the vegetable markets of the principal cities of the United States; among the markets he controls are the New York Fruit Auction Corp., the Baltimore Fruit Exchange, and if you do not further know that, from his financial statement, he has holdings worth in excess of $14,000,000?

Mr. STROBEL. Sir, I could not answer that. I will say this, that to my knowledge I know none of the things. I heard, just the same as everyone else, that he has large holdings. I believe that those statements you have made may be correct. However, I would say that I have never made any detailed study of Mr. Di Giorgio's holdings.

Mr. PERKINS. Will you state whether you have heard that he netted a profit of approximately $3,000,000 after his taxes had been paid in 1946?

Mr. STROBEL. No, I have not heard anything like that. That could probably be true. But I have made no investigation, as I say, of Mr. Di Giorgio's financial standing or operation. To me he is just another farmer.

Mr. PERKINS. Is it not true that a meeting of over 700 workers employed by the corporation was held on the night of September 31, 1947, in the Grange Hall, and that they voted unanimously to walk out the following day?

Mr. STROBEL. I could not answer as to whether such a meeting was held or not, because I was not present. I would say this, though, that——

Mr. PERKINS. Did you hear anything about the meeting? Can you give any information about it?

Mr. STROBEL. No, I did not hear anything about that meeting, but I can state that no 700 workers ever walked off Mr. Di Giorgio's ranch.

Mr. PERKINS. Are you positive about that?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir, I am positive about that.

Mr. PERKINS. What about 650? Are you positive about that figure?

Mr. STROBEL. Would you allow me in my own way——

Mr. PERKINS. No. I do not have much time. Just answer my question.

Mr. POWELL. One minute, Mr. Perkins.

Mr. STROBEL. I would say, no, that no 650 employees ever walked off Mr. Di Giorgio's ranch.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, I will ask you if it is not a fact that the Associated Farmers——

Mr. JACOBS. I waived my time. I yield my time to Mr. Perkins.

Mr. POWELL. Excuse me, Mr. Perkins. Mr. Jacobs waived his time to you. So you have more time.

Mr. PERKINS. At this point, I do not care to consume any more time. I will just retract my question.

Thank you. That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Very well. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Strobel, I would like to pursue further the questioning about the happenings during the particular strike that you referred to in your testimony on the Di Giorgio Farms. Is that the proper title?

Mr. STROBEL. The Di Giorgio Fruit Corp., yes, or the Di Giorgio Farms, as it is known in Kern County.

Mr. BURKE. I believe that at the time, friends and associates of the Di Giorgio Corp., issued a pamphlet entitled "A Community Aroused"; is that not true?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. And in that pamphlet they stated that the corporation provided swimming pools and other recreational facilities for the employees of the farm.

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. How large is that swimming pool?

Mr. STROBEL. I could not tell you the size of it, sir. I have one of those pamphlets, or I have several of them I would be glad to give to the committee to look at. It shows the type of housing and the swimming pool. I will show you one of the swimming pools here and some of the tennis courts and other facilities provided.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask that Mr. Strobel be permitted to present the pamphlet to the committee for inclusion in the record.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have more than one?

Mr. STROBEL. I have three here, sir. I could furnish you more of them if you would like.

Mr. POWELL. Do you desire it to be included in the record, Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. Without objection, it will be so ordered.

(The pamphlet referred to is as follows:)

A COMMUNITY AROUSED

Kern County, Calif., is one of the first 10 counties of the United States in agricultural production. Even so, it is still learning and growing, and it is still peopled by the pioneers who built it.

In 1947 Kern County heard of the National Farm Labor Union for the first time. An A. F. of L. affiliate, it was headed by H. L. Mitchell, national president, formerly a member of the executive committee of the Southern Tenant Farmers Union, an affiliate of the CIO and according to pages 679 to 682 of the 1938 report of the House Un-American Activities Committee, an associate in that CIO venture with Donald Henderson, a known Communist.

Early in 1947 a man named Hank Hasiwar, western organizer for this newly formed National Farm Labor Union, boldly announced he was going to attempt to organize all of the farm workers in California. Newly arrived from Texas, Hasiwar began holding mass meetings in farm communities, supported by a few of the local labor unions in Bakersfield, the county seat.

Hasiwar picked Di Giorgio Farms, pioneer development in the extreme southern portion of the fertile San Joaquin Valley, for his focal point in the first drive.

With the coming of the grape harvest, Hasiwar demanded the farm adopt and accept industrial unionism control of the workers on the farm, under threat of a strike at harvest time. The demands were ignored.

Picket lines were placed on the ranch October 1, 1947, in an unsuccessful attempt to stop grape picking and packing. Mitchell then arrived from Tennessee to inspect the picket lines and then began issuing propaganda press releases on a national scale. Even train crews bringing cars to the packing shed were stopped until their own union committee investigated the "strike," after which they went through the lines.

A union crew at the Di Giorgio winery is still going through the picket lines.

Failure to stop the harvest brought extravagant propaganda claims from the union, then Nation-wide circulation of defamatory statements about farmers and the way they were "treating" farm workers.

Finally Kern County, as a community, became aroused as inquiries began to come in from many places.

This is Kern County's answer to one portion of the slanderous attack.

My Dear Bill: * * * (Here is) a statement appearing on the right-hand editorial page of the (Atlanta) Constitution yesterday. Mr. Ickes is deeply concerned over the situation at Arvin and like everything else that he deals in he knows little or nothing about it; shows no understanding yet is willing to tell the world exactly how it all ought to be managed. I wish you would read the article very carefully and check it against the facts and that you would let me have those facts. * * *

Plight of the Migrant Farm Laborers

(By Harold L. Ickes)

In the tradition, if not the spirit of the Pilgrim Fathers, the Nation today will offer up a special thanks for its obvious blessings. It will give thanks for the feeling of content and security that derives from our vast national cornucopia overflowing with golden corn, wheat of the color of falling leaves, to say nothing of the plenitudes of nuts and luscious fruits.

Yes, America may well say grace in round and sonorous phrases today. But it is not likely to give even a fleeting thought to the desperate plight of the more than 2,500,000 migrant farm laborers whose calloused hands harvested this bounty against the coming of Thanksgiving.

I have said before that food and aid for starving western Europe are unquestionably necessary, and that America can and must provide both. But we should not allow the vastness of this critical problem across the seas to blind our eyes to an equally dire, if less widespread, need for succor at home. It is generous of us to help the sicken of other lands; it would be only simple justice that we also render aid to our own. We can do both.

Millions of Americans do not even know that migrant labor constitutes one of our persistent problems. The notorious name of the Associated Farmers of California means nothing to them. Neither does the fact that migrant farm laborers are being treated more shamefully than were their prototypes in the dark ages. I suspect that I will not be spoiling a holiday dinner if I should introduce the public to a migrant farm family, typical of hundreds of thousands of actual farm slaves in the West.

In the fashion then, of Ebenezer Scrooge, if you will take my hand, we will visit a hovel in the Arvin labor camp, near Bakersfield, Calif. * * * Ah, here we are. This is the "home" of John and Stella Gorman and their four children—Nora, 10; George, 7; Mable, 2; and Gladys, under 1.

As you can see, the Gormans have just finished saying grace. They obviously are thankful for the crusts on their table, as it is all that they have. Their home, as you will see, is a one-room shack, the pot-bellied stove and the electric light bulb are the only household equipment provided this hapless family by a miserly landlord.

The Gormans share plumbing facilities with several dozens of their fellow laborers in an unhygienic community building, which we will avoid. Those are homemade beds in the corners, covered with cheap chenille. That calendar on the wall is, of course, an ornament. Days mean little to farm slaves. The table on which rests their travesty of a Thanksgiving dinner is crudely constructed from chance boards. Mr. Gorman and his wife pay $5 a week rent. But they will not be able long to afford this, because they are unemployed.

With 1,500 other members of the National Farm Labor Union, A. F. of L., they are out on strike against the Di Giorgio Farm Corp., an outfit which grows plums, apricots, and grapes. The human chattels quit work to force their employer at least to agree to discuss such (to them) life or death matters as better hours, an increase in the pittance they call wages, and more acceptable working conditions. Included among the strikers were 130 Mexican nationals, working under contract between the Mexican and the United States Governments.

These serfs sought to walk out along with others, but they were prevented by the orders of arrogant officials of the United States Department of Agriculture. In effect, those officials threatened: "Either act as strikebreakers here or be deported to Mexico." This high-handed action brought protest from the Mexican Embassy to the State Department, resulting in a promise that the Mexicans would be removed from the strike-bound area.

Meanwhile, the Di Giorgio Corp. is able to operate on a reduced scale. Naturally the agricultural slaves are the chief sufferers. Until now the Gormans have maintained a roof over the heads of their children. We will not examine the roof too closely, but the climate is a dry one. The family has no money, but it is accustomed to this, as are the other strikers. There is no church to attend, no medical services, no recreational facilities. During the war the Federal Government saw to it that a few of these migrant families were decently housed. But peace brought the end of this unwanted consideration.

What remain of Government-built labor camps have been either leased or sold. The gentle Associated Farmers leased the Arvin Camp, where we are now, and at once raised the rents and abolished all comforts and services. Long hours and meager pay are their ideas of social obligation. But we must leave the Gormans to their hopes and dreams of a better day and return to our Thanksgiving Day dinners, the first one of which, indulged in by the Pilgrim Fathers, was made possible by the great-hearted Massasoit. Take my hand again, while we whisk back to the hearthside of a happy, well-fed America. We will drink a toast to the richest Nation on earth.

W. B. Camp & Sons, Inc.,
Bakersfield, Calif., December 19, 1947.

Mr. C. A. Cobb,
Owner, Ruralist Press, Inc., Atlanta, Ga.

My Dear Cully: Your letter of November 28, enclosing a copy of the statement made by Harold L. Ickes in his column in the Atlanta Constitution on Thursday, November 27, is very much appreciated.

I am not alone in my appreciation of your interest in sending this to us because it has been the subject of considerable discussion among the farmers of Kern County.

First let me say that while we are all, as farmers, concerned about the inflammatory, untrue propaganda statements made by Ickes about our particular agricultural area and the people who live in it, I think on the other hand those of us who have helped build this community take some pride in being blasted by the incorrigible Ickes and take a pride in joining that ever-growing throng upon whom he vents his ire.

For it seems to us here, that in being placed with that group we are being placed among the people who have made America great through belief in working and fighting for free enterprise and a free people, as opposed to bureaucratic governmental controls by the crackpots and the left-wingers.

A number of our community leaders were so incensed by the Harold Ickes article that a committee was voluntarily formed of men from various civic organizations of the community—men who are members of our Rotary Club, our Bakersfield Chamber of Commerce, our Kern County Chamber of Commerce, our Kiwanis Club and headed by the publisher and general manager of our local daily paper, which as you know, is the leading newspaper of the southern San Joaquin Valley.

This committee was formed for one sole purpose—to go to Di Giorgio Farms, there to personally make their own study of the true facts of the situation as compared with the statement made by Ickes.

The facts of the matter are that what Ickes calls a "strike," is in actuality an invasion of Kern County agriculture headed by outsiders, using the name of A. F. of L. National Farm Labor Union, but using similar tactics to Communist agitators in an attempt to organize workers who do not want to join the union, and impose industrial unionism on seasonal agriculture with an attempted stoppage of the harvest.

Harold Ickes in his own inimitable way is parroting the statements of the out-of-State leader of this incited disturbance—a man who has failed in his task and is now desperately attempting, through national publicity, to collect a tremendous war chest from labor unions all over the United States, to use in a campaign for left-wing labor dictatorship over our agriculture.

Ickes' statement is as farfetched as John Steinbeck's Grapes of Wrath. And with your having been out here and visited these very farms on which these occurrences have taken place, I am sure that you can bear witness with us that our wage scales are higher, our living conditions better for our farm workers than in any place in the United States.

In fact along with the other farmers of our community, I am very proud of the progress we have made in building a community composed of farmers and farm workers, where mutual concern for the community has resulted in one of the most highly productive agricultural areas in the world and a prosperous community for all.

Naturally we object and fight when left-wing labor agitators attempt to utilize the sympathy of the American public to force us to bow to their dictatorial demands and give them control of our economy.

This picket line on the Di Giorgio ranch is propaganda and partly an attempt to force simultaneously, the company to sign a closed-shop contract, and the workers to join the union to pay dues. The attempt has failed and the labor union has grown hysterical in its statements, resulting in parroting by such people as Ickes, who completely disregarded facts in an effort to go all out sensationally on the theory that more and more bureaucratic control is what we need.

I am attaching hereto the report of the committee which I mentioned earlier in regard to their investigation of Ickes' statement and the actual facts of the matter. In fact, one of the members, Harry G. Thompson, is president of the National Cotton Ginners Association and will be in Atlanta in January for a meeting of that group. I have asked him to look you up and I hope that you can arrange a luncheon discussion of this subject with the editor of the Constitution.

Sincerely yours,

W. B. CAMP.

A REPORT

On Thursday, November 27, 1947, a number of newspapers in the United States, among them the Atlanta Constitution of Atlanta, Ga., carried a syndicated column written by Harold L. Ickes, in which a great deal of space was given to the plight of "Migrant farm laborers" in Kern County.

We, the undersigned members of a special committee, believing such erroneous information being distributed nationally by a public figure is detrimental to our community, have personally investigated the situation referred to by Mr. Ickes and hereby report our findings as related to Mr. Ickes' statements:

Mr. Ickes says: "With 1,500 other members of the National Farm Labor Union, A. F. of L., they are out on strike against the Di Giorgio Farms Corp., an outfit which grows plums, apricots, and grapes."

The facts are: Labor organizers placed a picket line on the ranch October 1. The workers did not strike. Of 1,445 persons employed at the time, 540 of them reported for work the day the picket line was established and that number grew daily after that. An economic survey of the Southeastern San Joaquin Valley, prepared early this year for the Kern County Board of Supervisors and the water resources committee of the Kern County Chamber of Commerce, shows that on Di Giorgio Farms in the same month of 1946, no transient farm labor was employed and only 110 resident temporary workers were used with all other workers employed being permanent labor. This same report shows that 91.7 percent of all labor required on the Di Giorgio Farms is permanent worker filled; 6.8 percent is filled by resident temporary workers and only 1.5 percent is filled by transient workers throughout the entire year.

Mr. Ickes says: "The human chattels quit work to force their employer at least to agree to discuss such (to them) life or death matters as better hours, an increase in the pittance they call wages, and more acceptable working conditions." "Days mean little to slaves."

The facts are: Employees at Di Giorgio Farms receive the highest agricultural wages paid in the community with the minimum wage being 80 cents an hour. The average wage of all the workers employed at Di Giorgio Farms during the month of October 1947 was $202.47. Official Government reports show the average monthly pay of farm workers in California is $192 and in the United States, $112.

Mr. Ickes says: "Included among the strikers were 130 Mexican nationals. * * * These serfs sought to walk out along with the others * * *."

The facts are: At no time did any of the Mexican nationals join in any of the activities of the picket line. Instead, they kept at work and when the labor leaders demanded they be returned to Mexico, these nationals, using the sheriff of Kern County as their interpreter, signed statements stating (1) their satisfaction with working conditions on the Di Giorgio Farms, and (2) their desire to complete their contract with the ranch, and (3) their desire to return in 1948 if it is possible.

Congressman Alfred J. Elliott (Democrat), representing this district, personally investigated the situation at that time and was quoted in the Bakersfield Californian as follows (October 18, 1947): "I have visited the Di Giorgio Farms on two occasions where there is picketing by outsiders in an effort to cause trouble with inside workers and Mexican nationals. To date, with imported picket lines, they have not succeeded in efforts to cause inside workers to leave their jobs. * * * If there were sufficient laborers to harvest the agricultural crops of California, I would be the first to ask the removal of the Mexican nationals, giving our own people the employment."

Mr. Ickes says: "Meanwhile the Di Giorgio Corp. is able to operate on a reduced scale."

The facts are: That while operations of picking and packing fruit were slowed down the first few days of intimidation with mass picketing at the farm, as soon as it was evident the law-enforcement officials would be present at all times to prevent mob action with violence, additional regular employees of the farm reported for work so that normal operations were resumed within 3 days. The work of harvesting the grape crop was completed and normal pruning operations in the orchards and vineyards have begun.

Mr. Ickes says: "Their home (John and Stella Gorman and family) as you will see, is a one-room shack, the pot-bellied stove and the electric light bulb are the only household equipment provided this hapless family by a miserly landlord."

The facts are: There is no basis for the implication that the Gormans live, or have ever lived on Di Giorgio Farms. The Gorgmans live several miles from the farm in housing which Di Giorgio Farms does not, nor has ever owned or controlled. Implications and statements of abject poverty do not check with pay-roll records. Gorman works in various harvests of the area, potatoes, fruit, and grapes. Di Giorgio Farms pay-roll records show that in his last employment there, Gorman worked a total of 65½ days during the grape harvest, earned a total of $419.60, an average of $6.40 per day, or $167.84 per month. It is emphasized that he did not work full time at Di Giorgio Farms during this period.

Mr. Ickes says: "There is no church to attend. * * *"

The facts are: Within a radius of 7 miles (most are 3 to 4 miles) of Di Giorgio Farms, there are the following churches which conduct regular services: Three Baptist, one Methodist, two Assembly of God, one Catholic, one Congregational, one Gospel Tabernacle. During the time of employment of Mexican nationals, they were provided free bus transportation to church services. Free bus transportation is also provided for children who wish to attend Sunday school when their parents do not care to drive in to town.

Mr. Ickes says: "No medical services * * *."

The facts are: An eminently qualified physician and surgeon, Dr. D. H. DeSmet, has lived on Di Giorgio Farms for more than 10 years, serving the surrounding communities.

Mr. Ickes says: "* * * no recreational facilities."

The facts are: Excellent recreational facilities are available at Di Giorgio Farms and surrounding communities. The Di Giorgio Farms softball team, sponsored by the farm, with uniforms, equipment, and transportation furnished by the farm, won the Kern County softball championship in 1947. Di Giorgio Farms donated 40 acres of its best land plus $150,000 in cash for improvement of the public school on the farm, including the best recreational facilities, playgrounds, gymnasiums, and modern equipment. Tennis courts and other game facilities are maintained on the farm. Sports and recreational activities are encouraged on the farm.

Mr. Ickes says: "What remain of Government-built labor camps have been leased or sold. The gentle Associated Farmers leased the Arvin Camp, where we are now, and at once raised the rents and abolished all comforts and services."

The facts are: When Congress decided against continuation of Farm Security Administration operation of the farm labor camp at Arvin, a group of private farmers of that community, not the Associated Farmers, assumed the lease and obligation of operation. They kept the same manager, Mr. Dewey Russell, who for 6 years had operated the camp under Government supervision, in order to provide the same and improved services for workers residing there. In addition, inasmuch as inference is made by Mr. Ickes that all Di Giorgio Farms employees must live under extremely meager housing conditions, it is well to point out that Di Giorgio Farms furnishes 132 houses on the farm for regular employees. There is no rent charged for these but a utility fee of $3 per month is charged for such services as water, garbage disposal, etc. The farm lost $18,000 on this rent-free worker housing project in 1946, which they charge off as worth while from an employee-relations viewpoint. The same reasoning is used in a loss of $49,000 in the operation of bunkhouses and dining rooms for the single men employed on the farm, where room and board is provided for $1.25 per day. The committee visited all of these facilities, found them to be in excellent condition, under constant inspection of the Kern County Health Department, and found that in addition to housing, most of the resident employees had been provided with space for vegetable and flower gardens, poultry pens, etc.; that facilities are provided on the farm without cost for such organizations and activities as the YMCA, Boy Scouts, Red Cross, etc. The committee found that approximately 200 children living at the camp attended excellent schools, with two bus loads daily attending Kern County Union High School and Junior College in Bakersfield.

Mr. Ickes says: "Long hours and meager pay are their (the farmers') ideas of social obligation."

The facts are: That Government statistics have shown for many years that California agriculture pays the highest wage rates in the United States and that Kern County wage rates are among those highest. As pointed out in this report about the one farm mentioned by Mr. Ickes, Kern County farmers are constantly improving housing conditions and working with their workers and other residents of their communities to provide improved public recreational and other social facilities. These same public facilities are available to worker and farmer alike.

The committee makes this report in the interest of justice and fair play, feeling that much injury has been done to Kern County as a growing and prosperous community by the publishing of statements such as those made by Mr. Ickes. Were the statements made by Mr. Ickes true in even a few regards as to conditions prevalent in Kern County than neither this county or California would be enjoying the greatest population growth of any area in the United States. It seems obvious that millions of people would not be trekking to California in order to be downtrodden, and in spite of such misleading statements, we feel that California will continue to be the mecca of many who come here and stay because of better pay and better living conditions.

Respectfully submitted in the hope of correcting the impressions created by Mr. Ickes.

Walter Kane, Chairman; C. L. Whelden, Harry G. Thompson, C. P. Lake, A. H. Walker, Frank Jeppi, G. B. Crome, J. K. Thrasher, Richard Leask, E. G. Buerkle, John J. Kovacevich.

Mr. BURKE. There were at the time of the strike some 1,300 or more employees, were there not?

Mr. STROBEL. I believe, as nearly as I can remember, there were between 1,350 and 1,500 employees on the ranch, at the time the so-called strike was called; yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. It would take a pretty large swimming pool to accommodate that many employees and their families.

Mr. STROBEL. I do not think there was every any intention of 1,350 people going in swimming at one time. They have two swimming pools there that are at the call or use of the workers any time they see fit to use them.

Mr. BURKE. Actually, were they not more for the use of the officials of the corporation and their families?

Mr. STROBEL. I could not say as to just exactly what the extent was. They were there. The workers were welcome to them. I would like to say that Mr. Di Giorgio maintains a very close relationship with his workers, and they have a very fine employer-employee relationship, and if those swimming pools were there and they were said to be available to the workers, they were and are available to the workers.

Mr. BURKE. During the time of the strike, I understand the representatives of the corporation went to Texas to recruit Mexican nationals as strikebreakers; is that right?

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir; that is absolutely not right. There was never any need to import any workers or strikebreakers on Mr. Di Giorgio's ranch, because no amount of his employees left his employ that would make such recruitment necessary.

Mr. BURKE. Was it not the policy of the corporation to hire Anglo-Americans prior to the strike?

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir. I have here with me a statement by 1,250 of Mr. Di Giorgio's employees, a letter addressed to the Kern County sheriff, signed by these twelve-hundred-and-fifty-odd employees, which were all of the employees working on the ranch that day. It was unsolicited. They got it themselves and presented it to the sheriff of Kern County. And if the committee would care to have a copy of that—I cannot give them this copy I have here with me—I can let you see it and let you read it if you care to. But I will furnish you with additional copies of that particular letter signed by 1,250 of Mr. Di Giorgio's employees saying that they did not belong to the union and had no desire to join this union.

Mr. BURKE. Would you furnish it for the record, Mr. Strobel?

Mr. STROBEL. I will. I will furnish it for the record, and if you care to see it at this time, sir, I will furnish it to you.

Mr. BURKE. That is not necessary, because my time is very limited. We have just 10 minutes.

Mr. STROBEL. I see.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

We, the undersigned workers at Di Giorgio Farms, whose residence here reaches up to 25 years, have read statements made by people who are nonresidents and who we do not know, to the effect that the people working on this ranch are dissatisfied with wages and living conditions. We wish to state that we are quite satisfied here, and know that we are getting better wages, better food, and living conditions than any farm worker in the United States of America. We also wish to state that we have so advised the management of Di Giorgio Farms that we do not want to join any farm labor union as we are capable of representing ourselves.

[SEAL] PEARL ROBINSON,
Notary Public in and for the County of Kern, State of California.

My commission expires August 26, 1950.

Mr. BURKE. Do you know if there were any illegal aliens imported during the strike for work on the ranch?

Mr. STROBEL. I could not say that, sir. I do not think that anyone would be capable of saying whether there was an illegal alien employed in California or not. It is common practice for many Mexicans to cross the border and come over on our side of the line to seek employment. Many of those men are imported and very few questions are asked the average Mexican when he seeks employment, as to whether he came into this country on a visa, or what.

Mr. BURKE. Your answer is that you do not know?

Mr. STROBEL. I do not know; that is right.

Mr. BURKE. On May 17, 1948, was there an attempt made to assassinate leaders of the strike, and Mr. James S. Price, who was president of the local union, was shot down by an unknown gunman while he was presiding over a meeting in a private home?

Mr. STROBEL. I would say what the newspapers said; that such a talk was made, that shots were fired into the house. According to the newspapers, Mr. Price was one of the men that was struck by such a shot.

Mr. BURKE. It is my understanding that the company's doctor, the doctor hired by the Di Giorgio Co., was the only doctor available or near the scene at the time, and that he refused to render fair aid to Mr. Price while he was lying there waiting for the arrival of the ambulance from Bakersfield, some 18 miles away.

Mr. STROBEL. I have no knowledge of anything of that nature, sir. I have never even heard of it. That is the first I have ever heard of such a statement.

Mr. BURKE. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I was necessarily a little tardy in getting up here and I did not hear the statement or some of the remarks. Not being personal, I would like to inquire as to the witness' educational and professional background.

Mr. STROBEL. My background?

Mr. IRVING. Yes, sir.

Mr. STROBEL. I am a farmer, sir. I have farmed all my life. Since around 1907 I have been engaged in farming activities and have never been employed other than a few years as a very young man, when I worked some in a shoe store. But most of my entire life has been in agriculture.

Mr. IRVING. Are you a lawyer?

Mr. STROBEL. Am I a lawyer?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir. Unfortunately, I had to quit school at the age of 14 and go to work.

Mr. IRVING. I do not have too many questions, but I noticed you said you became secretary-treasurer of the association in 1938.

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. IRVING. Were you in charge of the vigilante groups in Solano County which used tear gas against the striking lettuce shed workers in the 1936 lettuce strike?

Mr. STROBEL. Was I in charge of vigilantes? Was that the question, sir?

Mr. IRVING. Yes; in the strike involving about 3,500 workers.

Mr. STROBEL. Absolutely not, sir. There were no vigilantes in that strike. Every man that was engaged in law-enforcement activities in that strike was a deputy sheriff sworn in by the sheriff of Monterey County and had direct orders from the sheriff of Monterey County for all of his activities. Arm bands were on those people who were deputized by the sheriff to maintain law and order, and I do not know how many, exactly, there were. I would say there were between 1,200 and 1,500 such men, from the first to the last of the strike; that the riots that they were deputized to put down involved some 3,500 workers; that we had to close the schools in Salinas for 3 days because it was unsafe for the children to go back and forth to school.

Mr. IRVING. We all lived at the time. I wish you would answer.

Mr. STROBEL. You asked me if I was the leader of vigilantes.

Mr. IRVING. I asked you if you were not in charge of them.

Mr. STROBEL. I was not. The sheriff was in charge of all law-enforcement agencies.

Mr. IRVING. Is it true that, since the time they signed contracts with the FTA-CIO, and the 1940 strike, there have been no strikes, but there have been peaceful relations?

Mr. STROBEL. I would not say that was exactly true.

Mr. IRVING. Did they sign that contract in 1942; do you know?

Mr. STROBEL. They signed a contract on order of a subpanel of the War Production Board; yes.

Mr. IRVING. The question that I asked, I understand, is documented in the La Follette hearings and reports. So there must be some basis for questions. I presume that the vigilantes were merely being benevolent in testing tear gas for salesmen of the companies selling it. Perhaps that was their object.

That is all.

Mr. STROBEL. Well——

Mr. IRVING. That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Have you finished, Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. STROBEL. The gentleman made a statement. I would like to answer his statement.

Mr. POWELL. I am sorry. Right now we are just questioning the witness.

Mr. STROBEL. All right, sir.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I would be very glad to have the witness answer the statement on my time.

You proceed.

Mr. STROBEL. There was tear gas used in the Salinas lettuce strike. I will say this, however, that Mr. La Follette did not investigate the Salinas lettuce strike. It was one of the reasons why he came to California, but when he got to California and delved into the so-called interference of civil rights of workers that had been so widely charged, he found that interference was merely the law enforcement by different law-enforcement agencies throughout the State in protecting life and property, and that there was no violation of the kind and nature as charged, which were the reasons for Mr. La Follette's appearance in California; that he never investigated the Salinas lettuce strike. We were prepared to testify. We asked him to go into that strike. We wanted an opportunity to put the public right on what happened in that strike, and Mr. La Follette did not carry on any investigation into that particular strike.

Mr. McConnell. Mr. Strobel, I did not get here in time to hear all your testimony. In fact, I did not hear any of it. I came in during the course of the questioning period. Have you seen H. R. 2032, which is the bill being considered, known as the Lesinski bill?

Mr. Strobel. I saw part of it, Mr. McConnell. Unfortunately, I have not read it all.

Mr. McConnell. Do you feel that that will protect agriculture in the future, and is adequate for that purpose?

Mr. Strobel. No, sir; I do not feel that it will protect agriculture.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, it is your opinion as you have expressed it here, without the protection of certain provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, the productive efforts of agriculture are completely nullified? Is that correct? Is that your position?

Mr. Strobel. That is correct, sir.

Mr. McConnell. And that is your position?

Mr. Strobel. That is my position, sir. Unfortunately, we have too often been tied up at times of harvest, and we have experienced losses because of these strikes. Agricultural commodities are of a particularly perishable nature—that is, the vegetables and fruits that comprise the majority of our productive efforts in California. They must be harvested; they must be moved into consumption immediately, or they become lost. They must either be canned or sold as fresh products from day to day, and if any interference occurs in that chain, then there is a loss to the farmer of his productive efforts and a loss to the consuming public of foodstuffs.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, it is your opiinon that the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law would bring before the country again the problems of hot-cargo and secondary-boycott practices, mass picketing and violence, jurisdictional disputes, lack of responsibility on the part of the unions for their actions and the actions of the membership, and so on? That is your view?

Mr. Strobel. Yes, sir, it is; because at the present time there are three dairies in San Bernardino County that are at this time under attack by the union. These dairies are operated, some of them, on a cooperative basis with the employees. They are nonunion; that is, they have no union contracts. Already those delivery trucks are being followed; letters are being written to the customers of those particular trucks calling their attention to the fact that these are nonunion trucks, and asking these particular people not to buy these products. Now, that was going on on Monday when I left California, and there were 15 other dairies that had had indirect notification that they would either have to sign contracts or that they would be tied up.

Mr. McConnell. Mr. Chairman, I believe I have used about 5 minutes of my time, since I have checked it here.

Mr. Powell. That is correct.

Mr. McConnell. I yield to Mr. Werdel, of California, when his turn comes.

Mr. Powell. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. Mr. Strobel, in the difficulties that you have had out there with these strikes which have caused great loss, were they strikes purely over wages or working conditions, or were they matters involving secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes?

Mr. Strobel. There were some of all classes, Mr. Smith. The primary strikes that we have had have been for organizational or closed shop purposes. The strike on the Di Giorgio ranch, for instance, was purely an organizational effort, and in many of the other strikes—in the milk strike in particular—that has been the main problem; the demand for closed shop control of all of the unions concerned in that industry.

Mr. Smith. What about jurisdictional strikes? Have you had any trouble with that?

Mr. Strobel. Yes, sir. The cannery strikes that were on in 1945, 1946, and 1947, in many instances were the result of jurisdictional disputes between unions, interunion, or between two opposed unions—the CIO and the AFL, for instance, in the cannery strike, with each seeking a contract with the California processors and growers, and our canneries were tied up for close to 60 days during 1945, 1946, and 1947. During that time, we lost a considerable amount of spinach and other crops. And in 1941, the cannery tie-up cost was tremendous in asparagus. If you would care to see some of the losses that have occurred, I have some pictures that I would be very glad to give you showing the loss in asparagus that we had.

Mr. Smith. I would like to see them.

(Some photographs were handed to Mr. Smith.)

Mr. Strobel. I also have here, Mr. Smith, some pictures that perhaps you will be interested in, and some of the types of intimidation that were used. That is a picture of some trees that were cut down on Mr. Di Giorgio's ranch in an effort to force him to sign a closed-shop contract. These men entered upon this ranch at night and cut down those trees. Four men later were arrested. They have not been tried as yet.

Mr. Nixon. Will you yield a moment, Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. I yield.

Mr. Nixon. I understood, Mr. Strobel, from the questions on the other side that all the intimidation and violence were on the other side, that Associated Farmers was doing it all. You do not mean to say that the unions did some?

Mr. Strobel. Well, I would not say that the unions cut these trees down. I would say this, that the four men charged with the crime by the sheriff were members of the union, and bond was furnished for them by the union.

Mr. Nixon. What were the trees worth?

Mr. Strobel. I could not state the worth of the trees, but I presume that fruit of that kind runs anywhere from $1,000 to $2,000 an acre.

Mr. Nixon. Thank you, Mr. Smith.

Mr. Smith. Mr. Strobel, in cases out there where they have disputes in the canneries, do you know whether or not it has been the practice of some farmers to go and take their produce as far away as Los Angeles?

Mr. STROBEL. Mr. Smith, we have to use any outlet that we can secure when our processing facilities are denied us in order to keep down the loss to the farmer. He has to take any means or methods he can to dispose of his products. But you must understand this, that there is a very decided tonnage of fresh fruits and vegetables that is available to the consuming public, and any additional surplus or any additional supplies taken into the market in most cases force the market down to where you lose on the fresh production side of the picture as well as the cannery production. There is also a very definite balance in there, and our productive efforts are divided between the fresh market and the canning.

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Strobel, are you familiar with the case where a rancher took his lambs to market in Oakland and they were boycotted there because the previous year the yews had not been sheared by union shearers?

Mr. STROBEL. I have no personal knowledge of that particular instance, Mr. Smith. I will say, however, that periodically for several years, Mr. Maxwell of the butchers' union served notice on the farmers in California that unless their sheep were sheared by union sheep shearers, when the lambs came to market they would not be handled by the union butchers. We had some attempts to stop the sale of such lambs, but in most instances it was so unfair that the public would not stand for that sort of interference and we were able to dispose of our lambs.

Mr. SMITH. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Nixon?

Mr. NIXON. Mr. Strobel, is the only member of the Associated Farmers the Di Giorgio farm?

Mr. STROBEL. Is that the only member?

Mr. NIXON. Yes, sir.

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir. We have 17,000 members in California.

Mr. NIXON. Well, of those 17,000, would you say that 12,000 were the large farms, 10,000 acres or more?

Mr. STROBEL. Oh, no, sir. The larger farms——

Mr. NIXON. That would more or less take up all of California, would it not?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes. The large farmers, or so-called larger farmers, are very few in comparison to the smaller farmers such as myself and others.

Mr. NIXON. Approximately how many of these 17,000 are in the small farm category, as you would put it?

Mr. STROBEL. We have never broken that down, Mr. Nixon, but I would say that probably 85 percent to 90 percent of our membership are the average type small farms.

Mr. NIXON. You have indicated that you were concerned over the possibilities that would occur in the event the Taft-Hartley Act was repealed. As far as farmers are concerned, what do you think is the major problem that would arise in the event of the repeal of the act?

Mr. STROBEL. Sir, at the present time, perhaps you have heard that Mr. Beck, the head of the teamsters union, has said that he is going to take over and control all the jobs in the warehouses of the United States from, I think he put it, Canada or Maine to Miami, or something like that, which was the statement in the paper. Many of those contracts are now held by CIO unions, and if a jurisdictional dispute develops within the processing industry or in those warehouses where we need those facilities from day to day, certainly there is going to be a terrific loss inflicted on the farmers of this country, not alone in California, but all over the Nation.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, Mr. Strobel, right now there is pending in California an all-out jurisdictional strike between the CIO and the AFL on certain farm labor, and particularly processing workers; is that right?

Mr. STROBEL. I think that would be true, sir, if you can trust what you read in the newspapers.

Mr. NIXON. Did you indicate a moment ago that there had been any violence in any of these labor disputes? The reason I ask that question is that there had been considerable discussion here today as to where any violence occurred, whether it was on the side of management or on the side of labor. Now, we have had some description of the management violence which has been condemned. In your statement, you spoke rather generally on that point. Do you have any specific examples of any violence being used?

Mr. STROBEL. Well, sir, I could say in the Salinas lettuce strike, I have some very personal experiences. As a deputy, I was under the order of the sheriff in our main street, and the boys apparently objected to my presence there to the extent that my nose was broken, I had my teeth kicked out, two ribs broken and quite a number of cries of lynching. In fact, they had a rope around my neck, which fortunately for me did not quite shut off my wind. They were quite capable of going through with their intentions.

Mr. NIXON. You are sure that those are not stooges that the union has put on the spot?

Mr. STROBEL. I would hate to think that was the case, because certainly I would have been very much put out with some of my friends.

Mr. NIXON. We were speaking about the issues in these strikes that occurred out there and the efforts to organize the dairies and the other farm labor of California. Did you indicate that the major issue in the Di Giorgio strike was the matter of wages or the matter of union security?

Mr. STROBEL. It was organizational, as far as I have been able to determine, and I think I am correct in that statement, Mr. Nixon. The matter of wages was not involved, because the minimum wage rate on that ranch was 80 cents per hour. That pamphlet I turned over to the committee will give you a fairly accurate picture of the wages that those people were receiving. And as I said awhile ago, very few of Mr. Di Giorgio's employees left the ranch; there never was any need to import or bring into the area any additional workers. On the first day of the strike, about 250 people whose normal period of time would have ceased in about 10 days—and they would have gone into the cottonfields, because the grapes would have been harvested—did not come through the picket line. But in less than 4 days, over 400 additional applications were made for employment by people within the county for those particular jobs, and there was never any need to bring in any outside workers, and never any need for Mr. Di Giorgio to solicit or ask for any additional workers to come to his ranch.

Mr. NIXON. Were any efforts made by those in the picket lines to keep the workers from continuing with their work?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, there were numerous cases of interference with workers going in and out of the ranch, and on one or two occasions they sought to take some workers out of the trucks. I believe one morning there they stopped the truck, and started to drag some workers who were going in out of this truck, and I think they were rather more willing to come out, because three of the attackers were taken to the hospital. The boys unloaded the truck, and three of those people who attempted to stop them were taken to the hospital, and as far as I know, the trucks continued on to the ranches to their work.

Mr. NIXON. Don't you believe in freedom?

Mr. STROBEL. Absolutely I do, Mr. Nixon.

Mr. NIXON. Well, after all, as far as these people were concerned, they had a right to beat up these people up. Why should the law step in and interfere with them?

Mr. STROBEL. Of course, sometimes the law has not stepped in. But I would say this, that any attack on any person by any group whatsoever is absolutely against all my principles of law, and if a man is proceeding down the street or into his place of employment, certainly I do not think that anyone should have the freedom to walk up and slug him or stop him, or attempt to stop him. I think that that is a violation of law as we know it. I think it is a violation of that particular person's freedom, and that any attempt to interfere with me would meet with just exactly the same sort of reprisal that evidently these people used.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, you do not believe that the freedom of one individual or one group of individuals should go so far as to allow them to interfere without fear of any legal action against them, with the freedom of other individuals?

Mr. STROBEL. Absolutely I think that we all stand in the same position before the law, or should.

Mr. NIXON. In the case of the dairies and the other farm enterprises that you mentioned in your statement, I noted that in all of the specific cases the workers in those particular enterprises were not the individuals who were instigating the strike; they were people who wanted to stay on the job, who were satisfied with their working conditions. The pressure came from the outside, from union leaders who were attempting to come in, and, having failed to obtain membership from within the ranks of the workers, were attempting to get the employer to force the workers into the union; is that right?

Mr. STROBEL. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. That was the issue?

Mr. STROBEL. That was the issue.

Mr. NIXON. That is why you think that a provision in the law, as we have in the Taft-Hartley law, which prohibits that type of practice, is one that you think is to the best interests of the country and the best interests of the workers as well?

Mr. STROBEL. I think it is in the best interests of everybody concerned, particularly the workers, because it does give them freedom of choice.

Mr. NIXON. That is all.

Mr. POWELL. Mr. Werdel, you have 15 minutes.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Strobel, what gave rise to the organization of Associated Farmers?

Mr. STROBEL. Mr. Werdel, as far back as 1932 there were periodic attacks—and in 1932 there developed a very general pattern of attack on agriculture in California. For instance, in the harvesting of the cotton up in the San Joaquin Valley there was an attack, and then the following spring in the harvest of the peas down in Imperial County there was also an attack made in an attempt not to secure for the workers a job or higher pay, but primarily to stop the entire harvest of that particular crop. And it appeared that certain people who were engaged in the cotton strike in the San Joaquin Valley were the same leaders who engaged in the so-called pea strike in Imperial County. Now, individual farmers so attacked had no one to whom they could appeal for aid. They were out by themselves; they were absolutely helpless, and so the Associated Farmers were organized in 1934 to aid the farmer in his efforts to produce, to harvest, and to market his crop with no interference, working all the time within the framework of the law-enforcement agency in any locality in which violence occurred. We merely stepped into the picture. This farmer who in many instances was not a member of the Associated Farmers could appeal to us, and we would use our best efforts to iron out the difficulties and see that his productive efforts were not interfered with, that his crop was marketed, and that his foodstuffs were made available to the public.

Mr. WERDEL. You mentioned violence. Can you tell us what the nature of that violence was? Did it involve the destruction of property or the threat of personal violence, or what was it?

Mr. STROBEL. In some instances, it involved the destruction of the property, and in some instances it was personal violence. I think I remember in the cotton strike—I do not know whether it was Sonoma County or which one it was—but there were two men killed in that strike, unfortunately. It has never been known just exactly who killed them, but those were the type of things that alarmed us. Attacks were made on farmers by large groups of irresponsible people. They went on their ranch—I would not say they were workers, because we have no way of knowing that they were. But because of that condition, we sought to bring our influence into law enforcement. In other words, we asked the sheriff in the law enforcement agency to enforce the law, to protect lives and property on both sides. We were very much alarmed at the rate that violence was increasing, and I might say that after the Associated Farmers was organized, there has been no single instance in which a worker was seriously injured in California, and none has been killed.

Mr. WERDEL. In regard to the property damage, were there instances when property was destroyed, where it was burned, where they burned haystacks and sheds, and that sort of thing?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, there were numerous instances of packing sheds that were burned in Imperial Valley. In one particular year in Imperial Valley over 200 haystacks were set on fire. That was attributed to what we then called the IWW's, and then later developed into the Communist Party as we understand it today.

Mr. WERDEL. Was that destruction just confined to Imperial Valley, or did it spread throughout California?

Mr. STROBEL. I understand that on the ranch adjacent to Mr. Di Giorgio's ranch during this particular strike that we have been discussing, a barn—and this barn was filled with hay—to the best of my information, was set on fire and destroyed.

Mr. WERDEL. In connection with law enforcement, where it was necessary to have farmers organize for assistance, will you describe to the committee the disturbing influences it dealt with with reference to traveling around the country.

Mr. STROBEL. Yes. In numerous instances, large automobiles and trucks were used and other types of attacks were made. These people rode throughout the area, and wherever anyone was working they threatened them with reprisals if they continued to work. And in this asparagus strike last year, in particular, it was the second time that this type of attack was used. Two airplanes were used in buzzing the workers that remained out in the field. Later those two pilots were arrested, and that type of violence stopped. Back in 1934 or 1935, in the citrus strike, in Orange and Riverside Counties, an airplane was used, and they flew over the workers and threw rocks and chain at the workers, and numerous types of interference such as that were indulged in and have constantly been indulged in.

Mr. WERDEL. When these automobile caravans traveled around throughout the productive area, as I understand it, did they enter upon the fields of the farmers to drive people out of the fields?

Mr. STROBEL. Such attempts were made in instances; yes.

Mr. WERDEL. Now, give the committee some idea of the position of the farmers in regard to the cost that is required to be laid out up to the time of production of some of these crops as compared to the value of the crops.

Mr. STROBEL. Of course, Mr. Werdel, there are many types of crops, and the production costs differ very widely. I would take citrus as an example at this particular time and say that due to the weather hazards that citrus has encountered this year in California, no matter what the crop that they harvest brings, they would still be at a loss. There was a certain loss because of the actual freeze damage, and then the effort to protect the crop against freeze damage resulted in such a costly operation that, no matter what the crop brings, in many instances that farmer will be in the red. Now, I can tell you about sugar beets and lettuce and crops of that type, because that happens to be my particular line. The cost of producing an acre of lettuce and bringing it up to the harvesting period runs from $150 to $175 per acre. As regards the income from that particular crop, I might say that my particular efforts—and you will pardon me if I speak personally, because I know what I am talking about—my particular efforts in the direction of producing lettuce last year cost me $40,000. I lacked just exactly $40,000 of getting what my crop cost me to produce.

Mr. WERDEL. These labor disturbances that you referred to, they are precipitated during harvest time; is that not correct?

Mr. STROBEL. Almost always; yes, sir. There is no point in their trying to interfere with our productive efforts until they are ready to move, because there is no place at which they can affect us. Most of our workers are loyal and remain on the job; they are not interested in joining a union. If they want to join, we certainly would not tell any man not to join a union, if he saw fit to. But most of our workers during our productive periods are workers who have been with us for many years in many instances. Some of the workers have been on those ranches for as much as 25 years.

Mr. WERDEL. If you know, tell us whether or not the parties leading these labor disputes in agriculture in California are known to the community when the trouble starts or if they come from the outside.

Mr. STROBEL. Most of the leadership comes from the outside. For instance, the leadership involved in the efforts to tie up Mr. Di Giorgio's operation, Mr. Hank Hasiwar, of the National Farm Labor Union, came in there from Texas, and had been formerly, I believe, in Tennessee. He was not, I believe, a California man. And many others are the same way. They come from outside.

Mr. WERDEL. What I am getting at is this. So far as agricultural organization is concerned, do the central labor councils of the various counties usually stimulate this agricultural organization, or is it someone else?

Mr. STROBEL. I would say in most cases it is someone else, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Regarding these pictures you have given the committee, I notice that some of them are duplicates. But I will ask you if they were all taken at the same time, or at the time of the same labor dispute?

Mr. STROBEL. Are you referring to the asparagus pictures there, Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Well, let us take them one by one. Here is a truck and a brick wall, and entitled "Hauling Asparagus From Storage to Dump." I will mark that "Exhibit No. 1." Just tell us briefly what it is.

Mr. STROBEL. That is a picture of a truck removing asparagus from the storage sheds. The canneries were tied up at this particular time, and we hoped that, by harvesting our asparagus and putting it into cold storage, we would be able to take it to the canneries and get it put in cans later. But the facilities were not sufficient to protect the asparagus, and so they lost that, because the canneries were tied up and the freezing facilities were not sufficient to protect it to the point that it could be canned later on.

Mr. WERDEL. And that is also true of this other photograph with the truck, entitled "Loading at Cold-Storage Plant To Be Hauled to Dump"?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes; I think that is the same.

Mr. WERDEL. I will mark that "Exhibit No. 2."

And these pictures refer to your written statement in which you say there was a $3,500,000 loss?

Mr. STROBEL. No. That was prior. That was the strike in 1941. Those pictures were of the strike in 1941. We did not have any pictures of the strike in 1948 which we have just experienced.

Mr. WERDEL. All right. Now, here are a few other pictures that appear to be carrots. What are they?

Mr. STROBEL. No; that is asparagus, sir. That is being put out in the dump and being thrown overboard there.

Mr. WERDEL. And that is the same strike?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir; that was the same strike.

Mr. WERDEL. I will mark these "Exhibits No. 3 and No. 4."

What was the amount of loss in this particular strike to the farmers?

Mr. STROBEL. That particular part of that strike amounted to about $1,750,000. That was the second phase of that particular strike, Mr. Werdel. We had had a previous strike in the field in which we had lost a considerable quantity of grass, and I am sorry I have not the pictures. The Taft-Hartley committee has pictures of the previous strike, which was in the field where we were cutting and harvesting grass and just throwing it on the ground in an effort to keep our beds producing.

Mr. WERDEL. But that is the same strike?

Mr. STROBEL. No. That was previous to this particular part of it.

Mr. WERDEL. And these losses, you say, resulted from secondary boycotts?

Mr. STROBEL. No. That particular loss there was because the canneries were tied up. There was no secondary boycott. The canneries were tied up by a strike in the canneries at that time.

Mr. WERDEL. I see. All right. Now, you have four pictures there of cut trees. I take it those are the ones you referred to earlier in your statement.

Mr. STROBEL. Those trees were cut down on Mr. Di Giorgio's ranch.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you want to leave all four of these pictures with the committee?

Mr. STROBEL. I will leave them with the committee if you would like them all, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. I will mark them "Exhibits 5, 6, 7, and 8."

Can you tell us how many trees were cut?

Mr. STROBEL. No, sir. I have heard it at from 3 to 5 acres. I would not know exactly how many were cut.

Mr. WERDEL. And those were cut all in 1 night?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir: all in 1 night.

Mr. WERDEL. Were they cut by hand ax?

Mr. STROBEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Is it your opinion that four people could cut that many trees in 1 night?

Mr. STROBEL. I do not know how many people engaged in that. Those trees, as you know, are spaced rather widely apart. It might be possible that they might have had additional help. I only say that four men were charged with this particular crime.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Strobel, I show you two small pictures in which it shows the same thing, with the man carrying a placard. Will you tell us what that is? It is in front of the Kilburg Co.

Mr. STROBEL. I do not know what those particular pictures are. I am sorry. I have some additional pictures here that you might be interested in. Here is a picture where an attempt is made to stop the movement of strawberries from Santa Clara County.

Mr. WERDEL. What is the nature of that attempt? Is that a secondary boycott or a closing of that plant, or what?

Mr. STROBEL. That was a secondary boycott. The unions were attempting to organize that particular processing plant, and these strawberries were hauled into this plant and then sent out as fresh fruit to San Francisco and other plants; and, because of the attempt to organize that plant, the trucking outfit refused to move the strawberries. They refused to load them on their trucks, and at this time the farmers loaded the strawberries on the trucks themselves and then told the trucking companies that unless they moved the strawberries their trucks would stay there. And they eventually moved them.

Mr. WERDEL. I will mark that picture, then, "No. 9."

Mr. STROBEL. I have here some pictures of the secondary boycott.

Mr. WERDEL. I think our time is running out, Mr. Strobel.

Mr. BAILEY. Your time is up.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you want to leave the other pictures, or just those that I have marked?

Mr. STROBEL. I will leave these, if you care, sir. It shows citrus.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Werdel, do you want these included as exhibits?

Mr. WERDEL. I would like to have them included.

Mr. BAILEY. Without objection, they will be received and filed as reference exhibits.

The next witness is Mr. E. L. Chandler of the Engineers Joint Council.

Will you kindly step forward and give your name and occupation, Mr. Chandler?

The gentlemen are with you, Mr. Chandler?

Mr. CHANDLER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Will you give us their names and addresses?

Mr. CHANDLER. I will be glad to introduce them to you. Their names are included in the statement we have, Mr. Chairman.

TESTIMONY OF E. LAWRENCE CHANDLER, ASSISTANT SECRETARY, AMERICAN SOCIETY OF CIVIL ENGINEERS, AND CHAIRMAN OF THE PANEL, ENGINEERS JOINT COUNCIL

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, my name is E. Lawrence Chandler. I am assistant secretary of the American Society of Civil Engineers whose headquarters are in New York. I appear before you this morning as chairman of the panel of the Engineers Joint Council, representing the following organizations: American Institute of Chemical Engineers, American Institute of Electrical Engineers, American Institute of Mining and Metallurgical Engineers, American Society for Engineering Education, American Society of Civil Engineers, American Society of Mechanical Engineers, National Society of Professional Engineers. Because of the confusion that arose regarding the scheduling of hearings, it is not possible for them all to be here. Two of them are here. I should like to introduce Mr. E. H. Bancker and Mr. Gail A. Hathaway, who are members of the panel.

With your permission, we would like to have this statement included in the record, and if I may, I will read the statement.

Mr. BAILEY. Are there objections?

Mr. PERKINS. No objection.

Mr. CHANDLER. The several engineering societies represented on this panel are national professional organizations having a combined membership of well over 100,000 individual members distributed throughout all of the States and Territories of the Nation. Our members include both employers and employees and they are engaged in a wide variety of fields, including Federal, State, and local governments, industrial organizations and private engineering firms. Due to the character and widespread distribution of our membership, we believe we are in a position to speak with a well-balanced and unbiased viewpoint regarding those phases of labor legislation which particularly affect professional employees.

I would like to interject that the American Chemical Society, although it did not participate in the preparation of this statement, also stands with us in approving its contents. The American Chemical Society has a membership of nearly 60,000, including chemists and chemical engineers.

Our purpose in presenting this statement to you may be expressed very simply. We find nothing in H. R. 2032 directed toward protecting the collective-bargaining rights of professional employees as such, and recommend that the National Labor Relations Act of 1949, in whatever form the Congress may determine to be appropriate, shall carry the provisions affecting professional employees which have been established for the first time in the existing law. We refer specifically to section 2 (12) and to section 9 (b) (1) of Public Law 101, Eightieth Congress.

Section 2 (12), which is a definition of the term "professional employee," states that—

(12) The term "professional employee" means—

(a) any employee engaged in work (i) predominantly intellectual and varied in character as opposed to routine mental, manual, mechanical, or physical work; (ii) involving the consistent exercise of discretion and judgment in its performance; (ii) of such a character that the output produced or the result accomplished cannot be standardized in relation to a given period of time; (iv) requiring knowledge of an advanced type in a field of science or learning customarily acquired by a prolonged course of specialized intellectual instruction and study in an institution of higher learning or a hospital, as distinguished from a general academic education or from an apprenticeship or from training in the performance of routine mental, manual, or physical processes; or

(b) any employee, who (i) has completed the courses of specialized intellectual instruction and study described in clause (iv) of paragraph (a), and (ii) is performing related work under the supervision of a professional person to qualify himself to become a professional employee as defined in paragraph (a).

Section 9 deals with representatives and elections. In subparagraph (b) of that section it is stated that—and this is the section that is particularly important to the professional worker—

(b) The Board shall decide in each case whether, in order to assure to employees the fullest freedom in exercising the rights guaranteed by this act, the unit appropriate for the purposes of collective bargaining shall be the employer unit, craft unit, plant unit, or subdivision thereof: Provided, That the Board shall not (1) decide that any unit is appropriate for such purposes if such unit includes both professional employees and employees who are not professional employees unless a majority of such professional employees vote for inclusion in such unit.

These provisions are tremendously important to professional employees. Activities governed by them have been such as to contribute to the betterment of relations between management and employees in accordance with the stated objective of the country's labor laws.

The fundamental purpose of according special recognition to professional employees, as distinguished from nonprofessional employees, is to increase effective application of the law. Philosophy of professional separation in collective-bargaining determinations should not be confused with proposals to restrict the application of the law to smaller numbers of employees or to give employers undue advantage in the professional field.

Prior to the enactment of the provisions cited, situations continually arose where the best interests of professsional employees, nonprofessional employees and employers alike, were not well served. Confusion and conflict with organizations of nonprofessional employees developed. We do not believe those developments to have been in accord with the intentions of Congress and certainly they were not in the interest of promotion of progressive, cooperative relations between employer and employee, nor for the best interest of the country. Under the present law, with statutory provision of protection of the rights of professional employees, there has been a distinct trend away from such unsatisfactory conditions and it is fair to say that we are well on the way toward complete abolishment of the confusion and distress that existed among professional employees under the earlier law.

In view of the rapid technological developments in American industry, most large-scale industrial enterprises today employ large staffs of professional engineers, architects and scientists on a full-time basis. As a result, these professionally trained and professionally minded employees come within the coverage of the labor laws. In a lesser degree, the same trend has been occurring in the professions of law and medicine, for it is common to find banking, insurance, and manufacturing corporations which have legal departments and medical departments of their own.

The National Labor Relations Act of 1935 was enacted primarily for the benefit of unskilled and unorganized workers in mass production industry. Cognizance was taken of the status which the skilled craftsman had attained and special provisions were contained for recognizing craft units. Unfortunately, no corresponding recognition was accorded the special problems of the professional employee.

A fundamental difficulty with the Wagner Act, as it affected professional employees, was that no distinction was made between professional and nonprofessional employees in spite of the fact that their viewpoints and abilities are inherently different and that their conditions of employment cannot be made subject to a common standard.

This statement is a simple recognition of fact. It does not imply any suggestion of placing one segment of the employment force in a preferred position. It is for the best interests of all in the collective bargaining field to recognize the essential differences.

Professional service, even though rendered by an employee, is predominantly intellectual and varied in character. Constant demand exists for originality and creative thought in the solution of problems presented with each new undertaking. Technical skill is only a part of the equipment of a professional person. There is no yardstick by which creative ability can be measured. Individual talents vary and every person possessing a professional attitude constantly strives to expand his knowledge and improve his abilities in his chosen field to the end of personal excellence, personal advancement, and the betterment of his profession. Strict regimentation of professional employees is incompatible with the maintenance of true professional standards.

With regard to conditions of employment, consider the typical situation of a professional employee in a large industrial plant. The duties of one engaged in the development of industrial processes or the design of equipment may be such as to demand continuous and prolonged application of his individual services. From the very nature of those services, the employee must be granted prerogatives such as access to various portions of the plant at all hours, the right to work with continuing shifts as occasion may demand, latitude as to hours and location of employment, and freedom of judgment as to the best method of carrying out his special assignment. Obviously, such working conditions cannot be set forth in the usual labor union type of contract.

To attempt application of the same standard of measurement for services of professional men and nonprofessional men is not in the public interest. The output of professional employees cannot be standardized as can that of manual and skilled labor. It cannot be measured in terms such as the number of brick a man should lay in a given number of hours, the amount of cubic yards of dirt that should be moved, the square yards of painting, the amount of type to be set, bolts to be placed, feet of conduit to be laid, or in terms of any other similar unit.

The productive output of the professional man is largely that of his mind, while that of the nonprofessional depends largely on his manual skill and dexterity. No law by which professional employees and those engaged in routine, mental, mechanical, and physical work must conform to the same regulatory pattern is a just law. It is unjust alike to the laborer, to the nonprofessional white-collar workers, to the professional man, to their employers, and to society.

In spite of all this, prior to the enactment of the present law, professional employees were often included against their will in heterogeneous groups and compelled to accept representation which they did not desire in collective-bargaining procedure. The results were most unsatisfactory. There was serious effect on the morale of professional employees and generally poor relationships developed between those employees and labor unions and employers.

In industrial undertakings, professional employees always are far outnumbered by the production and clerical employees. Even though the vote of the professional employees were unanimous against proposed representation, it was of no avail. By sheer numerical force the professional employees were denied effective representation.

We accept the principle of collective bargaining as a right of employees, professional and nonprofessional, but we firmly believe that there should not be any submergence of the desires and interests of professional employees. The background, education, training, and work interests of professional employees and nonprofessional employees are inherently divergent. It is futile to expect that a forced grouping of the professional and nonprofessional employees in any plant or organization could possibly form an "appropriate bargaining unit." Under the old organizational law and its administration, such plainly inappropriate groupings were made and, by fiat, were declared appropriate. We do not consider that to have been the intent of Congress.

Let us cite a few early cases to illustrate actual development under that unfortunate situation. No attempt is made to cite all such cases. We think that a few are sufficient to demonstrate the need for correction.

One of the first cases decided by the National Labor Relations Board was Matter of Chrysler Corporation (1 N. L. R. B. 164) wherein, in referring to design engineers, the Board said:

> It is true that this work requires a considerable degree of skill and more or less imagination. There is nothing, however, peculiarly personal in the relationship between the company and its many hundreds of engineers. They are in no sense executives. The engineers have need of organized strength in common with all wage earners.

In Kennecott Copper Corporation (40 N. L. R. B. 986) the Board determined the following category for an appropriate unit:

Employees of the office department at Santa Rita Mine and employees of the Hurley miscellaneous clerical department, chemists included.

In Black and Decker Electric Company (48 N. L. R. B. 726) the following unit was prescribed:

Employes in the accounting, cashiers, pay roll, cost, sales, service, production, material control, purchasing, personnel, stores, receiving, shipping, experimental, mechanical engineering, and tool and processing engineering departments.

In Permanente Metals Corporation (45 N. L. R. B. 931) the Board found as appropriate a unit—including professional chemists, gas analysts, stenographers, and sample boys.

There are a number of cases in which no distinction was made between purely technical employees and purely professional employees. The two are far from identical.

The difficulties encountered by professional employees in maintaining autonomy and preventing a forced grouping into heterogeneous units is no better illustrated than in the Shell Development Company case (38 N. L. R. B. 192) decided in January 1942. It was only through an all-out effort on the part of professional chemists involved and extensive litigation backed by the financial support of the American Chemical Society that the professional employees were able to escape compulsory inclusion in a bargaining unit which included janitors, roustabouts, window washers, and the like. It is absurd to think that the professional viewpoints could be properly represented as a result of including professional employees in such a group.

This type of dissension extended throughout the administration of the National Labor Relations Act. In only a few cases did professional employees succeed in gaining recognition, and then only after protracted and costly controversy, entailing litigation and appeal and fundamental disturbance of employer-employee relationships.

The early cases also illustrate the difficulty which confronted the Board in attempting to apply standards for classifying professional employees. The original act contained nothing in the way of definition and the varied concepts of professionalism naturally had no firm basis. Without a statutory guide, the application of standards for determining professional status wavered according to the individual concepts of the board member or the examiner and left the professional public in a constant state of uncertainty.

The solution of this entire complex situation was found to be as simple as the problem was tangled. The heart of the solution is in the two sections of the present Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, previously quoted.

It should be stressed that section 9 (b) (1) takes nothing away from the professional employee. Rather it protects his rights in the collective bargaining field, and permits exercise of those rights on a professional basis. Under this provision, professional employees may engage in collective bargaining and in many cases have done so. They may have had their nonbargaining unit restricted to professional employees, or they may be a part of a larger over-all bargaining unit including nonprofessionals, if that is their desire.

The definition of professional employee is basically not a new one; it is based, with minor changes, on the definition of professional employee currently in force under the Fair Labor Standards Act. This definition has stood the test of time and has been found in the administration of the Fair Labor Standards Act and of the current labor act to be fair and practical. The inclusion of subsection (b) to the definition is designed to apply the same general standards to young men who have completed the basic professional education and are in the process of acquiring the necessary experience to qualify for full professional status, that is, internes in the medical field, and engineers-in-training in the engineering field, and the like.

It is significant that the legislative history of the present labor law indicates very little discussion and debate on the principle of professional separation. This is accounted for by the fact that the rights of professional employees are being fully protected and by the evident justice of the principle. The few objections raised have been technical in nature and are quite easily met by examination of cases decided by the National Labor Relations Board involving professional employees.

Although the professional provisions have been in force only a little over 1 year, there have been Board decisions in sufficient number to demonstrate conclusively that the professional sections are successful in application and have not been abused to the detriment of labor unions. They have brought highly significant benefits to professional groups and marked improvement in management-employee relations.

Any misapprehension that the professional sections would be used to deny collective-bargaining rights to professional employees was dispelled by the Board in the Lumberman's Mutual Casualty Com. of Chicago case (75 N. L. R. B. 1132) wherein the Board rejected the argument of the employer that a number of attorneys involved were not employees within the meaning of the act because they were professional employees. The Board's opinion clearly stated the opposite principle to be true, stating:

> We are of the opinion, therefore, that the mere fact that the attorneys are professional personnel does not preclude them from being employees within the meaning of the act, and entitled to its benefits, and we reject the employer's contention in this respect.

Later in the opinion the Board stated:

> That the attorneys have a statutory right to self-organization cannot be denied. If doubt ever existed, it has been removed by the * * * act * * * which defines "professional employees."

It is significant that the Board acknowledges in this decision the element of doubt as to appropriate classification of professional employees in the past and definitely indicates that the collective-bargaining status of the professional employees has been enhanced by the professional sections of the existing law.

To the same effect is Worthington Pump and Machinery Corporation case (75 N. L. R. B. 80) in which the Board states:

> * * * the statute itself refutes the respondents' contention that employees like the ones in question are to be deprived of employee status because of the nature of their duties. * * *

These cases effectively dispose of any contention that the collective-bargaining rights of professional employees will be destroyed or diminished. In fact, the Board now has ample statutory authority to confirm its position. Likewise disposed of is the misconception that the provisions will operate to the undue advantage of employers. The above cases clearly indicate that although the employers in these cases opposed collective-bargaining rights for the professional employees, the Board had no difficulty in applying the act to support such rights.

It is recognized that the professional sections could be misapplied and misused if there were loose application of the professional definition so as to cover those who are not truly professional employees. A study of the cases discloses that this has not occurred. The Board has been properly strict in applying the professional definition. There is no reason to assume that the Board will not continue to apply the definition with due care and caution.

In the Jersey Publishing Company case (76 N. L. R. B. 70) the Board declined to grant professional separation to editorial employees. This opinion was confirmed in Free Press Company case (76 N. L. R. B. 152) which also involved a claim for professional status for editorial employees.

That the Board has been careful not to stretch the definition of "professional employee" to cover classes of employment not intended is demonstrated in Clayton Mark & Company (76 N. L. R. B. 33), wherein the Board said:

> It is equally clear, in our opinion, that the amended act and its legislative history do not authorize the classification of inspectors as "professional employees" merely because, by the exercise of individual judgment and discretion, they may sometimes affect the earnings of production employees.

Starrett Brothers & Eken, Inc. (77 N. L. R. B. 37) illustrates that the Board will not include technical employees or employees with professional titles without proper proof of true professional qualification. In that case the Board declined professional separation to employees classified as chief of surveying party, instrument men, front chainman, rear chainman, estimator, draftsman, inspector, mechanical engineer, and assistant mechanical engineer.

In George A. Fuller Company (78 N. L. R. B. 34) the decision in Starret Brothers & Eken, Inc., case was confirmed and professional status was denied to members of a construction surveying party.

In Southern Bell Telephone and Telegraph Company, Inc. (78 N. L. R. B. 100) the Board found the engineers, junior engineers, and student engineers to be qualified under the professional definition but excluded the engineering fieldman from that classification as lacking the professional qualifications.

In Automatic Electric Company (78 N. L. R. B. 146) the accountants did not come within the Board's application of the professional definition and they were denied treatment as professional employees. To the same effect is the decision in American Window Glass Company (77 N. L. R. B. 162) wherein accounting employees were found not to be professional.

That the Board is not impressed by a professional title per se is again illustrated in Inter-Mountain Telephone Company (79 N. L. R. B. 96) wherein three employees with the title of "engineer" were found to lack the necessary professional qualifications to meet the definition. Also excluded in the same case was the accountant.

Artistic or literary talent alone is not sufficient to warrant a finding of professional qualifications for the purposes of the act. In West Central Broadcasting Company (77 N. L. R. B. 56) the Board denied professional separation to the radio announcers, singers, and continuity writers. An attempt to bring auto and Diesel mechanics into the professional classification was rejected by the Board in Ferguson-Steere Motor Company (76 N. L. R. B. 159).

A striking illustration of the fact that an employee claimed to be professional must actually be engaged in professional work as distinguished from merely having professional qualifications, is the decision in Charles Enen Johnson & Company (77 N. L. R. B. 3), wherein a professional chemist by training was performing maintenance electrical work and, at times, unskilled labor. The Board properly placed him in the appropriate unit as a maintenance employee.

Enough has been cited in this line of cases to demonstrate that there has been no abuse of the professional sections of the law. The Board has had a clear definition to guide it and has acted within that definition as indicated above. It is apparent that the employees involved must be truly professional employees, on the basis of appropriate education, training, and duties, to come within the strict limitations of the professional test.

The professional provisions have not operated to the advantage of the employer or to the disadvantage of nonprofessional labor organizations. The rights of the professional employees have been fully protected and their actual bargaining strength greatly enhanced. As distinguished from splinterization, the professional sections have instituted a proper and workable solution to the problem posed by employee organizations containing divergent elements.

We submit that developments to date have demonstrated the need for, and the desire of, professional employees to take advantage of the provisions of the present law which are directed toward affording them the freedom of association and choice so properly proclaimed in the old Wagner Act but which so often proved in fact to be but an empty promise to them.

During the relatively brief time since the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, material advances have been made in the promotion of harmonious relations between management and professional employees. The trend is toward minimizing the costly and disruptive turmoil that previously existed in professional ranks and the resulting loss of productive service and effective industrial relations. We are not aware of anything about the existing professional provisions of the law to which exception can be taken by anyone who has at heart the best interest of the country and of this large group of employees who are so vitally important to advancement of the general welfare.

We respectfully request your committee to include in its recommendations to the Congress a continuation of the legislative provisions contained in section 2 (12) and in section 9 (b) (1) of the present labor-management relations law.

That is the end of the prepared statement, Mr. Chairman.

I might add just a few remarks to explain the position of these professional and technical societies in the matter.

These organizations, of course, are not labor organizations; they cannot be, from their very nature, under the law; and the reasons why the societies are taking this stand stems from the urgent request, almost agonized pleas, that came from our employee members during the years under the old law, appealing to their professional societies to find if there was something could be done to relieve them from the embarrassment and continued harassment to which they were subjected.

Speaking for my own society, the American Society of Civil Engineers, we have a committee on employment conditions, and other societies have corresponding committees, and those are continuing committees, but the personnel changes from year to year as one man goes out and another comes in, and there has been substantial representation of employees and employers in an effort to work out a balanced adjustment of the matter. This stems from a long study and close relationship with professional employees who have had difficulties in the past years.

The Engineers' Joint Council, through which this panel was organized, has at very considerable expense published a manual on collective bargaining, which is particularly intended for our engineering employees, to indicate to them the best way in which they may look after their own interests if they have any occasion at all for collective bargaining, and my own society, in one case, expended a considerable sum of money appearing as a friend of the court to try to get out of a difficult situation, an organization in which many of our young members were enrolled.

So the societies have a real and earnest interest in this proposal. We who appear here are not speaking for our own selfish interests—I probably will never in the world have any interest in the collective bargaining on either side—but these societies are sincerely interested in seeing that young engineering employees, and other professional employees along with them, have the opportunity to stand on their own feet, and if by their own desire they do not care for any collective bargaining negotiations they can say so, and refrain, but if they do find a need for collective bargaining—and I think that there is that need in some of the larger companies on the west coast—for instance, some of the large airplane companies in which they have many of the technical engineers working for them—and under the provisions which we are discussing those men can, by their own choice, have a unit of their own with their own representation, and if by some chance they prefer to unite with a nonprofessional group, they have that right also, under the law.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). I want to thank the gentleman for an able and concise presentation of this problem at this time.

Mr. Chandler, if you will, the commtitee will be pleased to hear your associates and have them present their problems.

Mr. CHANDLER. I do not know that they care to add anything. This statement I have just read is a joint effort to present our views.

Mr. BAILEY. Do they want to present a statement?

Mr. CHANDLER. No; I am speaking for the panel. We will not take up your time, unless you would care to have us discuss it further.

Mr. BAILEY. I might ask you a question, in that case, Mr. Chandler.

Your primary object in appearing before the committee was to protect the provisions in the present act insofar as it concerns your group?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is right, Mr. Chairman; those specific provisions.

Mr. BAILEY. You are alarmed that there is no provision in the proposed legislation as concerns your group?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is the whole concern. We are afraid maybe this particular phase of the legislation may disappear, and they will be back where they were under the previous law.

Mr. BAILEY. I am sure the committee will give serious consideration to your request.

Do you have any comments, Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; I would like to clear up some misunderstandings, more than anything else.

Your experience in collective bargaining is generally among the professional people, and has been confined almost exclusively to the varying categories of engineering; is that not true?

Mr. CHANDLER. Naturally, that is so. Yes, because we have closely observed the other law. In the case that I mentioned, the Shell Development case, those were largely chemists. Of course, they are quite closely related to engineers, too.

Mr. BURKE. There have been no difficulties so far as, for instance, legal departments of some of the large corporations—there has been no contention that I know of that the attorneys for a corporation should be included within the unit proper for collective bargaining?

Mr. CHANDLER. The case we mentioned in the statement which I read, the Lumberman's case out at Chicago, did involve a group of attorneys. I cannot say for certain whether they had been previously denied any collective bargaining privileges, but I judge the employer in this case was taking the stand they were not entitled to collective bargaining rights, but under this definition and the other provision which I read, the National Labor Relations Board ruled even though they were professional people they still were employees and were entitled to their position.

Mr. BURKE. Is it your understanding of the present act that it is mandatory, where there is contention, that a professional unit be set up within the plant, and that the representation vote be taken within that unit itself, and that no vote then would be allowed as to whether the employees within that unit would care to be affiliated as a part of the production and maintenance unit?

Mr. CHANDLER. When you said "that unit," do I understand you to mean the professional group, now?

Mr. BURKE. The professional group; yes.

Mr. CHANDLER. No; it does not work that way. The act prohibits the National Labor Relations Board from arbitrarily including professional employees in a heterogeneous bargaining unit, but if the professional people want to form a unit of their own they can by a majority vote affiliate with the production workers' unit, if they desire, or they can select their own representatives, or they can refrain from collective bargaining at all.

Mr. BURKE. It may be the same union that has the bargaining rights, but in any event they would be required to vote for representation as a professional unit and thereby bargain and consummate their contract for that professional unit only; is that not right?

Mr. CHANDLER. If, by a majority vote, the members of the professional group elected to have the production workers representation, let us say, represent the professional group, that is quite within their rights, and that would be their sole approach to management.

Mr. BURKE. Although there was not specific language in the Wagner Act, the Labor Board was not foreclosed from making that type of decision?

Mr. CHANDLER. That is correct. It was not impossible, but in the first place, the Board had no statutory definition of professional employees, and when the case was presented, naturally it was up to the members of the Board to decide whether or not those who were petitioning were professional employees, just like it is within our circle here; there might be a variety of opinions. For the first time, we have a workable definition to guide the Board, and so far as I know the Board has been well pleased with that.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Any questions, Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Where does the resistance come from in your organization; does it come from management, or unions, or where?

Mr. CHANDLER. There is no resistance from management that I know of, because we are convinced that developments under present provisions have been favorable to management and employees both. There was a statement presented on the Senate side which pretended to say that most everything we had said was not so, but it was not a good statement, and in turn I would say the statements in that one were not so. I do not want to take your time, but I could read one paragraph from that other statement in which the speaker stated his desires and objective, and it is as perfect a statement as we are placing before you, or as I could state myself.

In closing, Mr. Chairman, I would like to put into the record telegrams from two other engineer organizations, endorsing the attitude and statement of the Engineers' Joint Council.

Mr. BAILEY. Without objection, they will be received and made part of the record.

(The telegrams are as follows:)

LOS ANGELES, CALIF., March 18, 1949.

E. L. CHANDLER,
Care American Society of Civil Engineers,
New York, N. Y.:

The committee on employment conditions of the Southern California Professional Engineering Association has read and approved the EJC panel statement to the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare and has asked me to commend the panel for its efforts in behalf of professional engineering employees. We hope you will continue to urge congress to retain the sections of the Taft-Hartley Act which insures to professional employees the privilege of free choice in selecting their collective bargaining agent and in determining the scope of their bargaining units. Our present membership of 813 engineers is approximately 85 percent of those eligible for membership and indicates overwhelming approval by engineers of the principle that an organization of professional engineers is best suited to represent engineers in collective bargaining matters. Since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, labor unions have made no serious attempt in this area to unionize professional engineers, but have tried to organize subprofessionals. These attempts ceased when SCPEA offered to represent those subprofessionals if they desired this service. We sincerely hope that the threat of labor-union organization of engineers is not allowed to return by repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

STERLING S. GREEN.

SEATTLE, WASH., March 17, 1949.

E. L. CHANDLER,
Assistant Executive Secretary, American Society Civil Engineers,
New York, N. Y.:

Seattle Professional Engineering Employees' Association, which bargains for 2,000 engineering employees at five concerns in Seattle, has had much experience under the Taft-Hartley law of 1947. We have had two elections under the law and one hearing on representation in the Austin Co. engineers' case. We have one petition for election pending before regional board now.

The SPEEA membership has unanimously voted approval of the statement made by the council legislative panel on behalf of all engineers employees and we feel that our viewpoint has been truthfully and adequately presented by these representatives of our profession. We are most sincere in our wish that stipulated provisions in the law be retained in any new legislation to guarantee freedom of action for the professional engineering employees.

RICHARD A. HENNING,
Chairman, Seattle Professional Engineering Employees Association.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to thank the gentleman and his associates for appearing before the committee.

The subcommittee will adjourn until 2 o'clock, at which time we will hear Mr. Lyle H. Fisher, director of industrial relations.

(Whereupon, at 12:10 p. m., a recess was taken until 2 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Pursuant to the recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 2 p. m.)

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). At this time the committee will be in order, and we will be pleased to hear from Mr. Lyle H. Fisher, director of industrial relations in charge of labor relations for Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co.

The witness will proceed.

TESTIMONY OF LYLE H. FISHER, DIRECTOR, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, MINNESOTA MINING & MANUFACTURING CO., ST. PAUL, MINN.

Mr. FISHER. My name is Lyle Fisher. I am director of industrial relations, in charge of labor relations, for Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co. Our company, with headquarters in St. Paul, has 20 manufacturing plants in the following States: Minnesota, Wisconsin, Illinois, Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York, New Jersey, Maryland, Arkansas, and California; we have collective-bargaining agreements with many unions, including affiliates of the American Federation of Labor, the Congress of Industrial Organizations, and the United Mine Workers of America.

I sincerely hope that my remarks will be helpful to this committee in its efforts to maintain a workable balance in labor-management relations in the United States. I honestly believe that everyone here wants to accomplish this, insofar as the law can do this. I humbly submit that what management and labor are striving for in this country cannot be legislated. For industrial harmony is a job that must be done at the grass roots on a man-to-man basis. I am sure you will agree that this is where mutual respect and confidence must be built.

To achieve this mutual respect and confidence, all we ask is that the rules of the game assure equal status to both management and labor under the law and in the eyes of the American people. This matter of equal status is a most important one; when status is gone, distrust and disrespect take its place. Under the Wagner Act we learned how easy it was for a union to harass management. Anyone who had his feet under the collective-bargaining table in those days knows that to be true. But some people today would have you believe that the present law has reversed this position, that workers are oppressed. If this is true, how can we explain what has happened since its enactment—the sharp reduction in man-days lost through strikes, for example? Their right to strike had not been taken away. The right to strike for economic reasons continues just as clearly and as affirmative as before, notwithstanding the fact that under the present law both sides are expected to live up to the terms of their agreement. Surely this is a reasonable request in view of the fact that the entire economy of this country can be thrown out of gear by a few people.

It is certainly difficult for me to see where the present law places management in a position to harass labor. Only recently we had an unfair-labor-practice charge placed on the doorstep of our Little Rock plant. It appears now that we did wrong in telling our employees about the company's policies. And this occurred under the present guaranty of free speech to the employer. The Board's interpretation of this was strictly ad hoc. It would seem to me that this right of free speech should be more clearly spelled out; an employer should know whether he is within or outside the law.

Based on my own experience, I submit that you cannot conduct successful labor-management negotiations through lawsuits, nor can you, on the other hand, negotiate with irresponsible unions any more than you could reason with a bunch of dead-end kids hell-bent for trouble they know they can get out of. It is my humble opinion that, if the Congress enacts a law that places either side at a disadvantage, surely it is not interested in sound collective bargaining, or collective bargaining has no meaning.

Successful labor-management relations cannot be conducted under laws that favor one side or the other, no more than one could expect two football teams to play the game fairly if the rules were to place one or the other at a disadvantage. Placing either one at a disadvantage can only result in added belligerence on the part of those who have lost status. This has been the problem between management and labor for years. This is what we are all endeavoring to improve.

The greatest benefit of the present law is that it has brought collective bargaining up to a high level. The same set of rules exists for each party. We have noticed a better attitude on the part of unions, a more sincere attitude of willingness to bargain, a recognition of responsibility to employees. This obligation of both parties to abide by the contract is in the best interests of everyone; it is in the public interest. In view of these developments, it is difficult to see whose interests would be served by enacting any law without including provision for the following:

First, representatives of management should be excluded from the act. Employers should not be required to bargain collectively with foremen or supervisors who are a part of management. It doesn't make sense to say that a foreman can be both management and labor. To attempt this by law will only make it necessary to place management responsibility elsewhere. Surely the foreman in industry today deserves a better fate than that. The foremen in our company have always been a responsible part of management, and we do not want to be compelled to change our type of management organization in a way that would reduce the status of our foremen. From our experience we are certain that the American method of spreading managerial authority and responsibility among foremen, so that management is constantly in close contact with the employees, is the only sound way of handling a large production organization. Anything that would require a change in this organizational structure would likewise affect employee-employer relations as well as production.

Second, the right of free speech should be protected and strengthened both for employers and for unions. This right should be clearly spelled out for both management and labor. It is our experience that enforcement is not in keeping with the law's intent. Many Minnesota employers are still somewhat shaky and uncertain as to the rights conferred upon them by the present law, and particularly have they been hesitant to break away from the inhibitions and prohibitions within which the old Wagner Act restricted them. It is our firm belief that the best possible management-worker relations require free, frank, and fair exppression on all sides.

Third, Federal conciliation and mediation should be entirely independent of the Department of Labor. The very reason for the existence of the Department of Labor would cause employers certainly to regard those under the supervision of the Department with suspicion. The Department of Labor would still be the directing force, not the Conciliation Service. The Department has never had a reputation for impartiality, and it is doubtful if the Conciliation Service could change this attitude.

Fourth, the right of individual employees to join a union or refrain from joining should be protected. Compulsory union membership, against the wishes of the individual employee, is just as un-American as it would be to require that all Republican members of the House and Senate join the Democratic majority, or take a walk.

Fifth, employers and unions alike should be required to abide by the terms of collective-bargaining agreements. Strikes and lock-outs in violation of agreements should be prohibited.

Sixth, no strike should have the protection of law if it involves issues which do not relate to wages, hours, working conditions, or demands which the employer is powerless to grant. This would include jurisdictional strikes, sympathy strikes, strikes to force employers to ignore or violate the law, strikes to force recognition of uncertified unions, and strikes to enforce secondary boycotts. I need cite only the Northern States Power Co. case of St. Paul, where a strike of 2½ months' duration involved two unions.

Seventh, unions which have been certified as the bargaining agent, as well as employers, should be obligated to bargain collectively in good faith.

And, eighth, the act of their agents should be binding upon unions, the same as acts of their agents are binding upon employers.

From a legislative point of view, it has been our experience that a workable balance has been more nearly attained during the past 2 years than at any time previously. I am confident that this committee is determined to preserve a workable balance, and I appreciate that you have a grave responsibility in deciding what inequities, if any, exist under our present law.

Surely, there is no desire to becloud management's effort to convince its people that it wishes to pay them well, surround them with the best working conditions possible, and to make their jobs secure and their futures safe so far as it lies within management's power to do so. By the same token, there should be no desire to relieve labor of its responsibility to cooperate wholeheartedly with management in every way to bring about a stronger, more efficient economy to the end that these United States may continue to stand out above all others as a desirable and hopeful place in which to earn a living.

Mr. BAILEY. The chairman has no desire at this time to question the witness. I will defer to Mr. Jacobs, and he may use a part of my time if he cares to.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Fisher, as to the general objective you stated in your prepared statement, I can say that I am in agreement, but as to the detailed provisions by which we will accomplish the objectives, we may have some differences of opinion, and we may not; but I would like to explore the details a little further.

You state that the results of the past year and a half or so, while the Taft-Hartley law has been in effect, discloses that there has been less stoppage of work through strikes; and I think that is correct according to the statistics; is it not?

Mr. FISHER. Yes; according to the statistics, I feel it is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you attribute that solely or in part to the Taft-Hartley law, or do you think there may have been other factors that entered into the picture?

Mr. FISHER. I do not think any single factor contributed solely to that type of condition.

Mr. JACOBS. It, of course, would be a little difficult, would it not, to determine just how much bearing any one factor might have had upon it?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. For example, you are probably aware of the fact that after the First World War work stoppages declined about three times as rapidly as they did after the Second World War; or have you studied those statistics?

Mr. FISHER. I have not studied the statistics. I have heard that.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think it would be a little difficult to know how much, unless you examined other statistics?

Mr. FISHER. We have had no differences in our attitude, certainly, on the part of organizers and negotiators which has contributed to this.

Mr. JACOBS. We will arrive at that later.

Would it be true, if labor knew it could not win at the bargaining table under the Taft-Hartley Act, that there would naturally be a more docile attitude on the part of labor?

Mr. FISHER. That is where you lose your status; yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I will ask you, if labor felt it had no chance to win, would it naturally be more docile, and that would create more peace?

Mr. FISHER. I do not think so unless the law is absolutely unfair.

Mr. JACOBS. We are going to arrive at that in a few minutes and see whether it is or not.

I am simply asking you whether or not you agree that, if labor felt the law had deprived it of any opportunity to win a strike, that that would cause it to be less prone to call a strike?

Mr. FISHER. I do not feel there is any less chance for the unions to lose a strike today than there was previously.

Mr. JACOBS. The question is whether or not that situation would exist, assuming that to be the case?

Mr. FISHER. I think you are right; if you make it impossible for them to win. If that were the case, but I do not think it is.

Mr. JACOBS. In reference to the matter of statistics, you obviously were referring to statistics which refer to more peace in the labor field in the last year and a half. Have you ever examined the statistics for 1930?

Mr. FISHER. No; I have not.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not know the lowest strike records in this country were in 1930?

Mr. FISHER. I presume that strike history will follow depressions and recessions.

Mr. JACOBS. That is right. In other words, if a man had a job, he did not take a chance with it then?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, but that has not been true during the last 2 years, though, I do not believe.

Mr. JACOBS. That, again, only proves the point that other factors have considerable bearing upon statistics.

Mr. FISHER. I will go along with you on that.

Mr. JACOBS. Have you studied the record for 1937 and 1938?

Mr. FISHER. I have seen those statistics.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you remember the strike record for 1938 was only about a third of what it was in 1937?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct, and so was busines down at that time.

Mr. JACOBS. And the Wagner Act was validated in 1937?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, some one favoring the Wagner Act would claim that the situation was the result of the Wagner Act, but if you examined the record and found out the automobile industry was organized in 1937, you would get another factor to consider, would you not?

Mr. FISHER. I think that is probably correct.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, do you not agree that all this argument about statistics, until you examine the records and examine all the factors, does not amount to anything?

Mr. FISHER. Except this: You will find in most depressions, and in recession years, the amount of labor unrest is less than it is during full employment. That is a natural conclusion you will find from your statistics. Actually, there was no recession or depression in 1947 or 1948, and yet the labor unrest is still at a lower rate than previously.

Mr. JACOBS. It was following the war, though; you understand that, do you not? And that is another factor?

Mr. FISHER. But our war period—you are going back long before my time—but following this war period industrial production held up much longer than it did after the last war.

Mr. JACOBS. You had better read your statistics again. Do you happen to know what the percentage of strikes following World War I was as compared to statistics following World War II?

Mr. FISHER. No; I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. I mean the number of people who went out on strike after the World War I as compared to World War II.

Mr. FISHER. No; I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. If you will read Fortune magazine for the month of November 1946, page 121, you will find that there were five times as many people went out on strike immediately after World War I as there was after World War II. Get it and read it, and see if I am not correct.

As I understand you, you feel that the Taft-Hartley law has brought a better balancing between labor and management than we had before, is that correct?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. You have a feeling that the Taft-Hartley law does not, you might say, load the deck against a union in an economic strike?

Mr. FISHER. No; nor against the employer.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have a copy of the Taft-Hartley law there?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you examine section 9 (a)?

I do not want you to read it. I just mean to refer to it so you will know what we are talking about.

This is identical with the one I am referring to, and in that way I can give you the page number.

Mr. FISHER. What is the page number, sir?

Mr. JACOBS. That is at the top of page 9.

You recognize that, do you, as the section that provides for the certification of the union for collective bargaining purposes?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. I want you to follow in your mind the train of events that I am going to lead you through with reference to sections of the Taft-Hartley law. If you will drop down now to section (c), just a little below the middle of that same page, section (c) (1) (A) and (B); do you see that?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you recognize that as the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law whereby a union may be decertified?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. That is, a union that has been certified for more than a year there can be an election called, and that union can be decertified; is that correct?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct, with a majority of those voting.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you turn to section 9 (3) on the following page 10:

Employees on strike who are not entitled to reinstatement shall not be eligible to vote.

You remember that provision of the law, do you not?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. So, that, in effect, means this: That if a union calls an economic strike, that if the employer can put a token force into the plant, and someone calls for an election to decertify the union, there can be an election held by them while the strike is going on, and the employees on strike are not entitled to vote? You recognize that as being a provision of the law, do you not?

Mr. FISHER. I recognize that.

Mr. JACOBS. In reference to the next provision, I want to call your attention to page 7. I call your attention to section 8 (b) (4), which commences at the top, almost at the top, the third paragraph from the top of page 7. Do you recognize that under (B) and (C), section 8 (b) and (4), that it is an unfair labor practice for a union to attempt to require an employer to bargain with it before the union has been certified as the bargaining agent; you recognize that, do you not?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. So the union we are talking about, which was originally certified, if it eventually called an economic strike and later was decertified, is now in position it cannot demand the employer to recognize it any further; is that correct?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. If you will look at section 8 (b) (4) (C) you will also recognize that it is unlawful—or maybe it is the reverse—no, it is not—you will also recognize that it is unlawful for the employees who are on strike to even ask or encourage those who took their jobs for a lower wage to join them in the strike; do you recognize that as being the law under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. FISHER. You say that is spelled out in (4) (C)?

Mr. JACOBS. It is spelled out in this way: If you will back up to the language under (4) itself, it pertains to the provision in (C); if you will read both of them together. I assume if you were familiar with the first language up there, that qualifies all of the provisions.

Mr. FISHER. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you agree to that?

Mr. FISHER. That has been ruled, I think.

Mr. JACOBS. That has been ruled, and that is the law.

So, as we arrive at that point, we have a union that was certified, and later, after negotiations break down, calls an economic strike and replacements are called in, and a decertification election is held, and the old union is decertified, and now it becomes unlawful for that old union to even ask the new employees to join with it in holding up the wage scale; is that about what it amounts to?

Mr. FISHER. There is a little difference in sequence of events that take place, I think.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not admit the sequence of events could occur?

Mr. FISHER. They could occur, and I do not think it is bad.

Mr. JACOBS. Maybe it is not. There are some provisions here that pertain to the same situation.

If you will turn to page 15, and look at section 10 (l). Do you have section 10 (l) on page 15? It is down at the last paragraph on the page.

Mr. FISHER. I have it.

Mr. JACOBS. I will ask you to examine that and see if you do not recognize that as being a provision that calls on the regional counsel of the Labor Board to bring an action for injunction, such injunction to issue, at times, without notice, which forbids these old employees whose union has been decertified from even asking the new employees to join in the strike. If you will read the language at the top of page 16.

Mr. FISHER. I am not familiar with that provision.

Mr. IRVING. I yield all of my time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. What was your answer?

Mr. FISHER. I am not familiar with that provision.

Mr. JACOBS. If you will read the provision I have in mind, please, and then tell me whether you recognize that as being a provision having that effect. That is a very important provision that you should be acquainted with if you speak of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. FISHER. It is not one that occurs very frequently, however.

Mr. JACOBS. It is not likely to occur until there is some unemployment where the replacements can be procured?

Mr. FISHER. Except the Board, to my knowledge, does not step in.

Mr. JACOBS. Does not the law say there at section 10 (l) that when there is a violation of section 8 (b) (4) (A), (B), or (C)—that is the one we just referred to a minute ago—that if the attorney, after an investigation, finds there is reasonable cause to believe that such charge is true and that a complaint should issue—not that he may, or that he shall in his discretion—but the attorney for the Board shall, on behalf of the Board, petition any district court of the United States where the unfair-labor practice in question has occurred, for appropriate injunctive relief. Is that not what it says?

Mr. FISHER. I agree that where unfair-labor practice takes place that provision should remain.

Let us start over again.

Mr. JACOBS. We have a union which is certified, and that union engages in an economic strike against the employer, and the employer brings in replacements—and I will agree with you that the employer should always be entitled to bring in replacements; otherwise, he would be at the mercy of the union, just like the union should always have a right to strike—but I do not stop at that point. I will not disagree with you up to that point, but he has brought the replacements in, and now these replacements are the only ones who are permitted to vote in a decertification election to decertify the old union——

Mr. FISHER. Isn't it also true——

Mr. JACOBS. Just a minute, until I finish the sequence of events.

Mr. FISHER. Pardon me.

Mr. JACOBS. The old union is decertified, but we are going to keep adding to it and see where we get. The old union is decertified, and the old union then is forbidden, under sectioi 8 (b) (4) (B) or (C) from even going to these new employees and saying, "Look here, Bud, you took my job for two bits an hour less than I was working for. Do you not know you are cutting the wage scale and hurting yourself, and do you not think you should join up with us and try to hold the wage scale up?" They are forbidden from doing that under this law, is that not true?

Mr. FISHER. That is true. On the other hand——

Mr. JACOBS. Not on the other hand. Let us just take the one case, and see where we get on that.

Mr. FISHER. That is correct on this one case.

Mr. JACOBS. You and I will agree that that situation could not happen until there is some unemployment whereby the employer could get replacements, do we not?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. It has become an unfair labor practice for these employees to go and ask the working employees to join them, to hold up their wage scale. Do you know, as a matter of fact, that is a right that was recognized by the courts? That is, the right to ask workers to join with them to hold up the wage scale, that that right was recognized by the courts even when the yellow-dog contract was upheld as a sacred obligation?

Mr. FISHER. I am familiar with that.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, we are almost back before the days when the yellow-dog contract was outlawed?

Mr. FISHER. In that particular instance, yes.

Mr. JACOBS. In that particular instance we are back to the days before the yellow-dog contract was outlawed, but we have some other provisions to think of. We come over to 10 (l). We have an unfair labor practice, now, in doing a thing that was allowed under the yellow-dog contract, and then we come back to 10 (l), and does that not provide the United States Government can come in and enjoin these men from doing the very thing they could have done even in the last century? That is, to ask a fellow not to cut under the wage scale?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know it actually occurs in that way.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not think it has occurred in that way very often, because there has not been the unemployment whereby that situation could be implemented, but you will agree if the union is decertified, then it becomes mandatory for the attorney for the Labor Board to get the injunction; do you or do you not agree with that?

Mr. FISHER. I agree with your trend of events, in parts.

Mr. JACOBS. In the particular case we are talking about, is that what happens?

Mr. FISHER. That possibly could happen.

Mr. JACOBS. And it could happen where there is unemployment, could it not?

Mr. FISHER. Wherever employers can hire employees that are willing to work, but you are placing the emphasis on the right to strike rather than the right to work, and that is where I differ with you.

Mr. JACOBS. We will get to the right to work in a few minutes. Let us talk about the right to hold up the wage scale by concerted economic force.

We have the United States Government issuing an injunction against the former employees of this plant, forbidding them from even going and encouraging those who took their job for less money, to hold up the wage scale. You will admit that, will you not, under this case we are talking about?

Mr. FISHER. I think that could be done.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not know that Senator Taft has conceded (Columbus Citizen, Feb. 27, 1949) that is the effect of those sections, and do you not know that Life magazine, in an editorial in the November 29, 1948, issue conceded that?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not know Fortune magazine in its November 1948 issue conceded that?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Did you read Business Week for December 18, 1948, where it conceded the same thing?

Mr. FISHER. I have not seen that one number.

Mr. JACOBS. There are three publications, and the senior author of the act, who admit that is the effect, so that is it not a fact that the United States Government itself becomes an absolutely strike-breaking force just by virtue of the circumstances whereby an employer can employ replacements, and put them to work, and cause them to decertify the union by virtue of law to exercise the right that was exercised even when the "yellow dog" contract was upheld as valid, and it becomes an unfair labor practice that the United States Government must enjoin? Do you admit that, now, in the case that we are talking about?

Mr. FISHER. I do not have quite the same impression.

Mr. JACOBS. I thought you had conceded all the factors.

Mr. FISHER. I concede that could happen, individually, but not in the way you have outlined.

Mr. JACOBS. You agree they could come to the same result, regardless of the things I pointed out? Do you agree that it can come to that result?

Mr. FISHER. No; my understanding is that the decertification has to be issued long before the strike takes place—I mean the request for decertification has to be issued.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you point out to me the language in the Taft-Hartley law that requires that?

Mr. FISHER. I have not the clause before me, but that is the understanding I have.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you take it from me, as one who has read it very carefully, that I find no such language to that effect, and if you find it will you write me and tell me where it is?

Mr. FISHER. I shall do so.

Mr. JACOBS. There is another section here that has quite a bearing upon the same question. I want you to turn to section 8 (d).

Mr. FISHER. Is that page 8?

Mr. JACOBS. It is section 8 (d). It is on page 8.

Now, we are going to talk about the right to bargain collectively, and we have arrived at that point where the replacements or strike-breakers, or whatever you want to call them, have come in, and they have formed a new union, and have voted and decertified the old union, and now I want to examine the Taft-Hartley law and see what are the rights of the employees under this decertification.

If you will go below the indented portion on page 8, and see if you find these words——

Mr. FISHER. You are talking about 8 (d)? Section 8 (d) is on page 7.

Mr. JACOBS. I am sorry, but you are mistaken. You are looking at the wrong (d). This law is so involved, and there are so many subsections and sub-subsections that it is hard to follow. It is hard for a lawyer to follow, much less a layman; but I am talking about section (d), on page 8. It commences with the second paragraph on page 8, and that is the section which outlines the duty to bargain collectively, and it outlines what must be done by each party in order to bargain in good faith.

Have you found it?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Go below the indented language on page 8 and see if you do not read these words, and remember when you read them, that they apply to this new union that was formed out of the replacements or strikebreakers, and who now have the bargaining rights, so to speak, in this plant.

Let us read it:

The duties imposed upon employers, employees, and labor organizations by paragraphs 2, 3, and 4—

Those are the provisions that require collective bargaining—shall become inapplicable upon an intervening certification by the Board under which the labor organization or individual which is a party to the contract has been superseded or ceased to be representative of the employees.

Did I read it correctly?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. I have pointed out to you and made reference to approximately 13 separate provisions in the Taft-Hartley law, and I will ask you to state if it is not a fact that we have not only arrived at a point, from the examination of those 13 separate provisions—not 13 sections, but 13 provisions—whereby a union calls an economic strike, where there is any unemployment, is subjecting itself to a chain of circumstances whereby eventually the United States Government must enjoin that union from even asking the people who took its members' jobs, from joining with them in trying to hold up the wage scale?

Through that chain of circumstances, do you agree with me that that can very easily be the result, if the employer chooses to use it?

Mr. FISHER. I do not think the employer chooses it. I think the National Labor Relations Board is the one that is the motivating force.

Mr. JACOBS. The Board must follow the provisions that we in Congress write in the law; is that not correct?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, Congress did write those provisions in the law that I have called your attention to, did it not?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Then, do you not agree that any employer in the United States can demand that the Labor Board follow those provisions, and that the courts follow the provisions?

Mr. FISHER. Only if they find an unfair labor practice existing.

Mr. JACOBS. But does it not become an unfair labor practice for me, as an employee, to say to you, "Will you not come out and help me hold up the wage scale, other factors being present?"

Mr. FISHER. That is also true if the employer should tell that employee not to join that union, is it not?

Mr. JACOBS. You are talking about the economic coercion of the employer against the employee in the manner of organizing. I am not talking about that. I am talking about what the employer can do legally.

Is it not a fact, by virtue of your decertifying my union, that it then becomes unlawful for me to go to you and say, "Mr. Fisher, you are working for two bits an hour less than I was getting, so why do you not come out and join me in trying to hold up the wage scale?" Is that not correct? Do you agree that that is correct, or do you dispute that analysis of the provisions?

Mr. FISHER. I agree with your general statement, but I am not in sympathy with the fact that that is not a right provision.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all right. In other words, if you like the provision, that is all right; but I am going to lay it bare.

What I want to do is to lay it bare so the people can see what it is, and you have a perfect right to like the provision if you want to, if you think it is fair; but it is our duty to find out what the provision is.

One more step: Then, under 8 (d) we have a new union. You belong to the new union that was formed of the replacements who took the place of my union, and its members took my jobs in the plant, and now you are in there. What are your rights, as defined under section 8 (d)? Does not the law then relieve the employer even of the duty of bargaining, according to the outline of collective bargaining in good faith, of even bargaining in good faith with this new union that is formed of the replacements; is that not correct?

Mr. FISHER. I do not believe that is the way it is interpreted at all.

Mr. JACOBS. Let me ask you to interpret this language:

The duties imposed upon employers, employees, and labor organizations by paragraphs 2, 3, and 4, shall become inapplicable.

What does that mean?

Mr. FISHER. It means, of course, that those provisions are not applicable in this particular case.

Mr. JACOBS. That means that they shall become inapplicable; it means they do not apply? In what sort of situation? Is it not where intervening decertification of the Board, under which the labor organization or individual, which is a party to the contract, has been suspended? Is that not what it says?

Mr. FISHER. Under those three provisions, 2, 3, and 4, where they are suspended.

Mr. JACOBS. And that is exactly what we have been talking about here all the time, is it not?

Mr. FISHER. I am not familiar with that actually happening at any time.

Mr. JACOBS. I am not saying whether it happened or not. I am talking about what can happen as we coast into unemployment.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think the employees under this act are designated as being inapplicable.

Mr. JACOBS. In spite of the language which says they are?

Mr. FISHER. I do not think the language, in the first instance, says that.

Mr. JACOBS. What does the word "inapplicable" mean?

Mr. FISHER. That is probably true of those three sections, but I do not think yet that that is true of the law itself, and there are other sections that provide that you may bargain.

Mr. JACOBS. I think I will agree with you on that, and I think your answer is very good; but you will agree with me on this, that at least under those circumstances, the employer is relieved of at least three separate obligations in bargaining with a union that has been decertified, the union that called the strike?

Mr. FISHER. There appears to be some modification of the previous responsibilities.

Mr. JACOBS. I think you are a fair man, and I think you came up here to be helpful to this committee, and I want to ask you a fair question as one man to another: Did you have any idea before you sat down here to testify that under these various intricate provisions of this act any such result could have ever been obtained under any type of a case?

Mr. FISHER. I am familiar with the right of strikers, or the disallowance of the strikers, to vote in a certification election.

Mr. JACOBS. Were you familiar with the fact that it was under those circumstances, though, that the United States district court was forced to issue an injunction?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct, where the unions have caused an unfair labor practice to exist.

Mr. JACOBS. But the unfair labor practice being merely one employee asking another not to take his job for less money: did you know that when you came here to testify?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. You knew it when you came here to testify?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And did you know that after that had occurred the United States Government could say to me, "You cannot try to encourage Fisher to help you in holding up the wage scale"?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And did you know, regarding the new union that was formed, that the company did not have to bargain with it insofar as section 8 (d) (2), (3), and (4) was concerned?

Mr. FISHER. Those particular sections.

Mr. JACOBS. You knew that?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And you still think it is a fair law?

Mr. FISHER. I do.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier, do you have any questions?

Mr. WIER. I would like to talk to my townsman, yes.

You and I will not go out of Minnesota.

Mr. Fisher, how long have you been employed in Minnesota, or how long have you lived in Minnesota, or St. Paul?

Mr. FISHER. About 8 years, Mr. Wier.

Mr. WIER. Have you been in charge of labor relations for Minnesota Mining & Manufacturing Co. all of those 8 years?

Mr. FISHER. Seven of those 8 years.

Mr. WIER. From your presentation here, I am assuming that you are here primarily to point out that the Taft-Hartley Act has done and accomplished more in the field of industrial relations than was formerly done under the Wagner Act?

Mr. FISHER. Our experience has been that, yes.

Mr. WIER. From your experience?

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. WIER. During the 8 years you have been in Minnesota, let me ask you, Do you know of any State in the Union that per capita had less labor controversy than the State of Minnesota all during the 8 years?

Mr. FISHER. I know of none.

Mr. WIER. You know of none?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. And most of that was under the regime of the Wagner Labor Relations Act?

Mr. FISHER. I did not get that.

Mr. WIER. I say, most of the 8 years you have been in industrial relations work, was spent under the Wagner Act?

Mr. FISHER. And the State labor laws.

Mr. WIER. But under the Wagner Act, too?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. And Minnesota enjoyed a very fine labor-management relationship under the Wagner Act?

Mr. FISHER. I think the State has had a remarkable labor record; that is correct.

Mr. WIER. Since the inception of the Taft-Hartley Act, would you try to enlighten me as to what the benefits have been to all people in the State of Minnesota? We will speak of the three or four large industrial centers, as to what the benefits have been under the Wagner Act.

Mr. FISHER. I think the actual relationship between the employer and the men with whom they are doing business today has greatly improved. I think there is a greater harmonious relationship between them, and I think there is a better feeling, and so far as the personal contacts I have had with the men we deal with, certainly the caliber of the people has improved, and the attitude of those people has improved immensely.

Mr. WIER. Do you interpret that statement to mean that you feel the workers of Minnesota want the Taft-Hartley Act maintained?

Mr. FISHER. I have not had very many that I have dealt with indicate a very bitter feeling toward the Taft-Hartley Act in the same relationship as it is published and as given wide discussion in publications and other union organizations. I do not think the feeling is nearly as strong among the employees I have contacted, as you would be led to believe.

Mr. WIER. On that point let us refer to the Minnesota Sunday Tribune of Sunday, January 23. That is after the election, and that is since Congress convened.

They had taken a poll prior to the election. I will submit this to the committee. It is a copy of the poll that they sent out by their method and I am not always in sympathy with it, because I do not think the poll reaches too many of our people in the working-class status, or the lower status—and I gather that because they made a poll on my election to Congress, and they were away off.

This poll was sent out by the Minnesota Sunday Tribune under the heading "Disapproval of Taft-Hartley Act Rises Since Present Election Period."

And they quote the figures down in the story of the poll they took prior to the election, and the poll that they took on January 23, and it indicates here that a majority of the people answering this poll on the disapproval or approval of the Taft-Hartley Act showed a disapproval; do you feel that way?

Mr. FISHER. I think that all the polls that I have had any acquaintance with have indicated a disapproval of the Taft-Hartley Act as such and in toto. However, by the same token, all the polls which I have seen, which do not number a great many, indicate that the individual features of the Taft-Hartley Act are not in disfavor generally by the people in industry; I mean, the workers in industry.

Mr. WIER. Then we will drop the Minneapolis Sunday Tribune—and I am not here giving a commercial for it, because there are too many for me—but I use that as evidence of a poll that they took recently and of those that they canvassed. As representative of the Third Congressional District of Minnesota, it is natural for people to display to me their sentiments, sometime with some misgiving.

Now, I have had some petitions following the very dramatic appeals sent out in behalf of the law, one by Fulton Lewis, Jr., and I have one of the polls sent out by General Electric to their stockholders. But when I add them all up, they show overwhelming sentiment for the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. And some of these are your employees, Mr. Fisher. Every one of these pages has 15 signatures, and their addresses, requesting the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act and the reinstatment of the Wagner Act. I weigh that against the opposition that I received, and I will also submit those to the committee when we get a full committee in support of my position for repeal.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has 2 minutes of time.

Mr. WIER. Two minutes. I see a word down here. I cannot discuss this legally as Mr. Jacobs discusses it. I can only talk in the language of the union hall. So I find a new word after 50 years of life and being on the school board.

In your statement here it says, "And this occurred under the present guaranty of free speech to the employer. The Board's interpretation of this was strictly ad hoc." Now, I know what "in hock" means, but I do not know what "ad hoc" means. What was the standing of the case when they said that?

Mr. FISHER. That was an improvised ruling that was not consistent with the previous rulings, in our opinion, nor was it consistent with the intent of the law.

Mr. WIER. I think the labor movement will agree with you in that position, and we get the same interpretation.

Mr. FISHER. You will be amazed how often we do agree.

Mr. WIER. Yes, that is right. But we do not agree on the repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. FISHER. I can even get some to agree with you on that.

Mr. WIER. I only have 2 minutes?

Mr. BAILEY. You have only 1 minute now.

Mr. WIER. I was going to go into the question of free speech that has been dwelled upon, but I want to say to you, and you can take it back to Minnesota, that Roy Wier stands, after 2 years of experience, under the Taft-Hartley Act, for absolute repeal and the reinstatement of the Wagner Act with such amendments as Congress deems advisable.

That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Have you heard the men in your plants discuss the check-off requirement?

Mr. FISHER. Yes, sir; we have had a considerable period of time over which that problem has been prevalent in our plants throughout the country. Incidentally, we have had no plant where there has ever been any compulsory union membership. And our relationship with our employees has been fine. We have never had a work stoppage at any time that I have been with the company, and our relationship with our employees had been exceptional, and with our union officials.

We have never had any difficulty. I think Mr. Wier can bear that out. We have a reputation for having splendid relations. The check-off provision has been a stumbling block, or the closed shop, or the union shop. Any form of compulsory union membership has been a stumbling block in those relationships, however.

Mr. McConnell. Have the individual employees expressed themselves in regard to the check-off? I mean, do they want the present requirements, or do they want them dropped? Or what would you say?

Mr. Fisher. As far as the comments that have been made by our employees, you will find those who are really strong unionists favoring, of course, the check-off and the compulsory features of the membership. The others are opposed to it. They do not want to be compelled to do anything of that nature. They feel they ought to have the right to join or not join the labor organization as they see fit, and that their individual rights should be protected.

Mr. McConnell. How does the written-consent provision work out that is in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. Fisher. The written?

Mr. McConnell. The written consent of the employee to have his dues checked off out of his wages?

Mr. Fisher. That has been working out fairly well. We do have check-off provisions in our plant, but they are strictly voluntary. The individual voluntarily signs a card, and he has a right to withdraw his membership at any time that he so sees fit.

Mr. McConnell. That is right.

Mr. Fisher. We have had a few instances where employees have decided to withdraw their membership after having belonged for a while, and we get the withdrawal notice, and within a day or two after that, we get the notice also to reinstate the dues deductions.

Mr. McConnell. How about welfare funds and requirements to have a strict accounting, and so on? Do they object to those provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. Fisher. I have heard no objection as far as requiring the unions to account for those funds. Of course, we are not involved specifically with that type of welfare fund; so probably they would not comment on it. But we have had no comment or indication of any objection with regard to those requirements. I think most of the members of our employee group feel that there is no objection to having employee representatives report the conduct of their business the same as employers are required to report their business conduct.

Mr. McConnell. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. No questions.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Nixon?

Mr. Nixon. Mr. Fisher, Mr. Wier made mention of the labor conditions in the State of Minnesota, and was particularly referring to what I think he said was one of the most outstanding eras of labor peace in the entire country during the period of the Wagner Act immediately preceding the passage of Taft-Hartley. I wonder if you would describe to the committee, if you are familiar with them, the conditions which preceded the passage of the Minnesota Labor-Management Relations Act, which incidentally was in effect during that period?

Mr. FISHER. I was agreeing with Mr. Wier from the standpoint of my experience in the State of Minnesota. There has been a terrific amount of trouble in the State of Minnesota prior to that, and those of you who are acquainted with the labor movement in the State of Minnesota will certainly recall the trouble with 544.

Mr. NIXON. In fact, the reason the Minnesota Labor-Management Act was passed was that prior to that time, there were abuses which had grown up, abuses which were as bad as any in the country, and the Minnesota act was passed to correct those abuses, and as much as anything else, that was probably responsible for this era of peace which Mr. Wier referred to.

Mr. FISHER. The history of the labor relations of Minnesota will certainly bear that out.

Mr. NIXON. And as a practical matter, also, is it not true that several of the provisions of the Minnesota Labor-Management Act in principle are contained also in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. WIER. Will you yield there?

Mr. NIXON. You gentlemen have had 50 minutes, and I have 10. If you do not mind, I would like to continue my questioning.

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman does not yield.

Mr. NIXON. If when I finish I have time, I will be glad to give you the time, Mr. Wier.

Now, you also did not during the time that Mr. Jacobs was questioning you, I think, have an opportunity to present your answers to his questions in detail. As I recall, from having listened to the questions that he asked, he gave you his version of the interpretation of the act, but your answers were more or less monosyllabic, you really did not go into anything.

I would like to go into this matter which Mr. Jacobs has gone into in regard to the decertification of unions where the employer replaces so-called economic strikers with so-called employer stooges. That in effect, I think, is the gist of his argument. Did I understand that it is your opinion that that is something that has been happening under the act?

Mr. FISHER. I do not know. I do not think that that happens. I do not think that they are employer stooges.

Mr. NIXON. As a matter of fact, there has not been any case that you are aware of, has there, in which that has happened to date, where economic strikers have been replaced by the employer, where the employer has manipulated a decertification election, and therefore has shut out the former union and put in its place one which is under his control?

Mr. FISHER. It has always been my opinion that the decertification has to be issued or filed prior to the strike and prior to the beginning of negotiations. In other words, it is my opinion and has been my understanding that if you have a strike situation, you cannot then proceed with the decertification.

Mr. NIXON. I think in order to get this thing in the record and get both sides of it in the record, the argument which Mr. Jacobs made, and which is being made quite generally along this point is briefly this: First of all, a union which is in a plant and which is an independent union—I mean, not employer-controlled—strikes for economic reasons—for higher wages, for example—then the company during that period replaces the strikers with what he terms strikebreakers. That is the word which Mr. Jacobs has used in his argument. Then these replacements, the so-called strikebreakers, which, of course, are company-controlled, by his own statement, since he uses the term "strike-breakers," then petition for an election to obtain decertification of the union which formerly was in the plant and whose members are now out for economic reasons. And obviously, of course, they will succeed, because under those circumstances, and I quote from the statement which Mr. Jacobs put in the record—

> The precise effect of the Taft-Hartley law up to this point is to permit the struck employer * * * to manipulate the decertification of the union of his old employees. * * * Thus—going further in his statement—

> without regard to merit, if the employer can procure plant replacements, he can force the Government to enjoin even peaceful persuasion, picketing, boycotting, etc.

Now, the reason that I read that is that you noted the words "plant replacements." You have noted the words "manipulate the decertification of the union." And I think from Mr. Jacobs' own statements, it is quite clear that what he was referring to here was a case in which an employer was able to control the second union, or at least control it to the extent of getting it to vote the other union out of existence, because he also used the word "strikebreakers."

In reference to that, I think also you attempted to get this answer in to one of Mr. Jacobs' questions, but he shut you off. But I have the provision which you are referring to, and I would like to read it so that there will be no question about it, because I do not think you have a copy there that is available. I am reading from section 8 (a) (1) of the act—domination of unions. I am not reading from the section itself, but from the commentary on the act and on this section by the Congress Clearing House:

> Under the amended act as under the original NRLA, it is declared an unfair labor practice for an employer to dominate or interfere with the formation of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it.

Under that provision as interpreted under the original Wagner Act, and particularly under that provision as interpreted at the present time, because in this case the Taft-Hartley Act went even further than the Wagner Act went. The Wagner Act originally provided that company domination—at least in effect the Wagner Act through interpretation by the NLRB provided that company domination could not occur in the case of an affiliated union.

Mr. FISHER. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. And the Taft-Hartley Act made it clear that was to apply both in the case of an affiliated union as well as an independent union, and I think that all of us will agree that there is a great likelihood in many cases where even affiliated unions can be company-dominated. But among the interpretations which have been handed down, these particular acts are prohibited: Solicitation on behalf of a labor organization by company officials and supervisory employees; linking of benefits arising from group insurance or similar employment benefits with membership in a favored labor organization; advancements of money for purposes of newspapers in favored labor organizations; discriminatory rules with respect to solicitation and other organizational activities favoring one union over another; financial aid to a union—and then even this—use of company facilities such as bulletin boards, mimeograph machines, and stenographic services granted to a union.

In effect, in other words, as we see from this section of the act, if an employer were to manipulate the decertification of the union, if he were to employ strikebreakers and set up a phony union under the circumstances which Mr. Jacobs has pointed out in his statement and questions to you, if he were to procure plant replacements, in that case, I think you will agree with me that those actions would fall right within the provisions of section 8 (a) (1) and section 8 (a) (2) in regard to company domination of that union.

Would you not agree with that?

Mr. FISHER. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. In fact, an employer, of course, as we know, cannot file a decertification petition, and if the petition was filed, as it must be, by the employee, it must first be investigated by the Board; is that correct?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. NIXON. And if any manipulation were attempted, or had been attempted, the petition would have to be dismissed, would it not?

Mr. FISHER. And I think that the other union also has the right to bring charges of unfair labor practices against the employer at that time.

Mr. NIXON. Yes. And another point should be made at this time and that is this: Is it not true that until decertification of the striking union actually occurs, picketing, of course, is permitted?

Mr. FISHER. That is correct.

Mr. NIXON. Until decertification is handed down, the picketing can continue right up to that time.

Mr. FISHER. If the previous bargaining agent prevailed.

Mr. NIXON. That is correct. In place of putting these questions, I simply wanted to bring forth the fact that in reading this act, as in reading any act, you can pick out any specific section of it and say this word, this phrase, or this section, combined with other sections, could result in practices which would be very detrimental to labor or very detrimental to the employer, and what have you. But I think that this showed the necessity of reading this act, and in the course of interpreting it, to read all of the sections of the act and to consider them in relation to the other sections which might be applicable.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, that was my point with Mr. Jacobs, and I think it is right.

Mr. NIXON. That is the point you were trying to make?

Mr. FISHER. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. That is all.

Mr. WIER. Will you yield now, Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. NIXON. Yes. Go ahead.

Mr. WIER. I have no questions.

Reference was made by you and Mr. Fisher to labor disputes existing before the so-called State Conciliation Act. Are you familiar with the date of that 544 strike?

Mr. NIXON. Are you talking to me or to the witness?

Mr. WIER. To you. I was asking you.

Mr. NIXON. Well, ask the witness the questions. The witness is on the stand.

Mr. WIER. All right.

Are you familiar, Mr. Fisher, with the year of the 544 strike?

Mr. FISHER. It was in 1934, I think.

Mr. WIER. 1934. Are you familiar with when that great liberal former Governor, Mr. Stassen, in his first term set up the Labor Regulations Act of Minnesota?

Mr. FISHER. I am familiar with that; yes.

Mr. WIER. What year was that?

Mr. FISHER. That was in the latter part of the 1930's.

Mr. WIER. 1939. That was a considerable length of time after the 544 strike—5 years.

Mr. FISHER. I do not think that the 544 strike alone caused that to come about. There were many others that fostered the need for such a law.

Mr. NIXON. Has the gentleman finished?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, the net result of what you are saying is that as a result of the 544 strike, and of other abuses which are common knowledge, which had grown up in the State of Minnesota; the Minnesota law in 1939 was enacted, and the 8-year period which Mr. Wier referred to of this unprecedented industrial peace and very cordial labor-management relationships under the Wagner Act took place after 1939 when the new act of Minnesota was passed?

Mr. FISHER. That is my understanding. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. That is all.

Mr. FISHER. Then I can vouch for what happened in 1939.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Velde?

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Fisher, I am not going to ask you very many questions. I see that you have been put through a very, very hard grilling here for the last half hour. There are just one or two points that I would like to bring out with respect to the act which I think you missed. One of them was the anti-Communist affidavit clause.

Mr. FISHER. I am glad you brought that in. I did not cover all the points in my presentation.

Mr. VELDE. I was just going to ask you if in your work that you had come across the actual operation of that clause.

Mr. FISHER. Yes, we have. We have had a union representing our employees in St. Paul that had considerable difficulty with regard to that problem of the Communists in their particular union, particularly at the top of their union. They did not take action on this particular situation until the Taft-Hartley Act had been passed and gave them, in my opinion, courage to do so.

Now, I was talking to the regional director of the Gas, Coke and Chemical, CIO, which any of you can check, just before I came to Washington, regarding that particular point. He agreed that the Taft-Hartley Act and its anti-Communist provision had certainly given them the tool that they needed actually to correct a situation that should have been corrected a long time ago, in their union as well, and has enabled their union to be sounder, in his opinion.

Mr. VELDE. Do you think that the present Taft-Hartley Act is fair to require an officer of a union to sign an affidavit without requiring his employer to sign an affidavit?

Mr. FISHER. I can see no reason under the sun why anyone would refuse to sign such an affidavit, for myself. I am sure that I speak for the employers that I am familiar with in Minnesota, that they would have no objection, either, to signing such an affidavit. I believe the law was designed to take care of needs that were recognized and existed. There had not been recognized the need for the employers to sign it.

However, on the basis of my argument for an equal balance and a workable balance between labor and management, I would see no objection at all of putting the law into effect requiring all employers to sign such an affidavit. The Supreme Court Justices sign it; the postal officials sign it. I see no reason why anyone else would object to signing it. It is a simple proposition.

Mr. VELDE. Have you in your work come across some officials of unions who refused to sign affidavits? And if so, what explanation did they give?

Mr. FISHER. We have had none at all with regard to those that I am directly in contact with. The only thing that the unions have said that they disliked about it was that it was a nuisance.

Mr. VELDE. Just a nuisance to sign your name?

Mr. FISHER. You see, as they explained it——

Mr. VELDE. I think they have forms for that purpose.

Mr. FISHER. That is right.

Mr. VELDE. And all they would have to do would be to sign their names, of course.

Mr. FISHER. That is all.

Mr. VELDE. What generally do you think is behind this so-called demand to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act in toto and reestablish the Wagner Act? What is your idea?

Mr. FISHER. I think we would be definitely making a step backward, so far as good labor relations are concerned. I do not think that any law that protects one side and not the other is ever going to provide for good relations. It is going to have to treat both sides properly in order to make for good relations, and once you do that it will work. If you do not, I believe it will continue to work up to a point where you just cannot legislate laws that protect one party and cause the other to be guilty no matter what he might do or what his desires are.

Mr. VELDE. I might say that I have had experience in talking to the workingman and the ordinary union man and that I will agree with you when you say that they agree with all the points of the Taft-Hartley Act but disagree with it as an act itself. Now, what do you think is the reason?

Mr. FISHER. I take Minnesota Labor and Victory, the CIO paper, and all the labor publications principally to know what is going on in that particular field, and I do not think that you can possibly spend as much money and put as much effort into condemning a name, condemning an act generally, and actually pinpointing every effort in the book against a particular thing without making it effective. I would be willing to grant that there are not 25 percent of our employees who have ever read the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. VELDE. I would agree with you on that, but I think the percentage is a lot lower than that.

Mr. FISHER. I am being conservative, I agree. But the fact is that they have never read the act, they are following the leadership by rote, and that is, I believe, borne out by the fact that they do agree with the principles of the act if you talk to them along that line.

Mr. VELDE. Along that line, do you think that there are any parts of the Taft-Hartley Act that should be repealed?

Mr. FISHER. There is one section, particularly, that stands out in my opinion from an industrial-organization viewpoint that is not applicable, nor is it conducive to proper relations within the ranks of labor and management, and that is the provision that enables the craft unions to break away from a plant union. We have a situation that has not occurred, but it is very possible to have happen, where we will have probably eight men in a boiler room. Now, those men, of course, can determine what bargaining agent they wish to have represent them. We also have probably five or six machinists or four or five electricians, all of them separate units. This could happen, and it does exist so far as the boiler-room employees are concerned in our St. Paul plant, with 4,500 employees involved.

If those eight men in the boiler room decide they no longer feel the relationship exists that should exist and they wish to terminate their employment by striking, or if they wish to strike, that means that the 4,500 people are completely out of work as a result of the wishes of those eight men. I do not believe from an industrial standpoint that the segregation of craft units is sound, nor is it actually workable insofar as large units are concerned.

Mr. VELDE. That is all I have. Thank you for coming here. You have presented a very fair and honest statement, and I appreciate it.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Fisher.

The committee at this time will be pleased to hear David Roadley, American Cotton Manufacturers Association.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Chairman, while he is getting ready to speak, I would like to present an editorial from the Seafarers Log of the Seafarers International Union to be placed in the record at this point.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke asks at this point in the proceeding that he be permitted to place in the record an editorial from the Seafarers Log. If there are no objections, it will be placed in the record at this point.

(The editorial referred to is as follows:)

TAFT-HARTLEY ACT IN ACTION

A situation which developed in New York early this week clinches the argument that the Taft-Hartley Act must be consigned to the bottom of the deep blue—and quick. On Monday morning, after contract negotiations between the giant Continental Baking Co. and the AFL Teamsters, who deliver the company's products, failed to produce an agreement, the 200 drivers involved walked out.

Immediately, the five other of the city's largest bakeries, who were not at all involved, locked out their employees. Close to 8,000 employees, most of them bakers, were thrown out of work. And the city of 7,000,000 people were shut off from 70 percent of their daily supply of bread. Schools as well as homes were affected. The people were shut off from 70 percent of its daily supply.

Purely and simply, the action of the big bread companies is a secondary boycott. The five companies, who along with Continental maintain a "union" representing management, took economic action against their employees by locking them out, although neither the companies nor their workers are involved in Continental's dispute. The Taft-Hartley law expressly forbids labor unions from using this weapon.

By carefully allowing employers immunity from the secondary boycott prohibition, the Taft-Hartley law says to management, in effect, "Go ahead, boys; use anything in the books to put the boots to your workers. If the public happens to get kicked in the breadbasket in the process, that's their tough luck."

Organized labor long ago learned not to expect anything from the Nation's press. None of the so-called public guardians has yet uttered a single word in condemnation of the big dough boys' rank abuse of the 8,000 employees who had been locked out. Nor have they pleaded a syllable in behalf of the city's 7,000,000 men, women, and children. The big baking combines are heavy advertisers, you see.

In fact, on the very morning that its news columns announced that the company combine "threw 7,700 persons out of work," the New York Times cautioned Congress not to be too hasty about getting rid of the Taft-Hartley law. "The public," said the Times, "has a vital stake in the outcome * * *"

And for once, the New York Times said a mouthful, even if it didn't mean to. For the public always has a vital stake in issues between management and organized labor, especially when labor is on the short end of the stick. Because, no matter how hard the Times and the rest of the "go-easy-on-management crowd" tries to conceal the fact, the public and labor in this country are one and the same.

Let Senator Taft and his backers understand that in a democracy, management rates no special privileges and immunities aimed at hurting the Nation's working men and women—the public, that is.

(News item: Bread prices have gone up despite decreases in the prices of wheat and flour, results of a United States Department of Agriculture survey reveal.

(The Government agency found that between January and October 1948, farmers were getting 30 percent less for their wheat and the retail price of flour was down 15 percent. During the period the retail price of bread rose 0.7 percent to an all-time high of 14.5 cents a pound. Out of the 14.5 cents the consumer pays, 9.4 cents goes to the baker and retailer.

(The Securities and Exchange Commission announced that during the third quarter of 1948 the six big baking companies showed profits of $103,606,000 compared with $95,430,000 for the same period in the previous year.)

TESTIMONY OF DAVID T. ROADLEY, PERSONNEL DIRECTOR, KENDALL MILLS, CHARLOTTE, N. C.

Mr. ROADLEY. I am David T. Roadley, of Charlotte, N. C. I am personnel director for the Kendall Mills which operates cotton spinning and weaving mills in North and South Carolina.

I am speaking today for the American Cotton Manufacturers Association, which, as some of you know, represents the largest portion of this country's cotton textile manufacturing industry. The headquarters of the association are in Charlotte. Most of the units represented in the association are in the southeastern States and these mills employ upward of 500,000 workers. This makes them from the standpoint of employment, one of the country's largest industries.

For the past 14 years, with the exception of 31 months spent in the Navy during the war, all of my work has been in the industrial relations field. I spent 3 years as a conciliator with the United States Conciliation Service in the mid-thirties. Later, I was labor relations counsel for two large midwestern industrial concerns. During this period I had extensive experience in the negotiation of labor contracts and feel that I am familiar with the problems involved, both from the standpoint of the employers and employees. I have been in my present capacity since April, 1946, and, as indicated, my work in the South is directly concerned with labor matters.

My company has seven mills in North and South Carolina. Four of these mills are nonunion; three are unionized, two being CIO unions and one an AFL union.

Our experience under the Labor-Management Relations Act, commonly known as the Taft-Hartley Act, has been that of most industries. The cotton textile industry has lost fewer man-days from strikes during the life of this act than in the comparative period preceding the act. There has been a decline in the number of unfair labor practice cases filed, even taking into account these provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which authorize unfair labor practice complaints against unions. Summed up, the association feels that the dire predictions of industrial strife and injury to the labor movement of the Taft-Hartley Act have not been borne out. This, in view of the hostile attitude of union labor officials towards the act, is extremely significant.

Your attention is called to the fact that spokesmen for organized labor have leveled broad and generalized charges against the Taft-Hartley Act. They have called it a slave labor act and have characterized it as detrimental to union interests without being specific.

It is our considered judgment that the act must be examined carefully and in detail, and it must be scrutinized, not in the light of vague generalities, but in the light of what its provisions are intended to do and what they actually have done.

I would like briefly to summarize, from my experience, the differences in the labor contract negotiations under the Wagner Act and under the Taft-Hartley Act. I think I can say categorically that, under the Wagner Act most employers entered into collective bargaining negotiations with the feeling that they were unarmed and the unions were armed. In other words, the Wagner Act gave the unions, figuratively speaking, a loaded gun, already cocked, to be fired at the employers when and if the union representative wanted to pull the trigger.

I do not need to emphasize that this situation was not conducive to good labor relations. While the employers felt they were at a disadvantage, the union felt definitely that they had the advantage. Thus, time and again, bargaining began in a hostile atmosphere. Under such circumstances, the agreements reached oftentimes constituted simply an armed truce and further conflict was inevitable.

Let me illustrate some of the circumstances to which I refer. One of the announced purposes of the Wagner Act was to encourage "practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions."

But the Wagner Act imposed an obligation upon the employer to bargain in good faith; it imposed no such obligation on the part of the union.

The Wagner Act listed five specific unfair labor practices on the part of employers; it listed no unfair labor practices on the part of unions, not a single one.

The Wagner Act encouraged free speech for union representatives, it gagged employers.

Under the Wagner Act, the employers came to feel that the National Labor Relations Board was an ally of the unions.

This, in part, grew out of the union bias on the part of some Government officials, but primarily it went back to the obligations and restrictions imposed on employers under the Wagner Act, without corresponding obligations and restrictions being imposed upon unions.

Employers with whom I have had experience came to feel that Government was standing by, not in the position of an impartial agent, but as a policeman with a club, ready, if necessary, to swing upon their heads.

For example, let me quote the provisions of the Wagner Act with regard to the obligation to bargain collectively:

Section 7 of the Wagner Act is as follows:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in concerted activities, for the purpose of collective bargaining or other mutual aid or protection.

Furthermore, section 8 of the Wagner Act states:

> It shall be unfair labor practice for an employer—
> (1) To interfere with, restrain, or coerce employees in the exercise of the rights guaranteed in section 7.

You will note that the provisions refer only to the rights of the employees to organize; the act is significantly silent upon the rights of employers.

Section 7 of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 is as follows:

> Employees shall have the right to self-organization, to form, join, or assist labor organizations, to bargain collectively through representatives of their own choosing, and to engage in other concerted activities for the purpose of collective bargaining, or other mutual aid or protection, and shall also have the right to refrain from any or all of such activities except to the extent that such right may be affected by an agreement requiring membership in a labor organization as a condition of employment as authorized in section 8 (a) (3).

This language, as can be seen, takes nothing away from the rights of employees but it does give the individual employee the right to refrain from union activities, a right which he should have.

Furthermore, section 8 (b) (3) of the Taft-Hartley Act makes it an unfair labor practice on the part of a union—> to refuse to bargain collectively with an employer, provided it is the representative of his employees subject to the provisions of section 9 (a);

I have quoted these passages from the Taft-Hartley Act because they are representative of many other changes in the act; changes which simply are intended to put both employer and employee on the same footing and to protect not only employers and employees but the rights of the individual workers. The foundation of any stable and constructive relationship between employers and employees is equality under any law which is designed to govern industrial relations.

These charges to which I have referred restore balance to the Federal law regarding labor-management relations, balance to which union officials object and which, when examined in detail, are at face value fair and equitable.

There are many provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which we consider important. We know of none that we would discard entirely, unless it can be clearly shown they are inequitable. Today, however,

I want to point out and dwell upon several provisions which, in our opinion, are absolutely vital to sound labor-relations legislation.

In this connection, I want to mention first the provision which restates the employer's right of free speech. This provision is found in section 8 (c) and is as follows:

(c) The expressing of any views, argument, or opinion, or the dissemination thereof, whether in written, printed, graphic or visual form, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice under any of the provisions of this Act, if such expressions contain no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit.

Please note that these rights apply both to employers and employees.

It is amazing to find that Congress, in the Taft-Hartley Act, had to enact language which gave the employer something that is specifically granted him by the first amendment to the Constitution.

Some of the reasons why this provision came into being are found in House Report No. 245 (80th Cong.) during consideration of labor legislation. This report said:

Although the Labor Board says it does not limit free speech, its decisions show that it uses against people what the Constitution says they can say freely. Thus, if an employer criticizes a union, and later a foreman discharged a union official for gross misconduct, the Board may say that the official's misconduct warranted his being discharged, but "infer," from what the employer said, perhaps long ago, that the discharge was for union activity, and reinstate the official with back pay. It has similarly abused the right of free speech in abolishing and penalizing unions of which it disapproved but which workers wished as their bargaining agents.

Obviously, if one side may say what it wishes to workers, and the other side is restrained, the group which is given the right to talk freely has an overwhelming and unfair advantage in collective bargaining, or in any matter related to employer-employee relations.

We feel that the equity of the free speech provisions are so clear that extended argument, pro or con, is not required.

I have touched already upon the obligation on the part of both employers and employees to bargain collectively and in good faith, and have told you that this obligation was a one-sided one under the Wagner Act.

From my experience, I would like to tell you what often happened before the Taft-Hartley Act. The unions took the position that the employer had to make a counter offer to a "demand" made, no matter how unreasonable it was. Many, many Board decisions supported this position. The union came in, made its proposals, and sat back to watch the unhappy employer squirm, and if he failed to make a satisfactory counter offer, he was charged with being unfair, or failing to bargain in good faith.

I mentioned earlier that the employer oftentimes felt, when he approached the bargaining table, that the other side had a gun already cocked and ready to fire at him.

Collective bargaining is a travesty unless both parties know that there can be mutual give and take.

We urge you therefore to retain, in their present form, the collective-bargaining provisions and definitions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

We agree with the premise, found in the Wagner Act, that employers should be liable for violations of contracts and should be subject to suits for damages in the Federal courts. We also feel—strongly so—that unions should also be similarly liable.

Section 301 of the Taft-Hartley Act makes unions—and employers—liable for suits for breach of contracts. We contend that the equity of section 301 is clear and warrants retention in its entirety.

In this connection, House Report 245, which I have previously referred to, said in part:

> Labor organizations cannot justifiably ask to be treated as responsible contracting parties unless they are willing to assume the responsibilities of such contracts to the same extent as the other party must assume his.

At the time of the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, union leaders predicted there would be a multiplicity of suits against unions as a result of the provisions which put unions on the same basis as employers, so far as suits for damages are concerned. Those predictions have not been borne out. The record shows that around 60 lawsuits have been brought thus far under the provisions of section 301 and at least 19 of these have been brought by unions.

Again we say that equal treatment of both parties so far as the right to sue for breach of contracts is concerned seems eminently fair. The provisions referred to are violently opposed by union leaders. The only justification for this opposition, as we see it, is that it restricts their power.

May I digress for a moment to point out that the rights of free speech in the case of employers, the obligation to bargain collectively in good faith, and the mutual obligation for the observance of contracts, all would be restored to their previous one-sided basis if H. R. 2032, the Lesinski bill, is enacted. This bill would restore the original Wagner Act in all its essentials.

I am not here today arguing theories. I am contending for rights which we feel are justified by all the rules of equity and fair play. We would remind you that the Wagner Act became law in 1935. Very soon, it became apparent that the act was lopsided and demands began to be made for changes. In fact, no act of its scope could be expected to stand very long without the revisions which time and experience demanded.

Nevertheless, when the Taft-Hartley Act was under discussion, union leaders had no suggestions for changes. They stood adamantly behind the provisions of an unfair law. Now, we find them striving to restore the act, disregarding the fact that it operated without amendments for 14 years. We submit that this is a most unreasonable and arbitrary attitude and furnishes sufficient grounds for a most careful and searching inquiry into their attacks upon the existing law. In other words, we feel this committee should demand that the unions bring before it a bill of particulars and not be permitted to sway this committee with blanket charges and dire predictions of what may happen in the future—predictions which have not been borne out in the record of labor-management operations under the Taft-Hartley law thus far.

In view of the trend the world over towards totalitarianism and its results as exemplified in Fascist Germany and Communist Russia, to name only two instances, we think you will agree that the extension of Federal power in this country should be only upon the showing of urgent need.

Yes, H. R. 2032 contains a new provision which would invade the State field of legislation and would expressly prohibit the rights of the States to legislate on the subject of the right to work. In other words, State laws which prohibit the closed shop and which put other legitimate restrictions upon union powers should be outlawed. The provision in H. R. 2032 would set aside statutes and constitutional provisions in 17 States. Thrice recently, the Supreme Court of the United States upheld the rights of the States to enact such statutes.

The rights of States to legislate in the labor relations fields should be carefully protected. In this connection, it might be pointed out that the States can well serve as laboratories in this fluid and still uncertain field. From State experience with labor legislation may come data invaluable to the Government itself, when and if it later is determined that the Congress should again legislate in this field.

We think also that almost everyone will agree that the closed shop is wrong in principle. It discriminates against the rights of the individual to work. The unions do not defend the closed shop on principle. They argue for it on the basis of practicality. Rarely do they meet the fundamental issues—protection of the right of the individual to a job.

We hope this committee continues the prohibition in Taft-Hartley against the closed shop. The union shop is permitted by the act. We think this goes far as even the unions should desire to go in restricting the right to work.

In conclusion, let me mention briefly some other provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act which we think should be retained in their present form, or with only minor modifications.

It seems evident that unions should not be permitted to coerce their own members. The list of other unfair labor practices on the part of unions seems reasonable. As we have indicated, they correspond to a list of unfair labor practices on the part of employers.

The procedural changes which the Taft-Hartley Act makes in the administration of the National Labor Relations Board are important. The act provides that an election may be ordered only after a prehearing to determine matters in dispute. Under the Wagner Act, the Board oftentimes held a hearing after the election itself, and after the union had been certified. There was little an employer could do under such circumstances.

We think, as is the case at present, that a Board certification should issue only after a valid election has been held, and one in which a majority of the employees have designated the specific union certified.

There can be no legitimate quarrel, in our opinion, with the provisions in the existing law which require that the NLRB decide cases on the basis of substantial evidence. Nor should there be disagreement with that section of the act which permits circuit courts of appeal, before enforcing Board orders, to examine the entire record to see that the Board's decisions as to facts are based on substantial evidence, rather than upon a fragment of the evidence.

Before the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Board had the power to levy monetary judgments without making them subject to review in the courts on the question of the facts—if there was any evidence whatever to support the findings. This is an authority that no other similar agency had.

Other procedural changes which are intended to protect the rights of both parties in a labor controversy should be kept in the law. We would very much like to see the Office of General Counsel remain independent. As the present law stands, the counsel has the same relation to the Board that a district attorney has to a Federal court. The general counsel, at present, is not employed by the Board and does not feel the necessity of justifying prosecutions unless they are supported by the evidence.

The association recommends that the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service remain an independent agency. When the Service was under the Labor Department, many employers felt it had become an arm of the unions and that its entrance into a labor dispute meant additional pressure for a settlement favorable to the union.

Jurisdictional strikes have almost entirely ceased under the Taft-Hartley Act. Under the present law, jurisdictional strikes constitute an unfair labor practice. Even the Lesinski bill, H. R. 2032, would make certain jurisdictional strikes an unfair labor practice and would empower the NLRB to settle them. We see no reason to change an act which has virtually done away with jurisdictional strikes, strikes which unions themselves do not attempt to defend.

In conclusion, let me state again that the burden of proof is upon those who want to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act and return to the situation which prevailed before its enactment.

The Taft-Hartley Act became law after hearings on labor-management relations which extended over a long period of years. There is ample testimony before your committee and in the record on the abuses which flourished under the Wagner Act, abuses which contravened the rights of both employers and workers.

On the basis of our experience and the evidence presented, we feel that the existing law has gone a long way toward establishing the balance in labor-management relations which is necessary to effective and peaceful collective bargaining. To scrap the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, simply because of the opposition of union leaders, would hurt employers, workers and that great body which suffers when either employers or unions have unwarranted powers—the public at large.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Roadley, I believe you testified that you are a native of Charlotte, N. C.

Mr. ROADLEY. No, sir, not a native. I believe I said I am from Charlotte, N. C.

Mr. BAILEY. I take it that you have knowledge of the fact that there has been rather an intensive drive on the part of the American Federation of Labor and the CIO to organize textile mills themselves.

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I have read in the newspapers that there has been for some 2 years a so-called Operation Dixie, which is intended to organize all industry in the South.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you as an individual or a member of your associations have anything to do with the distribution of rather inflammatory literature that might stir up ill feelings at the time strikes were on in any of those plants in the South?

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. Chairman, I can honestly say that I have no knowledge of what that printed matter is you are referring to. In my own mills, the mills that I deal with day in and day out, we do not permit that sort of thing, let alone subscribing to those things.

Mr. BAILEY. Have you ever heard of the Constitutional Educational League?

Mr. ROADLEY. No, sir; I do not believe I ever have.

Mr. BAILEY. That is the group that publishes the Communist Carpetbaggers in Operation Dixie. I believe a fellow by the name of Joseph P. Camp is the editor of it.

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not know the publication, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. What about the publication Militant Truth that is published by Sherman A. Patterson, Chattanooga, Tenn.

Mr. ROADLEY. I have heard of it, but I have never seen a copy of it.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think that it makes for good public relations and labor-management relations to stir up racial hatreds in these strikes?

Mr. ROADLEY. Certainly not, Mr. Chairman. I not only think it is bad, I do not subscribe to those tactics. I think that we have more effective ways of dealing with labor unions, and of dealing with employees, through this collective-bargaining process.

Mr. BAILEY. Do most of the members of your association have collective-bargaining agreements with their employees?

Mr. ROADLEY. No, sir, I do not think that. I think that most of the employees in the southern textile industry are not organized.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Perkins, do you have a question?

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Roadley, how long have you been located in Charlotte?

Mr. ROADLEY. Since April 1946, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. And what type of business were you engaged in prior to that date?

Mr. ROADLEY. For 31 months, I was a gunnery officer in the United States Navy.

Mr. PERKINS. Before that time?

Mr. ROADLEY. Before that, I was director of industrial relations for a steel fabricating company in Cleveland, Ohio.

Mr. PERKINS. You were in Cleveland?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Why do you say that the burden of proof is on the people who are seeking to repeal the Taft-Hartley law, in your statement?

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. Congressman, I think that on the basis of the evidence as I see it, the Taft-Hartley Act has very definitely accomplished its original intention in reestablishing harmonious labor relations. It has always been my reasoning that those who advocate something should put forth some reasons.

Mr. PERKINS. I take it from your testimony in regard to section 8 of the Taft-Hartley law that you are an experienced attorney.

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. You make the statement that section 8 (c), as you termed it, I believe, the free-speech clause, shows just how fair the Taft-Hartley law is. Am I correct in the substance of your statement?

Mr. ROADLEY. I think you are, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. You also read section 8 (c) here to the committee, did you not?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is right.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask you if section 8 (c) does not prohibit any expression made by an employer from being used against the employer in a court proceeding, just as long as he does not go to the extent of using coercion on his employees?

Mr. ROADLEY. I think it does not, sir. I think that the evidence which was referred to in that section means real, factual evidence of the employer's hostility by his acts, by his conduct, by his labor relations policy toward unions or to employees who attempt to join unions.

Mr. PERKINS. You know that it is a rule of evidence that any statement that a man makes may be used against him for contradictory purposes in our Federal courts and in our State courts. It that not a general rule of evidence?

Mr. ROADLEY. It is, sir, as long as it is part of the res gestae.

Mr. PERKINS. You said, contradictory purposes.

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, I think it would be admissible. But I think there must be definitely shown to be some relationship between the act and the statement made.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, any statement that a man may make in the ordinary course of events may be used against him as an admission at the time of the trial. That is a well-founded rule of evidence in our law, is it not?

Mr. ROADLEY. I have to go back again, sir, to my previous answer, so long as it is part of the res gestae.

Mr. PERKINS. I am not talking about the res gestae. I am just asking you if it is not a well-known and well-established rule of evidence that any statement that a party makes that operates against him at the time of the trial may be used against him?

Mr. ROADLEY. So long as it is relevant, I would say that it could be.

Mr. PERKINS. I notice you are very evasive in your answers.

Now, you also realize that section 8 (c) outlaws a well-established rule of evidence in our law and makes it lawful for an employer to use any statements that he cares to use just as long as he does not coerce his employees; am I correct in that statement?

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not believe so, sir. I do not think it has quite that broad interpretation, and I do not believe, personally, that that was the underlying reason for putting that section in those precise words into the Taft-Hartley Act. If I may, I think I could elaborate to give you a clearer answer. I think that perhaps that language was incorporated in the Taft-Hartley Act in those precise words to overcome some of the gross abuse of the administrators of the National Labor Relations Act, the Wagner Act, in applying the old Wagner clause, such as the example I used in my presentation, where the correlation of events was nothing, that as long as a man had ever declared himself or had ever made a statement contrary to the principles of the Wagner Act and some action later followed, whether it was relevant or not to be material, he was then subjecting himself to unfair labor charges, or charges of unfair labor practices, and things of that sort.

Mr. PERKINS. Why do you think it was necessary to legislate on an established rule of evidence?

Mr. ROADLEY. For the reason, sir, that I think that in the hearings prior to the time of the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, it became pretty evident that many of the abuses which had crept up through the Wagner Act in its many abuses had to be legislated to be corrected.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not think that section 8 (c) shows how oppressive and how unfair certain sections of the Taft-Hartley law are?

Mr. Roadley. Mr. Congressman, I sincerely do not, and I think that I can base that conclusion on some of my own experiences by indicating to you that many, many times in negotiating contracts, prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, I personally was faced with situations where I knew that the whole story of the negotiations was not getting back to employees. I personally know from my own experience of many situations where strike votes were taken on only part of the employers' last offer, so to speak, and I believe that under the provision that we are now discussing, which is in the Taft-Hartley Act, we had that right under the Wagner Act to go to our employees, not by mediums of hand-outs or by newspaper advertisements or by citizens' committees, but merely by the posting of a notice on the bulletin boards in our plants, telling our people what the status of negotiations was, I think that perhaps that specific clause would not have been necessary in the enactment of the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. Perkins. Do you not believe that it would have been much fairer if the law had provided that any statement that an employer may make in his negotiations could be used against him to show his motive and intent, as to whether or not he intended to be in good faith?

Mr. Roadley. Mr. Congressman, I think that those acts still can be used under the Taft-Hartley Act, and I am positive that those statements or acts of an employer which in themselves are unfair labor practices can be brought out under the Taft-Hartley Act and under this section.

Mr. Perkins. Does not section 8 (c) outlaw that very thing?

Mr. Roadley. In my opinion, it does not, sir.

Mr. Perkins. I want to say that if it does not, I certainly do not understand the English language.

That is all.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. Jacobs. Mr. Roadley, I think I am somewhat in agreement with you that there has been too much effort to condemn this act by the use of names and, we will say, catch-phrases. I also am of the opinion that there has been a little too much effort to sustain it upon the same basis. I believe you and I as lawyers can start off agreeing that the way to determine whether the provisions of this act are fair or unfair is by examining the provisions.

Mr. Roadley. I agree with that, and I said so.

Mr. Jacobs. I simply want to say this as to the last sentence in your statement, which says in effect, scrap the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, simply because of the opposition of union leaders. That, of course, is not very complimentary to the committee or to Congress.

Mr. Roadley. It was not intended as that, sir.

Mr. Jacobs. And I do not accept it as a compliment to myself as a member of the committee.

Now, let us go back to some of the catch-phrases that have been used in connection with the act. It has been called a slave-labor act. But on the other hand, it has been called a bill of rights for labor, has it not?

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not recall, sir, that I have ever heard it called a bill of rights for labor.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, I have. There are a lot of Congressmen out in my State that signed the manifesto stating that it had emancipated the workingman.

Mr. ROADLEY. The workingman, yes, sir, but not labor. I had never heard that expression used for labor.

Mr. JACOBS. You think it is an emancipation of the workingman?

Mr. ROADLEY. For the workingman; I will agree with that, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you aware of the fact that there is no provision requiring the election of union officers? You agree with me on that, do you not?

Mr. ROADLEY. No provision where, sir?

Mr. JACOBS. There is no provision in the Taft-Hartley Act requiring the election of union officers, is there?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe that is right.

Mr. JACOBS. That is right. Are you aware of the fact that this was proposed and rejected?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe that there was quite a considerable amount of discussion on that.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes. Nor is there any provision to afford a remedy to any man that is capriciously expelled from the union, is there?

Mr. ROADLEY. Not in those precise words, Mr. Congressman. I do not believe there is; no, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. In any words, is there a provision where a man can appeal to a governmental tribunal and cause himself to be reinstated in the union if he had been capriciously expelled? There is a provision, I think, where he can work without being a member of the union.

Mr. ROADLEY. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. But there is no provision where he can be reinstated, is there? Do you agree with me on that?

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not know, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You have examined the act. Do you remember any such provision?

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not remember any such provision.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, neither do I, and I have read it trying to find such a provision.

Now, let us go to the free speech. Take section 8 (c). Section 8 (c) provides that the expressing of views, et cetera, shall not constitute or be evidence of an unfair labor practice unless there is an express threat of coercion, and so forth, does it not?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. What do you think the four words "or the evidence of", mean?

Mr. ROADLEY. I think that the wording, sir, is pretty clear.

Mr. JACOBS. So do I.

Mr. ROADLEY. I think that indicates very definitely that the employer has a right to do these things.

Mr. JACOBS. To do what things?

Mr. ROADLEY. Present his views, express them, argue, state his opinions, and it also indicates the various forms that he can express those views and opinions in as long as there is no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit, and it is not evidence of an unfair labor practice.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think the expression that unions are bad for the workers should be excluded from the evidence in an unfair labor practice hearing?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe that I would say that I do.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think it should be?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Suppose I had expressed my dislike for you and you were found injured somewhere, and I was accused of being the man who had injured you. Let us say I threw a brick out of the window and hit you. Do you not think the fact that I had expressed a dislike for you might be some evidence that maybe I intended to hit you and that it was not an accident?

Mr. ROADLEY. When was the expression made and when was the brick thrown?

Mr. JACOBS. Let us just say any time you want to say it was made. Let us say the day before; the same morning; or an hour or two before; or 6 months before.

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. Congressman, to answer your question, I honestly believe that if a heated argument took place and you expressed that view and immediately followed through with that argument with the act of a brick falling on me, that evidence should be introduced. But on the other hand, if you and I had that argument on January 1, 1948, and on October 1, 1948, I was injured, I hardly think that the evidence of your statement would be permissible, or should be permitted to be introduced to establish the fact that you could have been the man that threw the brick.

Mr. JACOBS. You mean, 9 months later?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You mean because you think it could not be a part of the res gestae?

Mr. ROADLEY. I agree with you completely.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, let us examine that view that you have of the res gestae. You are a lawyer. Are you sure you know what a res gestae is?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe I do, sir, although I must admit that my practice has been confined to administrative law and not to trial work.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us go back to law school for a minute.

Mr. ROADLEY. All right.

Mr. JACOBS. It seems to me I remember my professor of evidence telling me that the matter of res gestae was something that was effected with a degree of spontaneity; that is, it had to happen under such circumstances where the facts were speaking through the man rather than the man narrating the facts. Is that not what you remember?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, and two more things, that it had to be part of the thing, and that it had to be material and revelant.

Mr. JACOBS. That is right. And is it not true that a man may offer his own words in evidence in defense of himself if it is a part of the res gestae?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe that is correct; yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Is there not quite a distinction between res gestae, which in English means a part of the thing——

Mr. ROADLEY. The thing; that is true.

Mr. JACOBS. Is there not quite a distinction between res gestae and the matter of offering the other fellow's words in evidence to characterize his motive in doing a thing? Is there not quite a distinction? Are you not confused about res gestae? Think about it a minute.

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not believe I am confused, Mr. Congressman. I think that what is confusing me is the conclusion that you were trying to arrive at through this hypothetical arrangement.

Mr. JACOBS. I will tell you how I avoid being confused on those things: By just trying to arrive at the correct conclusion. I do not worry very much about what I am thinking about at the moment. I just keep thinking about the correct principle.

Mr. ROADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And see what kind of conclusion I arrive at.

Mr. ROADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. That is the way I avoid confusion. Now, we all get confused, of course. But do you not recognize a distinction between your res gestae theory and the matter of offering declarations against interest?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, sir; there is a definite distinction.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Is it not true that on the rule of evidence regarding declarations against interest, you can offer only the other fellow's words in evidence against him, and he cannot offer his own words in evidence to support himself?

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not believe he can, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you agree with the statement I made there?

Mr. ROADLEY. Your last statement, sir?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, I will.

Mr. JACOBS. That is a correct statement of the law, is it not?

Mr. ROADLEY. To the best of my knowledge it is, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. When you speak of res gestae, you have already admitted that anyone can offer it in evidence. If I exclaim something at the instance that a thing occurs, or for example if I cry out and say, "Bill Jones hit me with a rock," as a man runs up to me as I lie on the sidewalk, that is a part of the res gestae, is it not?

Mr. ROADLEY. It may not be, unless there was some definite interest on the part of Bill Jones.

Mr. JACOBS. If the degree of spontaneity is there, where a man more or less exclaims a thing occurs, then it is a part of the res gestae?

Mr. ROADLEY. If it was relevant to the issue at trial, of course.

Mr. JACOBS. Then the res gestae is something that comes rather as an exclamation on the part of a person almost simultaneous with the occurrence of the events; is it not?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes; it is.

Mr. JACOBS. Now that we have that res gestae bug isolated, let us now go over to our self-serving declaration and examine it.

What a man says to serve his own point of view cannot be offered in evidence by him; can it?

Mr. ROADLEY. No; I do not believe it can.

Mr. JACOBS. That is the self-serving declaration, but when we go to the declaration against interest, the other fellow in the lawsuit can always put it in evidence against the other fellow who spoke?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. If it be a statement that casts light upon what the other fellow did, his motives, et cetera; is that not right?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe that is so.

Mr. JACOBS. Now we are down to where we can examine 8 (c). The section says that what the man says shall not constitute or be evidence; is that not right?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think that if an employer made a statement that he thought unions were bad for the community and bad for his employees tonight, if he made that statement in a speech, and the next day he went up to the office and fired all the union officers, do you not think what he said tonight might cast some light on his motives next morning?

Mr. ROADLEY. No: I do not, sir. I think, first of all, you have to establish what the man fired the union leaders for.

Mr. JACOBS. Wait a minute. We are having a trial, and you are the lawyer for one side, and I am the lawyer for the other side, and you are trying to prove——

Mr. ROADLEY. That there was a justifiable reason for discharge, which was not an unfair labor practice.

Mr. JACOBS. And I am trying to prove that there was no justifiable reason for discharge, and there we have the issue.

Mr. ROADLEY. That has been joined.

Mr. JACOBS. And closed, and we are on trial.

You come in and offer evidence that the employer found the man loitering on the job.

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And, therefore, he was fired. And I come in and I offer evidence that the man had been complimented by his foreman, we will say, and you come back and offer evidence that he had been reprimanded by his foreman, and we are trying to find out what your client had in mind when he fired the man; is that not right?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. JACOBS. And I come in and I say, "Look here, Judge: This man made a speech and said these union fellows were a menace to the community, and I want you to listen to the evidence. I do not offer it as proving absolutely that he fired the man because of union activities."

Mr. BAILEY. The gentleman has two minutes.

Mr. BURKE. I yield 5 minutes of my time.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you.

I offer it as proof tending to establish the fact—you know what I mean?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think it would tend to prove the motive?

Mr. ROADLEY. No; I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, you do not think the man making a speech the night before and saying the union is a menace to the community would tend to prove that, when he fired the union officer the next day—you do not think it would tend to prove it was because the union activities were as he said?

Mr. ROADLEY. No; I do not, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. I just wanted to get your viewpoint.

If you think that is not what it meant, and if you think it was not put in there to create a fair rule of evidence, or if you think it was not to create that rule of evidence, will you explain to me why, in section 9 (b), the last words in section 9 (b)—if you will examine your act, the very last sentence.

Mr. ROADLEY. Of the Taft-Hartley?

Mr. JACOBS. Of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. ROADLEY. Is that the beginning of subparagraph 3?

Mr. JACOBS. No; it is section 9 (b).

Mr. ROADLEY. (b) for boy?

Mr. JACOBS. B for boy or boycott, either.

Do you have this print?

Mr. ROADLEY. I have it here, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Did I say 9 (b)?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. It is 10 (b). I am sorry.

It is the first paragraph on page 13.

Mr. ROADLEY. Section 10 (b)?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes. The words "Any such proceedings—" that is, referring to the proceedings before the Labor Relations Board—— shall, so far as practicable, be conducted in accordance with the rules of evidence applicable in the District Courts of the United States under the Rules of Civil Procedure for the District Courts of the United States adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States pursuant to the Act of June 19, 1934, (U. S. C., Title 28, secs. 723–B, 723–C).

Would not that seem to establish a pretty fair set of rules of evidence for the governing of the Labor Board?

What do you say?

Mr. ROADLEY. That these rules of practice that were adopted by the United States Supreme Court are fair rules?

Mr. JACOBS. Would you not think so?

Mr. ROADLEY. I would think so.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you not think that would be sufficient without inserting the four words in 8 (c), that what the man said should not be evidence, which means to me it shall not be received to tend to prove that his motive in firing the man was because he was——

Mr. ROADLEY. No; I do not think this last sentence of section 10 (b) should stand alone. I think there must be the parallel language in section 8 (c).

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, the rules of evidence of common law, as adopted by the Supreme Court of the United States, are not enough; you want an additional rule to apply in unfair labor-practice cases, as laid down in 8 (c)?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, I do; and I am suggesting that perhaps when there has been a sufficient build-up of cases under the interpretation of that section it will be shown that there are more than one definition to the word "evidence," as you and I have been discussing them here this afternoon.

Mr. JACOBS. You mean more than one——

Mr. ROADLEY. Definition of evidence. If I understood you correctly, I think you said those words meant to you the receiving into—or the receiving of evidence?

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, what is received as evidence is not conclusive evidence; is that what you are trying to say?

Mr. ROADLEY. It could be.

Mr. JACOBS. It does not have to be?

Mr. ROADLEY. Not necessarily.

Mr. JACOBS. One item of evidence sometimes will prove a case, but not often?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you agree with me now that your doctrine of res gestae is not very applicable to what we are talking about?

Mr. ROADLEY. No; I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. Have you seen the General Electric questionnaire?

Mr. ROADLEY. I saw a copy of it unanswered. I skimmed through it, but I have not studied it.

Mr. JACOBS. I presume you would agree with this, would you not, that it is pretty difficult to answer some of the questions "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. ROADLEY. You bet it is!

Mr. JACOBS. You have not answered any of them "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. ROADLEY. I have not evaded answering "Yes" or "No," but I tried to answer the best I could.

Mr. JACOBS. In fact, you could not do that?

Mr. ROADLEY. I agree with you.

Mr. JACOBS. And I have not tried to get you to answer them "Yes" or "No"?

Mr. ROADLEY. No; you have been very fair.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think it is fair to ask the general public to answer "Yes" or "No" to the 18 questions?

Mr. ROADLEY. I think those are the ones I saw, that attracted my eye, and could be given "Yes" or "No" answer; but, of course, in any of those opinion polls it would seem to me that someone was trying to conscientiously answer the questions, and felt he could not answer "Yes" or "No" he would amplify his answer on the reverse side.

Mr. JACOBS. If I told you one of the questions involved 13 separate provisions in the law, you would not think it was a very fair question to a layman: would you?

Mr. ROADLEY. I certainly would not.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke, you have 5 minutes of your time remaining.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Roadley, I do not want to delve into your background, or anything like that, but have you ever been employed by a labor union?

Mr. ROADLEY. I am sorry, sir, but I did not hear you.

Mr. BURKE. Have you ever been employed by a labor union?

Mr. ROADLEY. No; I have not.

Mr. BURKE. And, according to your statement, you spent 3 years as Commissioner of Conciliation with the United States Department of Labor?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. BURKE. During that time did you feel that you were constricted or restrained to act as a Commissioner of Conciliation in favor of the labor side of the table?

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. Congressman, when I was a Conciliator for the United States Conciliation Service, I believe there were 54 men covering the entire United States. I was one of the first tribunals, so to speak, as a young man without previous labor affiliation. When I was put out into the field by Hugh Kirwin, and later by John R. Steelman,

I had been told the biggest job I had to accomplish was to sell my personal abilities to employers and to unions, and I found it most difficult in some instances to be able to convince unions or employers that I was impartial, and that I was unbiased, and that I was not there as the agent of one or the other.

Mr. BURKE. But, in your service as a commissioner of conciliation, did you not find that the other commissioners came pretty much from all walks of life?

Mr. ROADLEY. No; I did not. I think most of the men came from the ranks of labor and, as I indicated a moment ago in answering your other question, one other chap and myself were the first two that had ever been appointed as commissioners of conciliation without some previous experience and without some prior background in the labor movement. That would be a subject for verification, but that is my impression at this late date.

Mr. BURKE. The personnel of the Conciliation Service, largely under the Department of Labor, was carried over under the National Labor Relations Board when it was transferred under the terms of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe it was, sir; yes.

Mr. BURKE. And then, can you see any reason why, especially in the light of recommendations of combining departments for the purposes of economy and better efficiency, that we should not send the Department of Conciliation back to the Department of Labor?

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. Burke, my own personal opinion is that the conciliator can, and has been able to, do a better job as a mediator away from the influence of the Department of Labor; particularly since his own function in labor disputes, strikes, threatened strikes, is one of an intermediary. I think that when the conciliator begins to carry the burden of a conference or begins to carry the messages of one side, that certainly destroys his confidence and his efficiency and, I think, as an independent agency, he has about 50 percent of that burden taken away from him, than he would under the Department of Labor.

Mr. BURKE. As a matter of practical working, have not the members of the Department of Conciliation, or the Conciliation Service, operated actually as conciliators and mediators, regardless of what department of the Government they were employed by?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is true. They have acted as conciliators, Mr. Burke, but I do understand from my own knowledge as a conciliator that there were many men who could not get into certain situations because they were definitely earmarked as being for one side or the other, and they could not demand the respect of both parties.

Mr. BURKE. That is pretty much inevitable, no matter what department or what branch of the Government this individual might be working under; there might be prejudices against that individual on one side or the other, and there has always been plenty of men available to come in where that situation existed; is that not true?

Mr. ROADLEY. I think it probably could be, Mr. Burke; but, on the other hand, again getting back to my personal exeperience when I was a conciliator, we only had the authority which was provided for in the act under the Department of Labor. Under the Taft-Hartley Act there are definite duties and obligations imposed on the Director of Conciliation, and he, in turn, through his conciliators and mediators. It is my opinion if the the Federal Conciliation Service was placed back in the Department of Labor there would be a much greater chance, and a much greater risk, if I may use that word, of the principles and philosophies of the Department of Labor trickling down through the Conciliation Service, and ultimately to the men in the field, to the extent at least, in my opinion, it would then be more difficult for a conciliator to do the effective job as an impartial, neutral and unbiased man that he should be.

Mr. BURKE. It has been my experience that the commissioners of conciliation have been pretty well thought of.

Mr. ROADLEY. I think that is correct.

Mr. BURKE. They have had a pretty good reputation all the way through.

Mr. ROADLEY. I think that is correct.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. Mr. Roadley, what provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act would you change?

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. McConnell, we have given some very serious thought to that. In the southern textile industry—and I want to say this very honestly and frankly—we have had very little experience under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act. In my own home State of North Carolina where our offices are, we have a State law governing the right to work and governing check-off. In South Carolina we have no such law.

On the other hand, I have personal knowledge of one decertification proceeding in North Carolina which was not successful, but taking all of those things into consideration, and giving them the weight which they are due, I cannot for the life of me see what good it is to maintain the imbalance of this communistic oath. Personally, I have taken it about three times, and I cannot see where any employer would have any hesitance—as the witness who preceded me said—as Justices of the Supreme Court, and on down, are required to take it. I think any of the "isms" are diametrically opposite to our way of life, and I cannot see that this election which has to do with the determination of whether or not a majority of the employees desire union-shop conditions is too material. I believe those are the two provisions that I care to express an opinion on, sir, to answer your question.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Is there any part of the national emergency strike section that you would change?

Mr. ROADLEY. Mr. McConnell, I do not feel that I am qualified or competent to testify on that part of the act. In our industry I doubt that we would ever be considered qualified under those provisions, and I honestly have not studied that to an extent that I would care to make a recommendation on it.

Mr. MCCONNELL. What changes would you make in the union shop provision, if any?

Mr. ROADLEY. The one I mentioned, sir. I think it would not be necessary to have this so-called prenegotiation election to determine whether the majority of the employees wanted it, or not. I think that that particular phrase of working conditions, probably, should not be more singled out for a vote than anything else.

Mr. McConnell. Do you think there should be any alteration in the closed-shop ban?

Mr. Roadley. No, sir, I think the closed-shop ban as contained in the Taft-Hartley Act is adequate. I think it is justifiable, and I think it should have been in the original Wagner Act.

Mr. McConnell. A certain very prominent labor lawyer made the statement to me just about 2 weeks ago when I asked "Just what is wrong with the Taft-Hartley law? I would like to know what your view is, as you have dealt with labor exclusively?" I said, "I just want to know for my own information."

He said, "Congressman, speaking to you frankly, I say this: There are parts of the Taft-Hartley law that are superb, in my judgment, and other parts I think are really bad," but he said, "The one objection I have is the way it was all put on top of labor at one time. If it had allowed them a little opportunity to become adjusted to it, you would not have had the trouble."

Would you subscribe to that?

Mr. Roadley. I certainly would. I think the gentleman was absolutely right. When we take a look at the ramifications of the Taft-Hartley law, and the scope of the things it covers, it is a wonder that it is in inself a workable instrument. I think, as you have explained to me, if this law had been brought amendment by amendment over a period of several sessions, and as the needs came about for them, I think they would not be experiencing the complete resistance by labor to the changes.

Mr. McConnell. The law is not completely bad, is the idea I am getting to. I have checked in many different places. That being so, I have never quite understood the reason for the complete repeal. No perfect law exists; I realize that. I think we would be incorrect to say that our work was just right, and should remain so, as the Wagner Act did for 14 years without any amendment. That was an unusual procedure.

Mr. Roadley. I agree.

Mr. McConnell. Certain groups were working on the assumption it was just right the way it was. I can recall a witness sitting just where you are, and making the statement, "Make no changes; leave the law just as it is." Yet, it was admitted there was considerable strife throughout the labor-management field. I get the feeling from the labor end there is more of a desire to compromise on some changes in the Wagner Act. I hope so, because only with that attitude can you accomplish anything.

Mr. Roadley. I agree.

Mr. McConnell. The world is so affected by our fundamental natures that an injustice does rebound and we get trouble from it.

Mr. Roadley. Absolutely.

Mr. McConnell. I have nothing further.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Smith?

Mr. Smith. I appreciate your questions and your answers. I have no further questions. I will give the balance of my time to Mr. Nixon.

Mr. Nixon. Speaking of the Conciliation Service, you indicated you felt it had done a good job under the present set-up as an independent service?

Mr. Roadley. Yes, sir.

Mr. NIXON. Do you think anything could be gained from the standpoint of conciliating labor disputes by transferring it to the status we had before in the Department of Labor?

Mr. ROADLEY. No, I do not, Congressman Nixon. As I expressed an opinion in my statement about the entire Taft-Hartley Act, I honestly believe there has not been enough experience, enough water gone under this dam, so to speak, to find out what all the rights and wrongs and bad things are. I think the Conciliation Service, during the time it has been an independent agency, has done a good job on reestablishing itself. I think that is demonstrated very clearly through its regional set-up, and I think it has been demonstrated it is a capable organization, and I think that so long as that record stands, it should be given that chance to continue.

Mr. NIXON. As far as you are concerned, you would oppose just as much the transferring of the Conciliation Service to the Department of Commerce, as you would to the Department of Labor?

Mr. ROADLEY. I certainly would.

Mr. NIXON. You believe in the Department of Commerce there might be a tendency to favor management?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. And labor would be very suspicious of the conciliators appointed by the Department of Commerce?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe they would.

Mr. NIXON. If they transferred it to the Department of Labor the conciliators appointed by the Department of Labor would not have the same degree of acceptance by management as independent conciliators would have?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is exactly right.

Mr. NIXON. So for that reason you feel it should be an independent service?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is far more preferable.

Mr. NIXON. Incidentally, have you read the Lesinski or the Thomas bill?

Mr. ROADLEY. I have read both bills.

Mr. NIXON. Did you see any provisions in there guaranteeing union members the right to democratically elect officers and the right not to be expelled from the union without cause?

Mr. ROADLEY. I did not.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, the matters which Mr. Jacobs raised as weaknesses are not covered by the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not believe they are.

Mr. NIXON. And if he wishes to cover those, he is going to have to amend it?

Mr. ROADLEY. I believe so.

Mr. NIXON. You may recall the original Hartley bill as passed by the House did not have all the provisions Mr. Jacobs mentioned, but it did have some of those.

Mr. ROADLEY. Some of them, yes.

Mr. NIXON. And in conference those provisions were stricken out due to the fact union leaders opposed them because they did not want to have what they called government interference in their own business?

Mr. ROADLEY. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. Is it your opinion that if this committee were to attempt to write in provisions laying down the rules by which union elections were to be held, rules governing union officials, their conduct of the internal affairs of the union, do you think the union officials would support that act any more than they are supporting the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. ROADLEY. I do not think so. As a matter of fact speaking for our association, I do not think it is any concern of ours what the union does, so far as the internal affairs are concerned.

Mr. NIXON. At that point, I want to say I share Mr. Jacobs' concern over some of the practices he has mentioned. Through this line of questioning I only want to establish that we are faced here with a problem which is extremely difficult, and a problem which, if it is a weakness in the Taft-Hartley Act, is also to even a greater extent a weakness in the new bill.

Mr. ROADLEY. I agree with you.

Mr. NIXON. And speaking on that point, Mr. Jacobs asked you whether or not there was any provision of the bill which denied to a union a right arbitrarily to expel a member, and your answer was there was no such provision?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is right.

Mr. NIXON. As a matter of fact, from a practical standpoint, where a union has a union-shop agreement, is it not true the effect of the Taft-Hartley Act is to deny the union that right?

Mr. ROADLEY. It is.

Mr. NIXON. Because under the union-shop agreement an employer cannot discriminate against an employee by reason of his nonmembership in a union?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is exactly right.

Mr. NIXON. If the employee has been expelled from the union it can be only for nonpayment of dues?

Mr. ROADLEY. That is correct.

Mr. NIXON. The unions apparently have assumed that is a restriction upon their right to expel members, because that is one of the points which has been brought out in statements of union leaders, one of the points which they think in the Taft-Hartley Act should be changed, because they say the present act, in effect, denies them the right even to expel the Communists from their membership?

Mr. ROADLEY. I agree with you.

Mr. NIXON. In other words, theoretically, we will agree with Mr. Jacobs as to the act because if the union was under a union-shop agreement and expelled a man, the employer could keep that man on the pay roll?

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield?

Mr. NIXON. Yes; if I have the time.

Mr. JACOBS. There is also this particular application of that rule, that in the case of intermittent work, like in the construction industry where a man does not work steadily on the same pay roll all the time, that his lack of membership does not protect him on a job which does not last. You know on that?

Mr. NIXON. Yes; and I do not question the gentleman's statement. My point is, as a practical matter, unions now and union officials, particularly, are objecting to the Taft-Hartley Act because they say the act, in effect, denies the right to expel members other than for the non-payment of dues.

Mr. JACOBS. That goes back to the last sentence in the gentleman's prepared statement, which I wish to say does not apply to my position in regard to this matter.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe that is all, Mr. Roadley. We appreciate the time you have given us.

Mr. ROADLEY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman, for the privilege of being here.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee at this time will hear Joseph R. Barnes, of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH R. BARNES, DIRECTOR, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, ILLINOIS MANUFACTURERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. BARNES. I am director of industrial relations for the Illinois Manufacturers' Association, and I appear here today to speak for that association.

The Illinois Manufacturers' Association has in its membership over 4,000 manufacturing concerns of all sizes, engaged in almost every type of industrial production.

The views of the Illinois Manufacturers' Association regarding H. R. 2032, now under consideration before this committee, are these: This bill would return both employers and employees to the jeopardy of unrestrained and unregulated labor union monopolies that were chartered and protected by the Wagner Act, and that operated so arrogantly under it.

The enactment of this bill will result in greatly increased costs to the public.

Because ultimately the public will pay the cost resulting from the type of demands and activities that unrestrained labor union monopolists make and enforce against employers and employees, this bill, for all practical purposes, will take us back to the situation that Congress recognized was intolerable 2 years ago, and which it undertook to correct with the Taft-Hartley Act.

The amendments which this bill makes in the old Wagner Act are of little value in correcting the conditions that existed under that act. We feel that the adoption of this bill would be equivalent to the issuance of a license by Congress to labor union leaders and to the National Labor Relations Board to resume their joint program to make all industry and all employees subject to the control of labor union monopolists, without regard for the best interests of either, and without regard for the public interest.

We believe this bill should be defeated.

We believe that if this bill is not to be defeated, it should, at the minimum, be amended to provide the following:

First, the so-called closed-shop proviso, which gives employers and labor unions authorization to combine to force unwilling workers to become members of the union and to submit to the labor union monopoly, should be eliminated.

This closed-shop proviso, very simply stated, makes it possible for employers and labor unions to agree to force unwilling employees to become members of the union, or lose their jobs. It is a strange and abnormal provision in a law which pretends to guarantee freedom.

The only justification for the closed-shop proviso is that the Government approves of the coercion of individual employees if that coercion will further labor union monopoly.

Second, the majority rule provision, which compels unwilling employees to handle all of their affairs with their employers through labor unions, should be changed to allow the individual employee to handle his own affairs with his employer if he chooses to do so.

This bill would prohibit the individual employee from dealing directly with his employer in any plant where the union had a majority.

And the union has a majority in a great many plants today.

This bill gives any union which has secured majority status in a plant the exclusive right to sell the personal services of all of the employees in that plant.

Is it freedom if a man cannot bargain for and sell his own labor, and cannot deal with his own employer regarding his own personal affairs? We submit that a proposal to grant such power to the President of the United States, that is, the exclusive right to bargain for and to sell the services of all of the people of this country, would be universally denounced and opposed. Yet this bill gives to labor union leaders power and authority over individual American citizens which few would think of giving to the President of the United States.

Third, the freedom of speech of both employer and employee should be protected from abuse by the National Labor Relations Board. This bill does not protect that freedom.

Employers should be free to say or write what they think about a labor union, or its acts, or its leaders, or its philosophies.

Experience makes it seem probable that the National Labor Relations Board would be tempted to again use its powers to coerce employers into silence, and to effectively bar any real freedom of speech on the part of employers.

And this would be especially true, since the Board, under this bill, is not bound by the rules of evidence which prevail in our courts, and can make decisions on the facts which are practically beyond review, even by the Supreme Court.

Fourth, foremen and supervisors should be made free from the requirements of this bill. They are the arms and the fingers of management; they constitute the means by which management functions in the plant, and they cannot function effectively if they are to be dominated by labor unions, which in turn are controlled by the very men whose direction and regulation is the responsibility of those foremen and supervisors.

Fifth, a statute of limitations which would provide protection against the misuse of stale evidence by the National Labor Relations Board should be provided. A charge may be filed against an employer in January of this year, and then bits and pieces of evidence purporting to support that charge may be picked from the employer's actions for years back.

The Board should be limited as to the time during which it may examine the past actions and conduct of the employer.

Just suppose that we were to throw out all of the rules of evidence in the courts, make the court prosecutor, judge, and jury, cut off the right of appeal where a decision on facts is supported by any evidence, even though contrary evidence might be preponderant, and then provide that court with a great many biased assistant prosecutors? If we did that, could the other side ever win a case?

Yet, that is what this bill will do to the other side, to industry.

Sixth, the bill should be specific in that the requirement "to bargain collectively in good faith" shall not include the making of agreements or proposals which the parties to the negotiations do not wish to make. Government agencies have shown a strong disposition to force labor unions and employers into agreement.

It should be made clear in the law that both labor unions and employers are free to agree or not to agree to what the other demands, and free to make or not to make counterproposals or concessions.

One of the foundation stones in the institution of private ownership of property is the freedom to refuse to give away what another demands of you, and that right should be protected.

Seventh, the bill should allow the courts to set aside any findings of the Board which is contrary to the greater weight of the evidence.

Under this bill, the National Labor Relations Board has the power to base its findings of fact upon evidence which may be clearly outweighed by contrary testimony.

And no matter how much evidence there was to the contrary, the courts could not disturb a finding of fact by the Board if there is any evidence to support the findings of the Board.

This bill makes the National Labor Relations Board an institution above and outside the ideas of justice that we have evolved over the centuries—an institution, in fact, which bars even the Supreme Court of the United States from seeing that justice is done by the Board, if there is any evidence to support the findings of the Board.

Eighth, all jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts should be outlawed. Certainly, it is against public interest for employers not involved in a dispute—innocent bystanders, as it were—to be the victims of a dispute.

Ninth, labor unions should be liable, as everyone else is, to suits for damages for breach of contract.

Is there any inducement for anyone to enter into a contract if he knows that he cannot legally enforce that contract against the other party? This bill would require employers to enter into binding written contracts covering any agreement reached with the union. But that same employer, having entered into such an agreement, would be entirely unable to legally enforce the contract against the union.

Is it fair to require employers to be bound by a contract, and yet allow labor unions to break that same contract without liability?

Tenth, the bill should require all labor union leaders to file anti-Communist affidavits, and if they do not so do, to deprive their unions of the benefits of the bill. Shall we allow Communists to use labor unions as tools in their efforts to destroy the United States?

We submit that the unions employing the machinery of an agency of the Government—the National Labor Relations Board—should give some assurance that they are not using the mechanism of that agency to destroy that same Government.

Perhaps this suggested proviso should even be extended to deny the facilities of the Board to any union that has committeemen or other officials whose affiliations show them to favor destruction of our Government, regardless of statements and affidavits by the union's officers; and Eleventh, the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service should not be returned to the United States Department of Labor. It should remain an independent agency.

If Conciliation Service is to be of value, it must be entirely free of bias. And the Department of Labor is regarded by those in labor relations work as purely and simply prolabor union.

In conclusion, we do not ask that labor unions be shackled or injured in any way. We do ask that if we are to have a law favoring labor unions, let it be a law that is sufficiently reasonable so that employers can live under it and with it, and not the kind of a law that will throw employers and labor unions into an extremely costly cold war.

The present bill, we believe, would do just that.

Thank you.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs, have you any questions?

I want to yield my time, or whatever part of it Mr. Wier might need, and I will call on you, Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. I have one or two questions, Mr. Barnes.

From your statement, on page 5, I gather you are under the impression that the right to sue a union was nonexistent until the Taft-Hartley law was enacted?

Mr. BARNES. I am not a lawyer, Mr. Jacobs, and I cannot argue points of law with you, but I believe there were some States where it was possible to sue a union.

Mr. JACOBS. What State are you from, Illinois?

Mr. BARNES. Illinois, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you aware of whether or not you could under the laws of Illinois?

Mr. BARNES. Unless I am very much mistaken, the laws of Illinois do not permit that. It has never been done there with any degree of success.

Mr. JACOBS. What business are you in? Are you a manufacturer?

Mr. BARNES. I work for the Illinois Manufacturers' Association.

Mr. JACOBS. You have the lawyer for that association write a letter, and I will tell him how he can sue the union without the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law, and always could, and I think that I will say the same as to the other 48 States in the Union. I think I will be able to tell any lawyer in any State how he can bring a suit against any union without the Taft-Hartley law, and always could.

I yield the rest of my time to Mr. Wier.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier.

Mr. WIER. In your closing statement you say:

> The present bill, we believe, would do just that.

That is, give considerable advantage to the unions? What do you mean by that? Have you read the new bill?

Mr. BARNES. Yes.

Mr. WIER. What is in the new law that you feel is unjustified?

Mr. BARNES. You mean in H. R. 2032?

Mr. WIER. That is right, the bill that is under consideration by this committee.

Mr. BARNES. We feel the reenactment of the Wagner Act would be a license to unions to go ahead on their organizational activity, and the forcing of agreements upon employers, and costly strikes.

Mr. WIER. What do you mean by "forcing agreements" on employers?

Mr. BARNES. Mr. Wier, the union has a lot of economic power in that they can force employers by threatening them with strikes, to agree to a lot of things.

Mr. WIER. You do not mean to infer that the employers do not have any force of action?

Mr. BARNES. No; certainly not.

Mr. WIER. As a matter of fact, historically, and fundamentally, and socially, the advantage of the employer controlling the job, and making the job possible, and helping the conditions of employment, do you not think that is quite an advantage to the employer?

Mr. BARNES. Certainly.

Mr. WIER. Sure; it is.

Mr. BARNES. However, he must have labor to run his plant.

Mr. WIER. That is right.

Mr. BARNES. And to produce his product.

Mr. WIER. That is right.

Mr. BARNES. Without that he has nothing.

Mr. WIER. Do you feel that the workers in any of these plants feel that they, on their own, can control the management of that plant and dictate, or do dictate?

Mr. BARNES. In what respect, Mr. Congressman?

Mr. WIER. In the operation of the plant and the maintenance of the job that every worker has to have.

Mr. BARNES. I think industry has made great strides in that direction. During the war we had the labor-management committee established in many plants where management and labor sat down to work out certain new procedures of production, and you have widespread suggestion systems where workers have really had a hand in developing new products and short-cuts in production.

Mr. WIER. Let me ask you this: You criticized some of the sections of this proposed bill here, as against the Taft-Hartley Act. You come from Illinois?

Mr. BARNES. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Then you should be familiar with that 18- or 20-month old strike that has taken place there in the newspaper business.

What caused that strike?

Mr. BARNES. The newspapers are not, a strictly speaking sense, manufacturers, and we are not too close to them, nor do we know their policies. All I know is what I read in the newspapers about the strike.

Mr. WIER. You represent the Manufacturers' Association, and I assume it represents generally the policies of the employer in the State. They may not be dues-paying members.

Mr. BARNES. No; I would say, strictly, we represent industry, manufacturers, producers.

Mr. WIER. Do you know anything about the typographical strike in Chicago, and what led up to it, and what has caused it to continue, and what created the strike?

Mr. BARNES. Not too much.

Mr. WIER. Are you familiar with the fact it was not a question of wages or any attempt on the part of the union to take over management; it was the result of the Taft-Hartley Act proposing a situation that had been in force for years and years in this country, the abolition of management and labor to enter into a closed-shop agreement, and that was nothing new; is that correct?

Mr. BARNES. The signboards, the sandwich-board signs on the pickets in front of the Herald-American office, in front of which I walk twice a day, have among other things—and I am quoting from memory, now—"Hearst has raised wages in 16 cities. Why does he not do it in Chicago?"

Mr. WIER. Why does he not do what?

Mr. BARNES. He has raised wages in 16 cities. Why does he not do it in Chicago? Those are the signs on the pickets. So, evidently, they believe that wages are a consideration in the dispute.

Mr. WIER. The strike is over the closed shop; is that not correct?

Mr. BARNES. I am not familiar enough with the issues involved to answer that.

Mr. WIER. You represent a State that is highly organized, the State of Illinois, and on the basis of the industries that are in the State of Illinois, a substantial part of them have been under closed-shop conditions in union contracts over a long period of time, have they not?

Mr. BARNES. What do you mean exactly by "closed shop"? Do you mean the closed shop in which an employee must belong to a union before he goes to work?

Mr. WIER. I mean the closed shop they attempted to take out of the Taft-Hartley Act and did put in the Wagner Act. If you are representing employers, you should know what a closed shop is.

Mr. BARNES. There are relatively few manufacturers who have what is known technically as the closed shop. A great many of them have union contracts which provide the employee shall become and remain a member of the union 30 days from the date of hire.

Mr. WIER. In the State of Illinois, enumerating a few industries, your building and construction industry is almost completely a closed shop, is it not?

Mr. BARNES. That is not a manufacturing industry. We are not speaking for them.

Mr. WIER. Then, let us go to the mining field.

Mr. BARNES. All right.

Mr. WIER. They have been operating for a long period of time under the closed shop?

Mr. BARNES. Right.

Mr. WIER. Your trucking industry in the State of Illinois generally operates under a closed shop, and the teamsters' international?

Mr. BARNES. Truckers again are not manufacturers, and we do not purport to speak for them. I think when you say "industry" and "manufacturers" you have to differentiate.

Mr. WIER. Then I will ask you this: Where management and labor organizations have over a period of time demonstrated the feasibility and the advisability and good relationships under closed-shop conditions, do you feel that it would be justified to remove that?

Mr. BARNES. I do not feel there is too much fundamental difference between a closed shop, which is imposed at the moment of hire, and one which is imposed 30 days later. You may, under the Taft-Hartley Act, have a closed shop, except that its execution in the case of a new employee is postponed for 30 days, and that type of an agreement is perfectly legal.

Mr. WIER. Is that your impression of a closed shop?

Mr. BARNES. It is a closed shop 30 days later.

Mr. WIER. Speaking of the union shop under the Taft-Hartley Act, you made some reference here in your statement to the workers having freedom of action, and I think most of Congress has agreed sometime in the past that they made a mistake in injecting that compulsory 50 percent of election for a collective-bargaining agreement, and to carry on a union shop; is that correct?

Mr. BARNES. We are not recommending that provision. If you will look you will find it is not in there.

Mr. WIER. Do you not think on the basis of the results of the short time in which that has been operating, that the workers of the United States have demonstrated beyond a question of a doubt their desire by democratic elections for the unions' protection the jurisdiction of the union to cover hours and working conditions, and so on?

Mr. BARNES. We are not recommending that the union-election provision be retained in the act.

Mr. WIER. I see you lay quite a bit of stress here on the Communist situation that developed under the Taft-Hartley Act. Is it not presumptuous to assume that under the Taft-Hartley Act they attempted to legislate the union out of existence, or an officer of the union, provided he did not sign the Communist affidavit?

Mr. BARNES. He could still remain an officer of the union. It merely denied the union the right of machinery of the National Labor Relations Board.

Mr. WIER. I said to qualify under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. BARNES. Right.

Mr. WIER. Then, why did they turn around and protect the shop by denying the right of the dismissal of that Communist?

Mr. BARNES. I do not believe the Board has ever held or any court would hold that an employer could not discharge a man simply and solely because he was a Communist.

Mr. WIER. The law states specifically if, in our candy factory, the union makes a charge that one of the persons has caused a lot of difficulty by stirring up prejudice against union officers, the union, even upon finding him guilty, cannot insist on or demand his dismissal.

Mr. BARNES. I venture to say, Mr. Congressman, that the employer would be very anxious and willing and ready to cooperate with the union in discharging that man. I do not believe the unions have experienced any difficulty in getting employers to do that.

Mr. WIER. Some statement has been made here about the freedom of speech that was returned to management under the Taft-Hartley Act. I have had some experience with that. The typographical unions have had some experience with it, and other unions have had some experience with it—freedom of speech. I do not think anybody is going to deny that, but the act was put on the statute books and accepted by the National Labor Relations Board and brought about a situation where that is quite broad, not only the freedom of speech, but the freedom of action.

I tried to present some unfair labor practices in our region before our regional board against an employer—not because of free speech, but an employer who had penalized his employees because he discovered they were organizing. He was working overtime—this was in a dental laboratory and, I think, they were working overtime. He called his workers in and and used his right of free speech and talked to them, but he still failed to stop the organization, and so then he began using the second step, and that was those workers who were actively participating in the organization of the group lost their overtime privileges in spite of the fact that he needed them for overtime work. He gave the more loyal employees the added overtime. Eventually, his actions in that avenue of freedom of speech brought him a strike which lasted 9 weeks, and we preferred charges in 12 cases, and the Labor Board said we did not have justifiable evidence of a violation, and we were discouraged from filing or carrying through the unfair labor practice charges. That, to me, is a clear-cut violation, and way beyond the scope of freedom of speech. That is one of the things people say when you ask them if they object to the Taft-Hartley Act. They say, "Do you think we have a right to object to that qualification of freedom of speech?"

Mr. BARNES. It would seem to me that if there had been discrimination on the part of the employer in awarding overtime to certain employees, and discriminating against others, that the Board might well have found so without the question of freedom of speech coming into it.

Mr. WIER. That is what we had hoped for.

There are a number of outstanding examples of that I could call to your attention, but I will not go any further.

I think that is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

Mr. MCCONNELL. When a person is out on a strike which lasts for quite some time, for how long a period should he be considered an employee?

Mr. BARNES. I would hate very much to generalize on that one. I said that the manufacturers must have labor to run their plants. No manufacturer can shut his plant down and pay rent and take depreciation on it and obsolescence on his machinery forever, without going broke. In some plants the process would be faster than in others. I would not attempt to answer that question. You will find in union contracts the seniority rights which an employee has, and which he retains even, though he may be laid off, varies all the way from 3 weeks to 2 years, so I think you have to figure that one on the basis of the individual situation involved.

Mr. MCCONNELL. I have no other questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Nixon?

Mr. NIXON. I do not have any questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Barnes, for appearing before the committee.

The next witness will be J. W. Keener, vice president of the B. F. Goodrich Co.

The witness will please proceed.

TESTIMONY OF J. W. KEENER, VICE PRESIDENT, THE B. F. GOODRICH CO., AKRON, OHIO

Mr. KEENER. I am Ward Keener, vice president of the B. F. Goodrich Co., Akron, Ohio. The B. F. Goodrich Co. has manufacturing operations in 12 States and sales operations and employees in every State.

We employ approximately 40,000 people in the United States. About 90 percent of our production and maintenance employees are represented by unions. Eighty-one separate bargaining units are dealt with in manufacturing and sales locations. The majority of union-represented employees deal through the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum, and Plastic Workers of America, CIO, which holds bargaining rights in seven of the company's rubber-products plants.

My purpose today is to present some experiences from our company's relationships with unions that will cast light on the legislation now before your committee. These experiences, though not dramatic, are typical of union-management relationships in much of American industry.

Employee representation: Opponents of the Taft-Hartley law have made many broad charges against the law as it affects employee representation. They have said that efforts to organize the unorganized would be crippled; that the free-speech provisions would unjustifiably interfere with organizational activities; that the unfair labor practice sections would be used by employers to harass, delay, and otherwise interfere with the organization of employees; that the anti-Communist affidavit requirement to qualify for the services of the Board gave unequal treatment; that the law would develop an anti-union attitude on the part of the Board's agents; and that the Board would be flooded with decertification petitions.

Unionization has increased under the act. To promote free expression of employee choice, and to avoid jurisdictional problems, it has been the B. F. Goodrich policy, under both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley law, to bargain with unions only after Board certification. Since the Taft-Hartley law became effective 10 representation elections have been held in our operations, resulting in 7 new certified bargaining units, and 3 "no union" choices.

Free speech has aided free employee choice. Both the unions concerned and the company have freely presented their views on the elections to employees, and we are confident that election results accurately reflected employee opinion. The organizational drives have been vigorous, but we have never filed an unfair labor practice charge against a union and have had no charges by the Board against us.

The attitude of the Board's agents has been more impartial. In handling election and other problems, the attitude of the Board's agents has been more nearly impartial than under the Wagner Act, but certainly not antiunion.

We have had one recent case, however, that reflected the old Wagner Act attitude. Upon losing a representation election at one of our plants, the petitioning union filed objections to the conduct of the election. Examination of five officers of the union and four members of management by the Board's agent was followed by his indicating that several members of management were obviously lying, that the union officers were all truthful, and that he would see that a new election was ordered. The company urged that he investigate further by talking with rank and file employees and he reluctantly agreed. He then examined some 20 employees—about one-third of the total—whom he reported as supporting management statements, but indicated that they, too, were lying. He recommended to the regional office that a new election be held, but the Director, and later the National Board, upon review of the evidence, validated the election.

Union members have been given a means of identifying Communist leadership: All of the unions with which we deal have, we believe, filed the anti-Communist affidavits and other information required to qualify for the services of the Board. The Taft-Hartley law has forced many of the Communists in the labor-union movement out in the open. By identifying them, it has given American working men and women the means of expressing their contempt for those who would use American unions to further the national interests of a foreign power.

A nonqualified union, generally said to be Communist-dominated, organized one of our warehouses and called a recognition strike. As soon as the employees learned of the Communist reputation of the union they stopped the strike, transferred to a qualified union, and are now under contract as a certified bargaining unit.

It pleases me to know that union officers want management representatives to sign a non-Communist affidavit, if union representatives must do so. This appeal for equality is a just one and can be sympathetically understood by management people who have asked for equality under the law for more than a decade. To accomplish equality, we will sign anti-Communist affidavits. We shall be glad to declare our loyalty to our country and to our form of government.

Fears of decertification petitions have proven unfounded: Our company has never been involved in a decertification election. Fears that unions would lose ground because of this provision of the Taft-Hartley law have proved baseless, except in the cases of a few Communist-led unions. We are firm in our belief that employees should, however, have the right to reject, as well as to select, bargaining agents. To tie them forever to the originally certified representative, or to prevent a return to a "no union" status, is to violate their right of free choice, an avowed purpose of the Wagner Act, of the Taft-Hartley law, and of the bill before your committee.

Employees have been free from coercion: Complaints by individual employees about union coercion have practically disappeared. Employees need protection from union and employer coercion as provided by the present law. The proposed bill does not give this protection and says, in effect, that Federal law condones goon-squad activity, threats to individuals and their families, and other forms of union coercion.

The proposed bill does recognize—and the Wagner Act did not—that unions can commit unfair labor practices in the forms of jurisdictional strikes and limited secondary boycotts. But to say that unions do not commit other unfair labor practices against employees, companies, and the public is totally to ignore the facts of experience.

The typical experiences and views on employee representation which I have presented show that the law has been an aid, rather than a hindrance, to the exercise by workers of full freedom of association, self-organization, and designation of representatives of their own choosing.

Contract negotiation: Opponents of the Taft-Hartley law have claimed that the law would place great hurdles in the way of contract negotiation; that it would result in severe cuts of contract standards; that it would force strikes to gain union objectives; and that the duty which it placed on unions to bargain collectively with representatives chosen by management was unnecessary.

Real collective bargaining has accelerated, union gains increased; Since the Taft-Hartley law went into effect, our company has negotiated 78 contract and wage agreements. Of these, 76 were negotiated peacefully and, instead of resulting in "severe cuts in contract standards," brought substantial gains to employees. Typical are these benefits granted the United Rubber Workers: An 11-cents-an-hour wage increase in 1948; pay for six holidays not worked; 3 weeks paid vacation for 15-year-service employees; severance pay for mental or physical disability cases and for retiring employees; increased incentive wage guaranties; and other significant, though less important, changes.

Union gains were achieved without industrial strife. We have experienced only two legal strikes over contract issues under the Taft-Hartley law. These occurred in plants employing 2½ percent of our employees, and both were settled by vote of employees in union meetings on the basis of the company's prestrike offers.

Duty to bargain has been recognized. Our unions have not refused to bargain and, I believe, generally recognize that equity requires that unions, as well as management, have equal responsibility to bargain in good faith. By eliminating the duty of unions to bargain, the proposed bill would encourage high-handed tactics and stimulate strife. By eliminating the clear-cut definition of "to bargain collectively," which is a part of the Taft-Hartley law, the proposed bill invites the return of the confusion which characterized Wagner Act history in this respect.

The representative experiences of the B. F. Goodrich Co. in contract negotiations under the Taft-Hartley law do not substantiate the charges made by union critics.

Union security: Opponents of the present law have claimed that union security would be jeopardized; that the closed shop ban would interfere with stable collective bargaining; that the union-shop-election requirement would affect efforts to gain union security; and that the voluntary check-off provision would encourage "free riders" and adversely affect union finances.

Union security rests on foundation of performance. The B. F. Goodrich Co. has a long-standing policy that the question of membership or nonmembership in a union is a matter for the individual employee to decide. We do not believe it is right for us to bargain away our employees' freedom of choice. Except in two instances which have a background of Government compulsion, our union agreements do not require union membership as a condition of employment.

It is our experience and belief that stable collective-bargaining relationships are promoted when unions are fully accountable to their memberships. Where compulsory unionization exists the members do not control and, in fact, depend upon the pleasure of union officials to continue to hold their jobs. In the hands of Communists and racketeers, compulsory union membership is a powerful tool for the permanent subjection of American working people.

Real union security has increased. Our company has agreed to voluntary check-off of union dues wherever requested. Our experience is that unions that properly represent the real interests of employees have no difficulty in selling their membership on payment of dues by the voluntary check-off method. During 1947, 93 percent of the employees in our Akron production union paid over $250,000 into the union treasury on a voluntary check-off basis. In 1948 we deducted dues of approximately $230,000 from over 97 percent of the employees in the bargaining unit. This represents real union security with protections of individual rights that should be retained in the proposed law.

Handling employee problems: Opponents of the Taft-Hartley law have claimed that employers would become more adamant and uncooperative in settling grievances; that work stoppages would increase to achieve satisfactory adjustment of grievances; and that unions would be harrassed by damage suits arising from stoppages in violation of agreements and other unauthorized acts of union agents.

Bargaining on grievances has continued as usual. Our experience is that we have few grievances or work stoppages in plants other than Akron, which is our largest operation. During the last 12 months of the Wagner Act's existence, 1,120 grievances were filed in Akron. During the 12 months following the effective date of the Taft-Hartley law, 1,102 grievances were filed. This is business as usual.

Work stoppages have been greatly reduced. To eliminate any excuse for work stoppages during a contract period, our agreements with URWA have provided for arbitration as the terminal point in the grievance procedure. Nevertheless, work stoppages do occur, mostly in connection with grievances that have not been referred to or negotiated under the established grievance procedure.

During the last 12 months of the Wagner Act, 104 such illegal stoppages occurred in our Akron plants causing 122,000 man-hours of lost time. During the first 12 contract months under the Taft-Hartley law, only 19 stoppages occurred involving 25,000 man-hours of lost time.

Arbitration has been substituted for stoppages. This 80-percent reduction in stoppages and lost hours is directly related to greater use of peaceful means of settling differences. During the last year under the Wagner Act 24 arbitration decisions were received against 71 in the 16 months following under the Taft-Hartley law. This experience is an accurate reflection of the influence of the Taft-Hartley law on responsibility and accountability for union actions.

Stoppages have increased since the election. It is significant that during the first 4 months following the November elections, 14 work stoppages occurred in our Akron plants with work losses of 69,000 man-hours, nearly 3 times the losses of the entire year preceding. Does this indicate an expectation that restraints will soon be off and responsibility and accountability no longer required?

Union-company relations have been free from legal actions. We have never sued a union, and we do not believe damage suits ordinarily further improvement of labor-management relations. Unions can and do commit acts for which money damages should be a remedy.

We know the deterring effect on union excesses which the presence of such a remedy can have. Financial responsibility of unions for acts of their agents should be retained in the new law.

The position of supervisors: The Taft-Hartley law insures to supervisors the right of self-organization, but it does not extend to them the special privilege of NLRB certification. The B. F. Goodrich Co. has had specific experience with foremen's organization, including a 4-week organizational strike in 1945.

Foremen's unions are subservient to direct workers' unions. From our experience we have learned that foremen cannot serve both a labor organization and their management organization; that a foremen's union cannot be effective except through the cooperation of the workers' union; and that a foremen's union must, therefore, be subservient to the direct workers' union, making the effective supervision of the workers impossible.

Our experience during the organizational efforts of the Foremen's Association of America and the 4-week strike of September 1945 clearly demonstrated that the independent nature of the Foremen's Association of America was a myth. Leaders of the Foremen's Association sought and obtained the cooperation of certain officers and members of the productive workers' union. During the early days of the strike, officers of the production workers' union encouraged production employees to work only for their normal supervisor and to refrain from working for members of factory management which were replacing foremen then on the picket line. Production employees refused to continue at work until the supervisory situation had returned to normal.

This approach and cooperation by the production employees completely closed the Akron plants which otherwise would have remained in partial operation. During this strike many coercive tactics were used. Threats were made against individual foremen who were unsympathetic to the strike. The strike was eventually terminated when the organized minority of striking foremen gave way to the unorganized majority who wanted to fulfill their responsibilities as members of management.

Foremen have true management status: Our first line foremen have real management status, are responsible for hiring, discipline and firing, handle employee problems on their own authority, are paid salaries well above the earning level of those they supervise, averaging more than $4,000 a man in 1948, and are classified as executive employees under the Fair Labor Standards Act and the Public Contracts Act.

Industrial management cannot succeed in its efforts to further American productivity and standards of living unless it is operated as a closely knit team. It cannot function if divided into separate units of diverse interest. Failure of new legislation to clarify the true management status of supervisors would be a great disservice.

Bargaining on insurance and pension program: We are greatly concerned with recent decisions which require compulsory bargaining on insurance and pension programs. The B. F. Goodrich Co. has had voluntary joint contributory life, hospitalization, and disability insurance for many years.

Since 1934, an insured retirement plan has been available to all employees. The company pays about two-thirds of the total cost of an employee's retirement benefit. Approximately 76 percent of all employees are members and on December 31, 1948, the insurance company held more than $20,000,000 in reserve for future employee retirement benefits. Company contributions to these employee benefit plans exceeded $3,200,000 in 1948 alone.

It would be virtually impossible to provide a sound, adequate plan of this nature if we were required to bargain on this subject. The problem of coordinating the thinking of our 81 bargaining units under one program would be insurmountable. To break up the present plan into numerous smaller plans to satisfy the diverse wishes of unions would severely limit the effectiveness of the program.

Collective bargaining on retirement plans would restrict rather than accelerate progress. Employers would hesitate to liberalize programs knowing that the granting of union demands this year would simply result in greater demands next year.

To be effective, retirement plans must continue in force for decades. Subjecting such long-term obligations to the hazards of annual negotiations, and to changing union representation, would seriously jeopardize their stability and permanence.

In addition, they are definitely related to whatever action Congress may take in the broad field of social security. We suggest that bargaining on such matters be made permissible, but that it not be made compulsory, pending adequate Congressional investigation and study of the problems involved. Otherwise, unsound, fly-by-night programs, poorly conceived, inadequately financed, and unable to perform on their promises will be created to the present pleasure, but future disillusionment of many who will place false dependence upon them.

There are other major problems to be considered by your committee which I have not mentioned. I have talked in terms of those elements of labor legislation that affect the day-to-day job of managements and unions of living together peacefully and productively.

The specific provisions of a new labor law are of less importance than are the principles upon which the law is based. If the approach is one-sided and based on power without responsibility, privilege without obligation, then the great and costly excesses that occurred in Wagner Act days will likely recur. If the approach is in terms of the protection of fundamental American freedoms; equality of rights and privileges, obligations and responsibilities, and the provision of competent impartial administration, then neither management, nor labor, nor employees, nor the public have anything to fear.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Jacobs, have you any questions?

Mr. JACOBS. I have two or three questions that I would like to ask, Mr. Keener. I have been quite intrigued about this question of foremen. How many foremen does the B. F. Goodrich Co. employ?

Mr. KEENER. Across the country, approximately 1,500. In our Akron plant where this problem occurred, about 600.

Mr. JACOBS. About 600 in the Akron plant. Can you tell me in approximate terms what your foremen's pay is in ratio to, we will say, the highest production worker in your plant?

Mr. KEENER. In general, the foremen will average anywhere from 10 to 25 percent more pay on a straight-time hourly basis than do the direct workers. In addition, the foremen are on a 40-hour week and the direct workers are on a 36-hour week. So there is a further differential caused by a 10-percent differential in hours.

Mr. JACOBS. Well, let me see. Four hours difference in a week of 36, that would be approximately 10 percent, and some of them go 10 to 25 percent higher than the production workers?

Mr. KEENER. That is correct. And I am referring to the first level of supervision. We have higher levels of foremen who are higher paid.

Mr. JACOBS. I understand. I meant that. You correctly got the sense of my question.

Is this percentage differential of 10 to 25 percent above the average production worker, or is it above the highest paid production worker?

Mr. KEENER. We look at it generally in terms of the highest 10 or highest 20 percent of the production workers.

Mr. JACOBS. I see. I have a problem in my mind on this subject. I have received a lot of correspondence from employers about it, and with a feeling that perhaps they were a little more in earnest, a little more sincere about that particular phase of it than they are some of the other phases.

Mr. KEENER. I want to assure you, Congressman, that we are sincere on that phase and on the other phases.

Mr. JACOBS. I thought I detected a little more earnestness. We will put it that way.

Here is the problem that is presenting itself to me. Now, take the B. F. Goodrich Co. I know it is a large company, and there are 600 foremen in one of your plants. You are probably ahead of me. It seems to me that the foreman is pretty small when he sits down across the table to bargain with the company. I recognize the other side of it that you have given me, but as a representative of all the people, I feel that I must try to find some solution and urge it on my colleagues that will protect all of the people. So on the one hand, I recognize what you say, that with the possibility of foremen being a union, they might become subservient to the production union and become too closely allied in their interests. I recognize that. But on the other hand, when I think of foremen—I suppose I have foremen who are constituents, too—I think of a large number of foremen who sit down and try to make a bargain with their employer.

Now, how do you think we can balance that up so as to reserve your right on the one hand and at the same time protect the foreman in his bargaining power on the other side? I am not putting that to you as a twister; I am in dead earnest mysef on that question.

Mr. KEENER. I think that answer to that question lies in the policies and the practices of the companies that are concerned. Now, American industry is certainly very conscious of the problem that exists in connection with the unionization of foremen, because if they unionize, then what is there to keep the next level of foremen from unionizing? And I think, as a matter of fact, under the interpretation of the NLRB, prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley law it would have been legal if we vice presidents had organized into a union to bargain with the president.

Mr. JACOBS. You probably do belong to some, do you not? I do not know whether you would call it a union or not.

Mr. KEENER. I do not know the name or the nature of it if I do belong. But we make every effort to keep our foremen in line with other levels of people, those above whom they work and those for whom they work. We have a job-evaluation program which determines the relative levels of jobs, and there is a rate range applied, each man in a particular job classification getting the minimum or higher than the range, the normal range, which is about a mid point, being that of the average man in that group, and the top of the range having space for merit increases for those who show exceptional ability. We also attempt to promote as rapidly as we can.

Mr. JACOBS. What you are telling me is this, that almost any company by treating its employees pretty well—and it goes even with respect to production employees—could keep them from organizing in the first place. That is almost true, is it not? If you treat your employees well enough, they are not liable to organize.

Mr. KEENER. I think that is probably true. I think this is also true, however, that one of the biggest jobs there is in American industry is finding enough competent people to take over added responsibility. And each company, I think, recognizes that it is in its own self-interest to develop the employees at each level so that you will have adequate replacements for promotion as promotions are needed.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, the real point you are making here is that they should not be given the right to process unfair-labor-practice-charges against the employer because the employer would refuse to bargain with the organization they form, and not that they cannot form the organization. That is your point.

Mr. KEENER. They have the right under the present law to form the organization, but that——

Mr. JACOBS. You recognize the problem that I am thinking about, I presume.

Mr. KEENER. I think I do, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Keener, it is my understanding from the general tenor of your testimony that you feel that the Taft-Hartley Act makes union leaders more responsible.

Mr. KEENER. I think that has been the outstanding contribution of the law.

Mr. BURKE. I have talked with some of the officials of the United Rubber Workers who have your plants organized, largely.

Mr. KEENER. They have seven of our plants. We have 20 plants in the country.

Mr. BURKE. They negotiated the contract this past year without a strike, did they?

Mr. KEENER. We negotiated our present contract with the United Rubber Workers in September of 1947, without a strike. We had a wage negotiation in 1948 without a strike.

Mr. BURKE. And that was since the Taft-Hartley Act became law?

Mr. KEENER. Both of those contracts became effective since the Taft-Hartley law went into effect.

Mr. BURKE. Well, these officers inform me that they have complied with the law all the way through, that they have given the required notices as to the cancellation of contracts or whatever it might be, notices of negotiations, and therefore they could lawfully have struck the plant during the time that they were bargaining with you.

Mr. KEENER. At the time we were bargaining, that was an understanding on the part of the union people and on the part of ourselves that so long as a contract was in force there could not be a strike. Mr.

Patterson, who is general counsel for the URWA, I think, is quite firm in his belief on that score. Later, there came a case under the NLRB which held that there could be. But I think there is still some uncertainty as to the question of whether, when a contract is continuing, a union have a wage reopening clause can strike to enforce that wage reopening negotiation.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to address myself to this statement on page 7 of your statement. You have noted that there have been several stoppages. I presume you mean unauthorized stoppages, or departmental stoppages.

Mr. KEENER. All stoppages of that sort we classify as unauthorized, because the union does not tell us that they authorize them.

Mr. BURKE. In those stoppages, could there possibly be the item or the factor that possibly the company could create a situation which, although the union may have the right to file grievances against it and go through the grievance procedure, might make it far better to take up with the union the change of the method or change of piece rate, or whatever it might be that created the grievance in the first place, with the union rather than just putting it into effect. It would seem to me that would be better, and I know that sometimes where companies do that, when they contemplate a change in piece rate, for instance, or a change in method, they put it into effect and say to the employees in that particular department, "That is it. Take it or leave it."

Then they can file a grievance against it, and usually it sorts of heats them up.

Mr. KEENER. That procedure is set out in very complete detail in our agreement with the United Rubber Workers, and in the case of a change in a standard or the establishment of a new standard, the agreement says that the standard shall be posted and become effective upon being posted and that it shall be worked on for a period of 10 days before a grievance can be filed, and that thereafter a grievance can be filed during the next 5 days and any adjustment which is made in the grievance procedure will be retroactive to the date the standard was posted. That is all set forth in language that is understood by both sides and has been acted upon in arbitration on a number of different occasions.

In addition to that, Mr. Congressman, we have an addition in our agreement which provides that there shall not be any discussion of a problem over which a work stoppage has occurred until after the work stoppage has ended; so there is absolutely nothing to be accomplished by a work stoppage, and the problem is always settled later in the procedure, anyway. And the only thing that is accomplished by a stoppage is to delay the handling of the grievance by the amount of time the men are out.

Mr. BURKE. I do not want to criticize the type of agreement that the union and yourself arrived at, but I have always found in practical working that if there is any basic change in the standard, it is usually best to take it up first and argue it out before putting it into effect.

Mr. KEENER. As a matter of fact, we do both of those things. We have a procedure known as a standardized operating procedure where the job method is worked out between the foremen, the technical people, and the direct workman, and it is set up and proposed to them, and generally speaking standards are established on that job.

Mr. BURKE. How do you arrive at the standards? By time and motion study?

Mr. KEENER. By time and motion study.

Mr. BURKE. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No; I do not find anything that I can put my hand on.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell, do you care to ask any questions?

Mr. MCCONNELL. No.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Keener. We appreciate your patience.

Mr. KEENER. Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee will stand in recess until 9:30 o'clock in the morning, at which time we will hear representatives of the Timber Products Manufacturing Association.

(Whereupon, at 6 p. m., an adjournment was taken until the following day, Friday, March 11, 1949, at 9:30 a. m.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

FRIDAY, MARCH 11, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 9:30 a. m., Hon. Cleveland M. Bailey presiding.

Mr. BAILEY. The committee will be in order.

At this time, the committee would be pleased to hear from George J. Tichy and John G. Curren, of the Timber Products Manufacturers Association.

The gentlemen will state their names.

Mr. TICHY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is George J. Tichy, and the gentleman on my right, which would be to your left, is Mr. John Curren.

TESTIMONY OF GEORGE J. TICHY, MANAGER, TIMBER PRODUCTS MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION, SPOKANE, WASH.

Mr. TICHY. Mr. Chairman, I am the manager of the Timber Products Manufacturers Association, located at Spokane, Wash., an industrial relations association representing timber producers in eastern Washington, Idaho, and Montana. I am also a practicing attorney.

I appear here today at the request of the National Lumber Manufacturers Association. I also speak in behalf of Timber Products Manufacturers Association, Spokane, Wash.; Plywood and Door Industrial Relations Committee, Tacoma, Wash.; Industrial Conference Board, Tacoma, Wash.; and Washington Employers, Inc., Seattle, Wash. These organizations, exclusive of the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, represent considerably more than a thousand employers employing at least 35,000 persons.

I would like to file for the record not only my full statement, but also statements for R. I. Studebaker, manager, Tri-County Loggers Association, Inc., Bellingham, Wash.; Charles S. Hoffman, manager, Oregon Coast Operators, Coos Bay, Oreg.; C. L. Irving, manager, Pine Industrial Relations Committee, Klamath Falls, Oreg.; (two statements, including his oral statement before the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare); and an analysis of the original Thomas-Lesinski bill by Walter A. Durham, manager, Lumbermen's Industrial Relations Committee, Portland, Oreg.

Mr. BAILEY. If there are no objections, the Chair will direct that the statements be accepted as part of the record.

Mr. TICHY. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

(The statements referred to are inserted at the close of Mr. Curren's testimony.)

Mr. TICHY. For the sake of brevity, I will touch upon just a few of the high lights of my own statement.

When the Wagner Act was adopted by Congress in 1935, I am sure Congress did not realize the tremendous latitude in making administrative determinations on very important phases of the act it was giving the National Labor Relations Board.

The great amount of unemployment in 1935 and the general economic condition of the country presented a very different atmosphere than that which existed during the recent war and postwar periods.

The Wagner Act was a green light for labor unions to start organizing and membership campaigns. In the 12 years after the adoption of the Wagner Act, labor unions grew and prospered and became a dominant force in our economy. In fact, their strength became so great that by 1947 the country was brought face to face with the fact that some labor groups had attained such power that they could control the very lives of our people and the economy of our country. The hearings 2 years ago clearly demonstrated the obsolescence of the Wagner Act and the need for more equity in the field of labor-management relations.

Congress, after extended hearings, was convinced that the Labor-Management Relations Act was a step in the right direction and overwhelmingly adopted it, even over a Presidential veto. Naturally, the leaders of the big labor unions felt it incumbent upon themselves to vigorously resist a curtailment of their power. It was to be expected that through their powerful political action groups, such as the Political Action Committee and Labor's League for Political Education, they would endeavor with all their resources to regain their former favorable position irrespective of the consequences to the public. In this, no one was surprised. The question now is whether the Congress is going to protect these union leaders or is going to continue the protection to the public provided by the Labor-Management Relations Act.

It is well that we examine the protections to the public provided by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947:

(1) By defining collective bragaining and requiring either party to a collective-bargaining agreement to give 60 days' notice to modify or terminate the agreement before taking economic action, the act gives assurance to the public that there will be a reasonable time for the parties to get the issues before each other and to more fully discuss them. This helps to eliminate untimely or hotheaded action on the part of either party.

(2) By providing that legal action may be taken against either party for violation of a collective bargaining agreement, the act has made both parties more responsible and has furthered the cause of industrial peace. I can say from personal experience that the foregoing is unequivocally true. Prior to the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act, it was not uncommon to find situations in which a union would call a so-called "quickie" strike in contravention of its contract. I remember several such strikes in my area within a few months prior to the passage of the act. I can recall none to have occurred since its enactment.

(3) By providing what has proven a reasonably effective solution to so-called national-emergency strikes, the act has provided a substantial protection to the public. This protection would be lost if H. R. 2032 were enacted.

(4) By removing the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service from the partisan Labor Department and establishing it as an independent agency, the public has been assured of impartial conciliation. I view with both amusement and alarm the desires of the selfish to return that important function to the Labor Department. To them I say, management could as logically insist that it be placed under the Commerce Department. However, either proposal would impair the functioning of the Conciliation Service and impair its maximum usefulness in the interests of the public.

(5) The requirement for the signing of non-Communist affidavits assures the public that subversive elements are substantially eliminated from places of leadership and control in labor organizations. As a representative of management I would be proud to sign such an affidavit.

(6) By prohibiting unfair labor practices by unions as well as by management:

(a) The public is assured that neither group will restrain or coerce employees in their right to self-organization or their right to refrain from self-organization. Certainly if employees are to be assured an unfettered judgment in these matters, they should be free from domination by either employers or labor organizations, and they should have the right to either organize or refrain from organizing, as they see fit.

(b) The public is assured that there will be no work stoppages by reason of unwillingness of the chosen employer or employee representatives to deal with each other. As long as a labor organization is free to choose its own representatives, and the employer must deal with those representatives, then conversely the employer should be free to select his representatives and the union be required to deal with such representatives.

(c) The public is protected from unnecessary jurisdictional strikes. There is no circumstance within my knowledge that justifies a jurisdictional strike.

(d) The public is protected from losses due to secondary boycotts. If economic action is to be taken, it should be limited to the immediate employer and the employees involved in the plant affected. Other employees in other plants not involved in the issue giving rise to the economic action should not be put out of work by reason of a secondary boycott, nor should the public suffer the inconveniences and losses resulting from this octopus in labor relations.

(e) The public has been relieved in some degree from extra costs due to featherbedding. These provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act should be retained. I am told that one union in the printing business frequently requires that already-made-up cuts or mats which could be used as received must be torn down or melted up and new plates made to satisfy the demands of that union. Within the past few weeks in our timber-products industry, a plant had done some plumbing work using the services of its own union employees. As a result, another union threatened the plant with a boycott and unfair listing if it did not pay a "work assessment" to a charitable organization. This was to be a payment, remember, for work not performed nor to be performed by the members of the other union. It should be observed that in the long run the public has to pay such bills.

(7) The ban on the closed shop found in the Labor-Management Relations Act has given assurance to the individual members of the public that they do not have to join a union in order to get a job. I find it difficult to reconcile our democratic ideals with a requirement that to get a job, to hold a job, or to be employed in a particular industry or at a particular trade one must join and pay tribute to a private organization with which he may be completely out of sympathy. It would be as reasonable to require that a veteran belong to the American Legion, the Veterans of Foreign Wars, or one of the other veterans, organizations to qualify for the benefits secured by such organizations. It would be as reasonable to require that every timber-products manufacturer belong to my organization to qualify for any benefits it may have secured for the industry, or to require that every manufacturer in the United States belong to the National Association of Manufacturers. There is no reason why unions should not have to sell their services or convince workers of the advantages of membership the same as must all other organizations.

(8) There are other protections given to the public by the Labor-Management Relations Act which would be wiped out by H. R. 2032. One example is the joint committee which would assist the Congress in keeping abreast of our ever-changing times. Taken as a whole, the present act has given the public real protection from unnecessary strikes and bad conduct on the part of either management or labor unions. This committee should consider well these protections to the public before it changes the Labor-Management Relations Act.

In spite of the clamor of some certain labor leaders, it is worthy of note that since the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act, other union leaders have used to advantage some of their newfound rights and protections under this law—for example, by threatening suit, although sometimes in the form of a bluff, under title III of the act. Union leaders also have approved on several occasions the requirement for non-Communist affidavits. Although the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service is no longer a branch of the Labor Department, we find that in our area the labor unions are the first to call for its services. I have had union leaders tell me the value of the representation election to determine the collective-bargaining representative and they have even advised me of their desire to have an election even when an employer was willing to recognize the union without one.

Most local union leaders with whom I have discussed the Labor-Management Relations Act speak in vague terms in criticizing it, which leads me to believe that most of this furor about the act has been created by the top men in their organizations and handed down to local unions as a policy to which they must give lip service.

The Federal Government has sometimes carried out public information programs on the provisions of new legislation. It might be worth while for it to carry out a like unbiased educational program to educate the public as well as union leaders and others of the fairness and equity of the Labor-Management Relations Act, rather than to carry on a program of vilification and biased information.

From a practical standpoint unions have not been hurt by the Labor-Management Relations Act. Labor Department statistics show that the growth in union membership during the life of the present act has not been retarded. Almost a million new members have been recruited by unions during the brief existence of this law. The present law did not deter a third round of wage increases. Further, unions can strike and have struck since the enactment of this law, even as they did before its enactment. Today the worker has regained his position as an individual with the right to work where he pleases and when he pleases. I hope that we will not be reactionary and return the individual workman to the position he had under the Wagner Act, when union rights superseded individual rights.

We should not forget the terrible strikes that tied up our economy prior to the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act and the helpless position in which the general public was placed. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, there has been a noticeable decrease in strikes—in fact, 33 percent less in 1948 than in 1946; 55 percent less workers were involved in strikes in 1948 than in 1946; 70 percent less man-days were lost in idleness in 1948 than in 1946. And in 1948 there were only 34,000,000 man-days of idleness resulting from strikes, as compared with 1946, when there were 116,000,000.

Where is the so-called slave labor that was to be the lot of working people under this law? Look about you, and you find none. The workingman has greater protection today than he has ever had. He is not only protected from the ruthless employer, but also from the truthless union leader.

The Labor-Management Relations Act has brought stability, responsibility, care, and caution to the collective bargaining table on the part of unions and employers alike—not "confusion," as stated by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Tobin. This I testify to, not as a theoretical conclusion or from sitting a distance of 3,000 miles from the bargaining table, but from actual day-to-day experience at the bargaining table.

Gentlemen, we do want you to know that we appreciate the opportunity of having been granted time to appear before you. We realize that you are endeavoring to do a sincere job in analyzing labor legislation. We are sure that you are aware how extremely important a mutually satisfactory climate must be provided for both labor and industry in their deliberations to accomplish the maximum of industrial peace and economic stability. As this committee two years ago deliberated for many months and conceived the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, it is understandable that the job that you are attempting now is not an easy one. We are confident that your committee, with a profound sense of responsibility and in an effort to write legislation that will be equitable to management and labor, and even more important, will protect the public interest, will give serious and adequate consideration to the type of labor law it ultimately recommends. And we are equally sure that if this be done, the bill pending before the committee will not be reported out as it is now printed, but will be substantially amended, rejected, or possibly completely rewritten.

Thank you. And Mr. Curren would like to deliver his oral statement, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. At this time, I would like to ask the gentleman, for brevity's sake, to get through with your presentation as soon as possible.

Mr. JACOBS. Who is the next witness now?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Curren.

TESTIMONY OF JOHN G. CURREN, REPRESENTING NATIONAL LUMBER MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION, NEW ORLEANS, LA.

Mr. CURREN. Mr. Chairman, my name is John G. Curren, of New Orleans, La. I am appearing here at the request of the National Lumber Manufacturers Association to give you, to the best of my knowledge and ability, the benefit of my experiences in collective bargaining under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, as it applied to the South.

For the past 4 years I have been a labor-relations consultant to management and now represent a substantial number of employers, principally in the southern pine and southern hardwood industries. Before that, I was for 3 years a field examiner in the regional office of the National Labor Relations Board for the 15th region, which covers the States of Mississippi, Louisiana, Arkansas, the western half of Tennessee, the southern half of Alabama, and the western part of Florida.

In this brief oral presentation, I am not going to try to discuss every feature of the proposed, present and past labor-management laws in detail; in lieu of that, I have a comprehensive statement which I would like with your permission, Mr. Chairman, to insert in the record.

Mr. BAILEY. If there is no objection, we will accept your statement for the record.

(Mr. Curren's statement follows that of Mr. Tichy at the close of their testimony.)

Mr. CURREN. Thank you, Mr. Chairman. However, there are three particular subjects to which I should like to call the attention of the committee.

First is the question of whether the free-speech provision of the Labor-Management Relations Act, specifically guaranteeing the freedom of speech provided in the first amendment to the Constitution, should be retained. Under the proposed measure, H. R. 2032, there is no plain guarantee of free speech. Once again the National Labor Relations Board would be free to establish limitations that employers would have to follow, instead of having the constitutional right clearly defined as it is in the existing law.

Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, employers can no longer be held guilty of unfair labor practices because of their expression of views, whether oral or written, provided such expression contains no threat of reprisal or promise of benefit. With the free-speech guarantee plainly written into the present act, management has gained confidence that it runs no risk of misinterpretation and of an unfair labor practice charge by presenting its views to employees, views which often help employees to make a more intelligent decision in their own self-interest. With free-speech protection unequivocally stated in the law, management is much less inclined to condemn and criticize the National Labor Relations Board, even when elections and Board actions are adverse, because it feels it has had its day in court and has not had its constitutional rights unprotected by a law such as the Wagner Act.

To keep this attitude of confidence in the equity of any labor law and its administration, it is essential that the free-speech provisions of the present act be retained. It would be unwise to omit this provision and rely upon the hope that the Board would not revert to some of the policies it followed between 1935 and 1938, when an employer could express no opinion on union activities because his economic weight represented coercion of employees, or between 1938 and 1943, when the Supreme Court, in a series of precedent-making decisions, tried to define the limits of privileged speech, but during which time employers had only hazy ideas of what was permissible, or from 1943 to 1946, when an employer was compelled to guess what the Board would think of his conduct in conjunction with his speech and how far apart allegedly unfair acts must be from the time of his messages.

With changes in the membership of the National Labor Relations Board, the question of what messages to employees constitute privileged speech is uncertain, vague, and confusing if the guarantee is written into the law, the opportunities for varying interpretations and reversals of opinion by the Board will be minimized.

Free speech under the present law gives employers and unions alike the same opportunity to correct misstatements and misrepresentations, to deny allegations and charges, and to answer questions and to make explanations, all to the end that the democratic principle of hearing all sides of a question will enable the employee to decide more intelligently on matters that affect his livelihood. This privilege is not only appreciated by labor and management, but also is greatly appreciated by the individual employee.

Another problem that I know your committee will want to treat seriously is the provision relating to the filing of non-Communist affidavits. While it is true that many paid officials of labor organizations have protested this alleged insult to their allegiance and patriotism, in view of the healthful effect, from the public standpoint and from the standpoint of the unions themselves, it is doubtful that the complaints have been justified. In many of these cases, the labor leaders have used this provision as ballyhoo in their campaign against a slave-labor law, while in other cases the howls were coming from individuals who had been wounded deeply, people who had been using the labor movement and labor organizations to promote their own brand of government.

In these days of tense international relations, it is imperative that the labor movement and the welfare of individual American workmen not be sacrificed, and although there may be other ways to handle the problem of Communist influence in unions, it seems that the requirements of the present law should be kept since they have demonstrated their value and the alternatives are subject to speculation.

However, "What's source for the goose is sauce for the gander," and maybe employers as well as union officials should be required to execute the affidavit. I do not know of any employers who would consider it an affront to their integrity or patriotism to be asked to sign such an affidavit. Hundreds of union, employer and public representatives on the War Labor Board and its agencies signed a similar affidavit without objections, and Congress has not condemned the loyalty check of Government employees, only a small percentage of whom are disloyal.

In view of the effectiveness of the provision of the present law, it is recommended that it be allowed to stand.

The third and most important fact that deserves the recognition of the committee is that the present law has brought to he bargaining table a mature type of conduct and a sense of responsibility which has not always characterized bargaining sessions. Your committee has already seen statistics on the lesser number of strikes and the fewer number of man-days lost from strikes as well as other evidence of stable employer-employee relations, all without hurting the unions, either in numerical or financing strength. This stability cannot be attributed to any one section of the Labor-Management Relations Act; it is the result of the act in toto. And yet, while the statistics prove that the Labor-Management Relations Act is not only beneficial to the public interest, but is also equitable, the law is being condemned as a slave-labor law.

One of the examples used to justify this label of slave-labor law is the act's provision relating to unfair labor practices by unions. After the passage of the act, and especially during the fall of 1948, it was widely proclaimed that these provisions would promote the persecution of labor organizations, through the use of injunctions by the National Labor Relations Board and through the filing of charges by employers and the issuance of complaints by the Board of union unfair labor practices. The facts tear aside the veil of propaganda of slave-labor law: the Congressional Joint Labor-Management Relations reports that in 15 months, there have been a total of only 660 charges of unfair labor practices by employers against unions, as compared to 4,136 charges against employers. Secondary boycott injunctions against unions have numbered 15. And there have been only two other injunctions against unions and one against an employer. What is not disclosed by these figures is the number of cases where individual employees would have been coerced or the public interest harmed by secondary boycotts or other abuses in the absence of provisions like those in the present act; the knowledge that irresponsible actions would lead to unfair labor practice charges or injunctions has been a stabilizing influence. In the same way, the mere knowledge that jurisdictional strikes, which hurt the public interest and usually do not help the individual employees involved, could be enjoined has served to stabilize industrial relations. That attitude of caution, restraint and responsibility has also been promoted by other provisions of the present law such as the one that makes both parties to a collective bargaining contract suable, even though the provision has not often been resorted to and even though most States permitted suits before the Labor-Management Relations Act went into effect. Another provision of the present act that has helped to develop a sense of maturity in bargaining is the one requiring "good faith" bargaining on both sides of the table. As a matter of equity, it is obvious that both sides must enter into negotiations in good faith, and yet it took the National Labor Relations Board 11 years—until 1946—to come to that view under the National Labor Relations Act. The scales should remain balanced.

It is very probable that the retention or loss of my one provision of the present law, of and by itself, would not cause an upheaval in employer-employee relations, with the possible exception of the "national emergency" section. But the act as a whole has been a stabilizing influence. This is so not only because it treats, one by one, with the individual irritants that collectively would add up to widespread industrial disturbances, but also because it describes the remedies for those sources of irritation in a much more specific manner than the National Labor Relations Act, which left too much writing of law, in effect, to the National Labor Relations Board.

Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Tichy, you made some rather definite statements here in support of the retention of the present law. Is the committee to imply from your statements that you are throwing a blanket endorsement over the so-called Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. TICHY. I think that the committee could make that implication, because my experience under the law demonstrated to me that the public has gained a lot of rights here that they did not have under the Wagner Act, and for that reason, as well as the fact that the law has only been on the books, as far as the effective date of title I is concerned, since August of 1947. And I feel that it has not been given a completely fair test as yet. I am rather inclined to believe that if the present state of statistics continues to demonstrate the effectiveness of this law, after a full and complete test has been afforded, this committee, as well as the public as a whole, will clearly want the law retained.

Mr. BAILEY. This question is directed to Mr. Curren.

In your reference, Mr. Curren, to the matter of free speech, in view of the fact that we have a constitutional guarantee of free speech, do you think it is necessary that we write any additional guarantees of free speech into this legislation?

Mr. CURREN. Yes, Mr. Chairman, I do, and I do for this reason. Whereas the Wagner Act did not prohibit free speech, it did not protect and did not outline what free speech should be, and it took the National Relations Board 8 years—at least, the Supreme Court of the United States, after action by the National Labor Relations Board—to define free speech in the American Tube Bending case. Now, that was eight long years, from 1935 to 1943.

The reason why I think it should be clearly defined in the act is that if it is, employers will state their side of the case to their employees. After they have stated their side of the case, if they lose the election, frankly, and they go into the bargaining in a much better frame of mind from what they would have had if they had remained silent.

I think that free speech should be clearly defined in the act.

Mr. BAILEY. You have read the Constitution, have you, Mr. Curren?

Mr. CURREN. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you have any difficulty in understanding the meaning of the Bill of Rights, and particularly the first amendment to the Constitution?

Mr. CURREN. I think the first amendment is excellent.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think that reference to free speech needs any enlargement?

Mr. CURREN. It does, if we go back to the old act, because the National Labor Relations Board was just as aware of the first amendment as I am today. Yet it took them 8 years before we had a decision by the Supreme Court defining freedom of speech. In the first years of the National Labor Relations Act, any expression at all on the part of employers that seemed to be any type at all of free speech was declared an unfair labor practice, whereas now we know that if there are no threats or no promises of benefit, the employer can state his side of the case, and controls organizational drives which sometimes get out of hand. Not very often, but they do. And I think at the time it does happen, we should have that right given to employers. I think the majority of employers did not take advantage of free speech even though they were aware of the first amendment, because the Board had a number of decisions throwing out consent elections because of a speech that an employer had made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Perkins, have you any questions?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Tichy, I believe that when you read No. 5, you made yourself very clear that you were very proud of the Communist oath provision in the Taft-Hartley law.

Mr. TICHY. That is true.

Mr. PERKINS. What experience have you had in labor-management relations How long has the duration of your experience been?

Mr. TICHY. Approximately 8 years, as labor relations consultant in one form or another, together with several years' experience, prior to that time, as a worker in one of the lumber mills on the coast where I became quite familiar with the problems of labor, and worked side by side with them.

Mr. PERKINS. You believe in our system of criminal justice, that we have had on our statute books in this country ever since we have been a country, do you not?

Mr. TICHY. Why, yes.

Mr. PERKINS. You believe as a principle that a man is presumed innocent until he is proven guilty?

Mr. TICHY. Why, certainly.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not think there are other ways to handle this communistic problem instead of trying to insert an anticommunistic oath provision in a law for an employee to sign before he can be employed by a union?

Mr. TICHY. Congressman, I think your statement is very true. There may be other ways that this can be accomplished; however, so far as I am aware, no one has come up with one, or leastwise one has not been demonstrated in the law that would accomplish the purpose involved here. I would like to make it clear, Congressman——

Mr. PERKINS. Let us not take up too much time. We only have 10 minutes.

You state that if you were an employer you would be glad to sign a provision of that kind; is that correct?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. In this bill you have before you, the Taft-Hartley law, it only provided that the labor union leaders and their employees take the oath; am I correct?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct. May I add an explanation?

Mr. PERKINS. No. Just answer my questions.

It exempted the employer altogether there, did it not?

Mr. TICHY. No one has showed a need that the employer should sign it, had they?

Mr. PERKINS. Our Constitution says all people are free and equal in this country, does it not, and we are not to presume that anyone is communistic, are we, in this country?

Mr. TICHY. I think not, but——

Mr. PERKINS. Why was such a differentiation laid there? Why was such prejudice shown against the labor unions?

Mr. TICHY. I am of the opinion that the congressional committees which had taken, as I understand, some 5 months of hearings, came to the conclusion that a need existed insofar as labor unions were concerned, in view of the fact that it apparently was made clear and evident that the Communist people had infiltrated into the labor groups because that is a fertile ground.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not know, as a matter of fact, that anything that strikes at one part of our labor-management relations, and is not applicable to the other, is totally unfair on its face? You will admit to that, will you not?

Mr. TICHY. No, I will not, for this reason, Congressman, that apparently a need had not been shown that the employer group has not been a fertile field.

Mr. PERKINS. The labor unions made no effort to show that the employers should sign such an oath, did they?

Mr. TICHY. If my recollection serves me correctly, they did not seem to show very much of anything in the last hearings.

Mr. PERKINS. They did not have the opportunity in the Eightieth Congress, did they?

Mr. TICHY. I would not subscribe to that statement.

Mr. CURREN. May I add something to that?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. CURREN. I think the need for the Communist affidavit was clearly shown by the labor leaders. I think the outstanding example of it was Mr. Musso, international president of the furniture workers, when he stated that the Communists had charge of his union when he resigned as international president. And I think statements of John L. Lewis are outstanding on Communists infiltrating into the labor movement. I think the Philip Murray statements brought all of that out several years ago. And I think that Mr. Green's statements have borne that out. I believe, frankly, that it should be taken by both sides.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask you, as a matter of fact, if you do not think that it is unfair under our Constitution and laws to require a man or an employer or an employee or any labor union leader to take such an oath, inasmuch as that casts a reflection upon him concerning his loyalty to our form of government?

Mr. CURREN. Even when that need has been brought out by the labor leaders themselves? I think if they have brought out the need for it, that if labor today wants management to take that oath, I think it should be inserted that way.

Mr. PERKINS. If there is need for it, do you not think the Labor Department should have the authority to go into Federal courts and pull the Communists out of the unions by making a motion in the district court, or something of that nature, instead of requiring them to take an oath of that kind?

Mr. CURREN. I think the penalty that has been inflicted on them has been that they do not have the services of the National Labor Relations Board. I think that is proper, and I still say the need has been brought out by the labor leaders themselves.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to make one observation at this point, that under our democratic form of government I believe that you people who are proposing this communistic oath provision proposed it in the Eightieth Congress, and you who are proposing that it be retained are playing right into the hands of the Communist Party. The people in this country, especially all good Americans, do not like to be subjected to any reflection they may be considered Communists. They resent it, and if we have Communists who are trying to overthrow our form of government in any of these labor unions, there are other ways to get out of this problem, by letting the Labor Department deal with this question; or there is some other method, instead of trying to insert this oath provision, which is totally unfair to a democratic people.

Mr. TICHY. Mr. Congressman, may I speak on that for just a short time?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. TICHY. I appreciate the time is limited.

Mr. BAILEY. There are 2 minutes remaining.

Mr. TICHY. I want to point out first that one of the prominent unions on the Pacific coast came out with this quotation—incidentally, what they were talking about was the rumor that their union was being run by Communists—

> Furthermore, the Taft-Hartley Act has certainly cleared that issue up as far as our organization is concerned. All of the international officers, many of the district officers, and a great majority of our local union officers have signed noncommunistic affidavits. The law is quite strict, and any officer certainly would not take a chance on perjuring himself in an affidavit turned over to the Government.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TICHY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not think it would be much better to let the Labor Department handle that matter with the union leaders in order to eliminate those Communists in these particular unions you have reference to?

Mr. TICHY. It appears the unions have not been able to do it themselves, and I do not know what the Labor Department could do for them. Perhaps if we had a suggestion laid on the table as to that matter, it would be beneficial, and I would like to make one more point in order that the record will be clear so far as my personal position and that of my association is concerned.

Mr. PERKINS. I believe you admitted that any defendant was presumed to be innocent until he was proven guilty, under our system of justice in this country?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct.

Mr. PERKINS. Then, why do you want to cast a reflection as to a man's loyalty to a government, to his own government by requiring such an oath as this, when there are other ways to handle it?

Mr. TICHY. I find it difficult to accept that conclusion, for this reason: I know that a large number of the people who were working for the War Labor Board, and other public representatives—labor representatives and employer representatives—signed the affidavits and thought nothing of it. It was not the same identical affidavit, but in substance it was the same thing as the law now requires, but all of a sudden we go into a furore over the non-Communist affidavit, when it has been accepted.

Mr. PERKINS. That is just one of those things that was put in this bill to undertake to save face with the public by burdening labor with such an unfair act as the Taft-Hartley Act; am I correct in that statement?

Mr. TICHY. I do not believe so, sir. I could not subscribe to that.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Irving, do you have any questions?

Mr. IRVING. No, I believe not. I just came in.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. I would like to pursue a little further, and probably give you an opportunity to enlarge upon this so-called communistic affidavit.

Actually, the law, I believe—and I have been trying to find the section, but somehow or other I cannot find it here—I do not believe the law says anything specific about communism; it refers to subversive organizations, generally; is that not right?

Mr. TICHY. Congressman Burke, I think you will find it to be 9 (h).

Mr. BURKE. What page is that?

Mr. TICHY. I do not know what periodical or booklet you may have there.

Mr. BURKE. I have the official act.

Mr. TICHY. I, unfortunately, do not have a copy of the official act here. If you would like, I would be happy to quote the pertinent provision.

Mr. BURKE. It does say:

He is not a member of the Communist Party, or is affiliated with such party, and he does not believe in, and is not a member or does not support, any organization that believes in, or teaches the overthrow of the United States Government by force, or any illegal or unconstitutional methods.

In other words, it sets out the Communist Party first, and any other subversive organizations that might exist?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to give you my idea of the act, generally, and particularly as it applies to this. I have been of the opinion and, in fact, I campaigned on the premise that this act was just full of legalistic booby-traps for labor unions, generally, and that it accomplished its purposes in two ways: That is, the legalistic approach and the propagandistic; and, to my mind, this was more propagandistic than any intent that might serve a useful purpose. In other words, the idea was to convince the American people that only in labor unions could you find Communists, and probably all labor union people were Communists; is that not true?

Mr. TICHY. I question that that was the motive, sir. However, I have tried to make it clear here, and I regret I was not able to complete the quote from this labor organization out on the Pacific coast, and I would like to do so at this time. I believe the last sentence is the essence of it.

However, there might be Communists from time to time slip into our organization because it is the aim of the Communist Party to work through labor organizations where they can get control.

That is a labor union saying that.

I would like to make two more points under the heading of non-Communist affidavits. One, so far as the signing of the affidavit is concerned, it contributes nothing to collective bargaining, as such. However, it does clear from the collective bargaining table, I believe, the subversive element which has been demonstrated by other witnesses on prior occasions, and by the admission of this particular union, that they have gained power within the unions.

I will go one step further. My second point here is that if there is any doubt, before I would strike this, as a member of the public, I would put it on the employers, if there are any questions that employers may also be fertile field for communism, which I doubt. I think the affidavit should be placed on them, as well as the unions and, personally, I would not feel my patriotism was being questioned when I signed such an affidavit. As a matter of fact, I have signed similar affidavits previously.

Mr. BURKE. If Congress had passed an act requiring that management people be required to sign such an affidavit, would you not resent it?

Mr. TICHY. I would respond in this manner, Mr. Congressman: If a need for it had been shown to our committee or to the Congress that the Communist Party, or those who believed in the overthrow of the Government, had crept into management groups, I could see no reason for being offended because it was in the act.

Mr. BURKE. I will grant you that, for instance, public officials and public employees should certify that they are loyal to our Government before they act as officials or employees of such Government, but we are talking now of privately employed people of both management and labor.

For instance, I signed a non-Communist affidavit and, frankly, I did not like to sign it. Not because I felt that I might be charged with perjury if I signed it, or anything of that sort, because I knew my background and general reputation would uphold my signing of the affidavit; but my feeling was that I was presumed to be a Communist until I proved otherwise.

In order to carry on a private business, I feel that the business of negotiating for labor people is just as much a part of free enterprise as is the selling of lumber, the selling of steel, manufacturing of automobiles, or what have you, and that in order to carry on my daily business I was required to prove my Americanism. Do you not think that that is a case of presumption of guilt and a requirement to prove myself innocent, rather than a presumption of innocence until proven guilty?

Mr. TICHY. I could not respond with a positive answer to that question, from this standpoint, that here we have a situation, as I understand, in which the Congress and all committees heard witnessses over a 5-month period, and found that the Communist Party had found the labor field to be a fertile field, and had gained entry to key positions; and secondly, unions have come out and admitted it themselves. Therefore, the entire group, in order to get to the ones who were Communists, have to sign these affidavits, so that I do not see, personally, why that should be objected to. In my position, I would say, if it was worth so much to my country to be able to put the finger on the people I would be glad to sign the affidavit.

Mr. BURKE. Here is another angle: Suppose I signed my affidavit, but suppose there was another officer of the same local union, or another national officer, that either could not or would not sign such an affidavit that precluded the possibility of me carrying on my daily business?

Mr. TICHY. Only insofar as going before the National Labor Relations Board was concerned, and that situation——

Mr. BURKE. Is that not one of the bits of machinery by which we do our business?

Mr. TICHY. It is, however—to continue in response to your earlier question—that same situation developed, I understand, in many unions, but in that manner they were able to tag the individuals, with the result they were cleared out and eliminated from the leadership in the organization, and the result was that the union was then cleared in its entirety so they could use the act and, I think, that is why this sanction is important, as Mr. Curren stated earlier, in that it lets the people, the membership, know who the individuals are, and the membership in turn can act to clear them out so that the organization can function in the maximum interests of all involved.

Mr. BURKE. Have there not been many cases where the individual labor official so resented it——

Mr. BAILEY. You have 1 minute.

Mr. BURKE. So resented the presumption that even though he could have signed without any possibility of danger of being charged with perjury, but would not, because he was conscientiously opposed to that presumption of guilt?

Mr. TICHY. That may be true, but there must be just a few examples because, I believe, last night's paper said something like sixty-five or seventy-five thousand union officials had signed the non-Communist affidavit. So there are a lot of them signing it.

Mr. BURKE. That is right, and you know the reason they signed it. The reason I signed it was because I felt the people I represented should not be without the benefits of whatever efforts and bits of machinery the Government had provided under the terms of the Labor-Management Relations Act, simply because I did not, as an individual, like the idea of a presumption of guilt.

That is all, Mr. Chairman. My time is up.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. McConnell?

I believe Mr. Irving has no questions at this time, so Mr. McConnell will take over.

Mr. MCCONNELL. The real objective in the field of labor-management relationship should be industrial peace; is that not correct?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Will H. R. 2032 in your judgment, as it is written, bring about or fulfill that purpose?

Mr. TICHY. No, sir; I do not believe that it would.

Mr. MCCONNELL. In other words, if H. R. 2032 were enacted as it is now written, you would have more strife between labor and management than you have had under the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. TICHY. I am inclined to believe that that is correct.

Mr. MCCONNELL. Let us consider the national emergency strike section. You are an attorney, I believe; is that right?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct, Mr. McConnell.

Mr. McConnell. Do you believe that the President has the inherent power to compel the parties to observe the 30-day status quo that they mention in the bill?

Mr. Tichy. I question very seriously that he would. If you will permit, I attempted to cover that in my major statement, in one paragraph on that subject, and this is what I have stated:

> Much has been said of the President's alleged inherent power under such circumstances as constitutes a national emergency. We do not agree that such an inherent power exists, and if it did, we have real cause for alarm and can only wonder through what other political gymnastics greater dictatorial power can be confined in one individual.

Mr. McConnell. In other words, as it is written now in the bill, and assuming that the President has inherent power, it would be a real danger to the freedom of America to allow such a procedure; is that correct?

Mr. Tichy. Yes: that is correct. I certainly do not believe the framers of the Constitution ever had any intention of creating in the President a king or dictator, which would appear to me to be the next step in this inherent power stuff.

Mr. McConnell. That is all.

Mr. Bailey. Mr. Nixon?

Mr. Nixon. Mr. Tichy, I was unavoidably absent during some of the questioning, and I was wondering if you had been examined on the point you made in your statement concerning the liability of unions for suit at the present time, as compared with the period before the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. Tichy. No; no questioning has taken place on that phase, as yet.

Mr. Nixon. On that point, I note in your statement you say from your own experience that you know that that section has been effective.

During the questioning of witnesses for the past few days there has been considerable disagreement on that point, and some of the members of the committee have suggested that the provision which makes unions liable for suit really is a misleading provision, because, as a matter of fact, unions were already liable for suit before the act was passed. I think I am aware of some of the ramifications of that problem and some of the difficulties that were involved in suing unions before the act was passed, but I wonder if you have any comment on that point from a legal standpoint, so we can find out whether or not this section can be stricken from the law at the present time.

As you of course recognize the new bill does not have a provision which specifically makes unions liable for their actions?

Mr. Tichy. That is correct, Congressman.

For the first point, it is important that we recognize that, I would say, at least 90 percent of the people who have to work with this law are not lawyers; they are laymen. The result is they are not expected to know what the law is. They have to have an act before them which they can understand and be able to live with. Although it is true that under the common law you could sue a labor organization as an unincorporated association, there were many practical difficulties, in that you would have to name every member of the union and have to serve them, and go through many complicated situations which were not conducive to such suits.

Secondly, I do not believe employers are desirous of suing unions. As a matter of fact, we have had no suits against unions, to my knowledge, in our territory. However, the very fact that this act came out and spelled this clearly so that the layman, the labor leaders, as well as the laymen, and management representatives, could see they were subjected to the potential of a lawsuit, and that brought about a certain care and caution and responsibility in the conduct in their relations. I had in mind at the time I was preparing this oral statement of at least two situations that occurred just shortly before the Taft-Hartley Act, the Labor-Management Relations Act, and in which both situations a strike had been called clearly in contravention of contract, and the union leaders, at later dates, after the thing was settled, indicated, "You might be able to sue us, but it might be so complicated it would not be practical."

In other words, they recognized that, with the net result that since the passage of the act we have had no such thing develop, because they can read it in the act, and it is sepelled out, and they, therefore, exercise more caution in what they do under the contract.

Mr. NIXON. It is true under the act, as it is presently written, that it limits the liability to union funds. It does not allow the person suing to reach the individual funds of the members of the union?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct.

Mr. NIXON. Speaking of the practical possibility, is it not a fact that a great majority of unions prior to the Taft-Hartley Act were unincorporated associations?

Mr. TICHY. I believe that is absolutely correct.

Mr. NIXON. And speaking again of the practical problems involved, the difficulty of suing an unincorporated association, and of serving every individual member of that unincorporated association, unless a specific State statute provided for service on an officer, it would place impossible barriers in the way of effective action against the union?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct.

Mr. NIXON. So your point is the present law, if it is as has been indicated simply an extension of the common law, the present law, at least has the effect of making both parties equally responsible for their contracts?

Mr. TICHY. That is correct.

Mr. NIXON. Referring to the discussion of the anti-Communist affidavit which occurred during the previous questioning, is it not a fact that probably the major effect of the affidavit on the credit side has been that through the affidavit those people in unions who were Communists have been spotlighted so that the union members themselves could take necessary action to remove them from power?

Mr. TICHY. Absolutely.

Mr. NIXON. As a matter of fact, the failure of the union officers to sign the affidavit has had no effect upon them from a criminal standpoint, as we know; but once those officers have been spotlighted—and I think you have given to us three examples in your statement here—the union members themselves have proceeded in their elections to remove them from power, which is an indication that throughout the labor movement the only difficulty in the past, and the only reason why Communists have been able to get power is that they have come in with their usual technique of subterfuge under false colors, and the Taft-Hartley Act has used an affidavit for the purpose of spotlighting these individuals, so that the members of the union could take the necessary action to remove them?

Mr. TICHY. I concur.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman yield to the Chair?

Mr. NIXON. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you not think that the requirement for taking the oath either from labor or from management is somewhat futile in that it opens an opportunity for someone who has designs on the Government to deliberately take the oath and hide behind it?

Mr. NIXON. Do you want me to answer the question?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. NIXON. I will say the non-Communist affidavit in the Taft-Hartley Act, any legislation which this Congress or State might pass, will never be foolproof or completely effective in meeting the Communist situation. I will also say simply because a law cannot be perfect is no reason to refuse to legislate in the field—and I realize the gentleman will disagree with me, and I am sure he will honestly disagree with me—I think by the same token you must recognize that the effect of the non-Communist affidavit requirement of the Taft-Hartley Act has been, at least in some unions and in some instances, to pin-point those officers of unions who were Communists, and that where that has occurred union members have for the first time had an argument which they could use, a legitimate argument, for removing those people from power. I think that in this field we must recognize the primary difficulty is in exposing the people who actually are members of the Communist party. The primary difficulty is not in finding these people guilty of crimes because, generally, they are not so foolish as to violate the law in a way that they would be caught; but once the people are exposed I have the greatest confidence in labor unions and the American public that they will take care of it at the ballot box, whether at a union election or national or State election.

It may be that there are arguments against the affidavit which can be made, but I say that before this Congress removes the non-Communist affidavit provisions from the act, this Congress should find a substitute for it which will be as effective as the non-Communist affidavit provision in removing officers who are Communists from positions of power in labor unions. I say that for two reasons: One, because the national security is involved. The technique of Communists throughout the world, and particularly in the United States at the present time, is to get control of key unions. They reached tremendous power a few years ago. Their power is now, I think, very fortunately on the way down. I think the non-Communist affidavit has contributed to that, and I think the national security requires that this Congress take some action at least to retain a provision of a law which will be of assistance in accomplishing that purpose.

And the second reason I think this Congress must take that action is in the interest of the unions themselves, because—and I think the gentleman will agree with me, coming as he does from the State of West Virginia, and from the coal section of that State—the real union leaders, themselves, throughout the country now recognize that once a Communist gets into a position of power in a union that the interests of the men are subordinated to the interests of the Communist Party.

Mr. BAILEY. As a member of the Un-American Activities Committee, does your committee have any recommendations to make to the Department of Justice as to the administration or enactment of legislation that would require this oath from the public generally?

Mr. NIXON. I think our committee would recommend, as we did recommend last year, retaining the non-Communist affidavit oath for union officers, and in order to get the proper balance, requiring it also for employers.

Your question is whether or not all the people in the country, the 140,000,000 people, should be required to take the non-Communist oath, and the answer to that, of course, is a simple one.

In the law we always have the problem of legislating to remove certain evils. Everybody in this country is a potential, shall we say, thief. In other words, a person's economic circumstances might conceivably force every one of us at some time into a position where we might potentially want to rob somebody else, but we do not by that token pass a law which would have the effect of placing everybody in the country in that category. We pass the law which will first punish those who are thieves, once they commit an act, and also we pass laws which have the effect of, as much as possible, preventing the commission of such actions, but we have to legislate for the specific danger, and in this case I think that is what we have attempted to do. We may have made a mistake, and I think if we have, I think you gentlemen on that side who are opposed, should offer an alternative, and I would be glad to consider it.

I say there is a danger from having Communists in power in labor unions, and it is a danger which has been proved from experience in other countries, and in this country. And if we are going to delete this provision I think we should bring out another provision.

Mr. JACOBS. Will you yield?

Mr. NIXON. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I might suggest that I have in mind something that would be effective as to Communist labor unions, and that is the provision of the election of officers. I do not think there is anything that would drive Communists out any quicker than good, old-fashioned democracy.

Mr. NIXON. I think we should discuss that in executive session, if we are allowed to do that. Maybe they will follow a different rule in the House than they did in the Senate.

Mr. JACOBS. I might comment further and say that I suggested such legislation in the Seventy-ninth Congress, and I also communicated with the chairman of this committee that passed the Taft-Hartley law, and I never received an answer until 7 months after the Taft-Hartley Act was passed.

Mr. NIXON. I will be glad to work with the gentleman in trying to work out the administration bill which, I agree with the gentleman, is inadequate and must be revised extensively.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Tichy, I was very interested in Mr. Jacobs' remarks because I myself am trying to work out a bill to force the election of union officials, and I believe that it is one of the most fundamental things facing us in our labor disputes. After all is said and done, our country is criticized because of the voting power, and today we have not all unions but many of the powerful unions and the locals who have men in office that members cannot cast secret ballots to elect. I think that is fundamental to the thing we have been discussing. If a man of communistic teachings arrives at a labor leadership spot, then even the men themselves, who we must ask to protect our industry and our country and our activity, cannot remove them. That is admitted here by both sides of the committee, and having been admitted by both sides of the committee that that is the condition, and inasmuch as we know the communistic teaching is for the sabotage of industry and for the falsification of our oaths in court, do you not think that it is one of the most beneficial instruments that the individual workingman of the union has, if we require his leadership to sign a non-Communist oath?

Mr. TICHY. I concur.

Mr. WERDEL. In other words, if a union member has a man leading his union and creating difficulties, and he knows that that man is following the communistic pattern, to try to increase the membership of the Communist Party, and if he knows that that man has signed a false affidavit, then he has some advantage in securing his removal; more so than if we take it out of the act, is that not true?

Mr. TICHY. I agree absolutely.

Mr. WERDEL. If we affirm, or rather, admit—as we have to I think—that our country and our system of justice is based upon a man taking an oath that he will tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, and we know that we have men infiltrated in our business and in our Government who are following and believing sincerely in a philosophy which teaches that the thing to do is to take that oath and then go ahead and say what you want to, under those circumstances, do you see any difference as a matter of Government, in asking the man when he goes into court, whether he is a citizen, a clergyman, a labor-union man, or whatever he is, to tell the truth, the whole truth and nothing but the truth, or to have him say under oath he is not a member of such an organization? Is there any difference?

Mr. TICHY. I am afraid I may have lost your question there, Mr. Congressman. Do you mind restating it?

Mr. WERDEL. I will rephrase it.

In the last 2 weeks we have had Thorez in France announce ahead of time that he was going to be a traitor.

Togliatti announced the same thing, about the same time, that he would lead his followers to treason in Italy.

And Pollit in England, head of the Communist Party, at almost the same hour, said the same words, and they probably came from the same source, and under instructions, he said he was going to lead the invaders to overthrow his country in England, and he also went so far as to give the instructions of sabotage.

Whether we are labor unions or are sitting at this bench, or wherever we are, is there any place in your mind where there can be a distinction upon an argument for good government in requiring a man to take an oath that he does not belong to such organizations, when he is in leadership and is taking the oath, or if he is given the oath in court?

Mr. TICHY. I see no difference at all.

Mr. WERDEL. I have been trying to find someone who could demonstrate the difference, and as yet I have not found one. I can understand why some labor leaders follow an opposition that has grown against the non-Communist affidavit. That opposition is stimulated by groups because of the seriousness with which it limits their subversive activities. I can understand why some men who could not follow their philosophy can still be following this approach against the non-Communist affidavit. I have yet to see a man who can state the difference. Our President says we are in the middle of a cold war, yet our original interpretation of the provisions as to treason in our Constitution have been that statements which are going to aid an enemy in the future are not treason. Those statements that were made last week by Mr. Foster are not treason under our law.

One other thing I want to ask you. Do you think ——

Mr. TICHY. Mr. Congressman, may I intercede for just a moment? I think Mr. Curren would like to speak as to your last statement, if it would be agreeable.

Mr. WERDEL. Yes.

Mr. CURREN. On the same line of thought you just expressed, Mr. Congressman, I think the best single example we have in the entire country took place right here in Washington just a short while ago when our present Chief Executive, President Truman, had to take the oath of office that he would defend the Constitution of the United States. I do not think the oath of office challenged the integrity of the Chief Executive when he was required to take it. I think that is the best example we have, that the Chief Executive must take the oath.

Mr. WERDEL. Then you agree, do you not, that the men who control the unions of our country should be under an oath that they are not Communists, particularly when they are holding nonelective offices in captive unions, so that the membership will know and have one legal approach, until we assure their election by secret ballot?

Mr. CURREN. Very definitely. A similar statement was made by Mr. Philip Murray in Portland, Oreg., at the international convention of the CIO in December of 1948.

Mr. WERDEL. Along that same line, until we have control of the election of union officials in the hands of the men they represent—and I mean by that a guaranteed secret ballot—until we have that, do you not think it would be foolhardy for us to remove the provision of the Taft-Hartley Act giving the employees a right to vote as to whether or not they will accept the employers' last offer before strikes are called?

Mr. CURREN. I agree with that.

Mr. WERDEL. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Velde?

M. VELDE. I have no questions.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, gentlemen.

Mr. TICHY. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, we wish to express our sincere appreciation for the privilege of being heard by this committee.

Thank you very much.

(The several statements referred to by Mr. Tichy and Mr. Curren are as follows:)

STATEMENT OF GEORGE J. TICHY ON BEHALF OF THE NATIONAL LUMBER MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION AND OTHERS IN OPPOSITION TO H. R. 2032

My name is George J. Tichy. I am the manager and attorney of the Timber Products Manufacturers Association, whose offices are located at Spokane, Wash., and which is an industrial relations association representing timber products producers in eastern Washington, Idaho, and Montana.

I appear here in behalf of the National Lumber Manufacturers Association. I am also representing Timber Products Manufacturers' Association, Spokane, Wash.; Plywood and Door Industrial Relations Committee, Tacoma, Wash.; Industrial Conference Board, Tacoma, Wash.; and the Washington Employers, Inc., Seattle, Wash. I am informed that these various groups asked to testify before your committee but were not granted time. These organizations, exclusive of the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, represent more than a thousand employers employing at least 35,000 employees.

As an introduction to this subject, let us first make the following observations: (1) Every statute has its origin in the needs of that group which the law affects; (2) no statute, however well intentioned, will meet with the positive approval of everyone. All law, just from its very nature, will meet with the disapproval of some. Why? Law is our civilized method of governing the relations between peoples, groups, and the other components of society. Therefore, those who are controlled are going to be offended. In addition, it should be noted that any law is a composition of words and generally covers a variation of possibilities. The language in itself will frequently be crude or awkward and will not meet with the satisfaction of those who must live with the law.

In analyzing H. R. 2032 we must first look to our present labor legislation, the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, sometimes referred to as the Taft-Hartley Act. The foregoing observations are important in this connection.

In passing, as a spokesman for management in my everyday occupation, it would seem that I should be opposed to the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 just as much as many of the labor union leaders, because that law controls management equally with unions and union leaders. Let me make it clear that as any other law, this law is not perfect. However, in the field of labor relations as in any other field, the paramount interest must be that of the public and not that of any group. I firmly believe that a careful impartial analysis of that law will reveal that Congress basically intended to equalize the responsibilities of unions and employers, first in the interest of the public and secondly in the interest of the individual employee.

In the original passage of the National Labor Relations Act, more commonly referred to as the Wagner Act, Congress found (sec. 1, par. 3) that "Experience has proven that protection by law of the right of employees to organize and bargain collectively safeguards commerce from injury, impairment, or interruption, and promotes the flow of commerce by removing certain recognized sources of industrial strife and unrest, by encouraging practices fundamental to the friendly adjustment of industrial disputes arising out of differences as to wages, hours, or other working conditions, and by restoring equality of bargaining power between employers and employees."

The result was that Congress placed certain sanctions on management. In essence these controls were:

(a) Employees had the right to organize and to bargain collectively through their selected representatives.

(b) It was made an unfair labor practice for an employer:

(1) To interfere with, restrain or coerce employees in the exercise of that right;

(2) To dominate or interfere with the formation or administration of any labor organization or contribute financial or other support to it;

(3) To discriminate in any such manner as to encourage or discourage membership in a labor union;

(4) To discriminate against anyone filing charges against the employer; and

(5) To refuse to bargain collectively with the representatives of the employees.

(c) The union selected by a majority in an appropriate working unit were to be exclusive representatives of all of the employees in that unit.

(d) A board, known as the National Labor Relations Board, was established to investigate, try and decide complaints under this act. This Board was also empowered to prevent any person from engaging in an unfair labor practice.

(c) Procedures were established in order that the law could function.

Essentially that is the Wagner Act. Note that unions and union leaders were not controlled. All controls were on employers. In addition, observe that at the time of the passage of the Wagner Act, the following social, political, and economic factors prevailed:

(1) There were no huge labor monopolies as we know them today. Therefore, there was no foreseeable need for their control.

(2) The threat of communism to our political and economic structure was at a low ebb.

(3) We did not have such crippling strikes as thwarted the normal functions of large cities and even whole sections of the country.

(4) There were no labor barons capable of the direction of the Nation's economy as we have today.

(5) There was not the highly organized and integrated union structure that resulted in the Political Action Committee and the Labor's League for Political Education, with influence far beyond their numerical strength.

For the 12 years that followed the passage of that act we find that those things were to come about and suddenly, by 1946, we were brought face to face with the fact that a group had risen within our Nation even more powerful than the J. P. Morgans and John D. Rockfellers of the late 1800's and early 1900's.

Under the Wagner Act labor unions gained about 10,000,000 members.

Just as through the years we have come to accept corporations, associations and other business as a part of our society, we have also come to accept labor unions as a part of our society. There is nothing inherently bad in either; however, either may form the vehicle for the ruthless to prey upon members of its own group and, most important, the public.

In 1946 we saw a total of 4,600,000 employees out of work by reason of strikes crippling our Nation and its economy. There was a loss of 116,000,000 man-days of labor in a total of 4,985 work stoppages. We saw unnecessary jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts resulting in hoards of employees called out by labor barons to support strike issues that did not affect those employees. We saw the severe effect that John L. Lewis and the United Mineworkers had on the Nation's economy with his control of the coal industry. We have seen the control of any number of other labor leaders and unions over entire cities such as the recent complete tie-ups in New York City; the Oakland, Calif., area in 1946, and elsewhere. Human memory cannot be so frail as to ignore these unpleasant facts which have happened only yesterday.

In what manner did the Labor-Management Relations Act seek to correct these social, political, and economic inequities?

First, Congress retained in the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, as to the need for protection of employees, their finding contained in the Wagner Act, which I have already quoted, and further stated:

"Experience has further demonstrated that certain practices by some labor organizations, their officers, and members, have the intent or the necessary effect of burdening or obstructing commerce by preventing the free flow of goods in such commerce through strikes and other forms of industrial unrest or through concerted activities which impair the interest of the public in the free flow of such commerce. The elimination of such practices is a necessary condition to the assurance of the rights herein guaranteed."

Second, the essentials of the Wagner Act, that is, the controls on employers, were retained in the Labor-Management Relations Act.

Third, the Labor-Management Relations Act sought to regulate unions and union leaders, as well as industry and industry leaders, by providing that they should not commit the following unfair labor practices:

(1) To restrain or coerce employees in their rights to organize or refrain from organization;

(2) To restrain or coerce an employer in the selection of his collective-bargaining representatives;

(3) To cause or attempt to cause an employer to discriminate against an employee who had been denied membership or has had membership terminated by the union for reasons other than failure to pay periodic dues and initiation fees required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

(4) To refuse to bargain collectively with an employer;

(5) To engage in concerted action where the purpose is:

(a) To force or require an employer or a self-employed person to join a union or an employer organization;

(b) To force any person to cease dealing in the products of any other producer, processor, or manufacturer or to cease doing business with another;

(c) To force an employer other than the one being struck to recognize or bargain with a union previously certified as the collective-bargaining agent of the employees by the NLRB.

(d) To force or require an employer to recognize or bargain with another union where one has already been certified by the NLRB as the bargaining agent of the employees;

(e) To force or require any employer to assign particular work to employees in a particular union rather than to employees of another union;

(f) To require an excessive or discriminatory initiation fee of new members in the union after the union has a union shop type of agreement; and

(g) To cause an employer to pay for services which are not performed or not to be performed, that is featherbedding.

These unfair labor practices which unions and union leaders are directed not to commit under possible penalties do no more than to curtail abuses which have hurt the public and its own members.

The Labor-Management Relations Act permits either unions or employers to express any view, argument, or opinion so long as such expression contains no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit. This is the free-speech provision to which employers and unions alike are entitled. It seems ridiculous that such a provision should be necessary in view of our own Bill of Rights; however, National Labor Relations Board decisions under the Wagner Act necessitated a clear enunciation of these rights.

The Labor-Management Relations Act gives to employees the right to organize or to refrain from engaging in such activities. If the right to organize is to be protected the right to refrain should also be protected.

The Labor-Management Relations Act defines collective bargaining as the mutual obligation of employer and union to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith with respect to wages, hours, and working conditions. It requires that either party to a collective-bargaining agreement must give a 60-day written notice to the other of any desire to terminate or modify an agreement. Thirty days after giving such a notice, the moving party must also advise the Federal and State mediation agencies of the status of the matter. The working agreement must remain in force for those 60 days, and economic action is forbidden. Thus a minimum period of 60 days is assured in which to resolve the issues that may arise from bargaining. Under the Wagner Act, only the employer was required to bargain in good faith and could and was subject to almost every unreasonable abuse by unions without any legal sanctions upon unions for this action. The requirements established are reasonable, in the public interest, and do not unduly inconvenience either the employer or the union. An unfair union should not be permitted to operate without limitations; a sincere union should not want to.

The Labor-Management Relations Act also provides that only one representation election shall be held within a 12-month period. Thus security and stability is assured to the collective-bargaining relationship in its initial stages.

Specific controls on unions and union leadership were established. For one thing, each officer is required to sign an affidavit that "he is not a member of the Communist Party or affiliated with such party, and that he does not believe in and is not a member of or supports any organization that believes in or teaches the overthrow of the United States Government by force or by any illegal or unconstitutional methods" (Labor-Management Relations Act, sec. 9 (h)).

This provision has received much criticism by union leaders. However, the vast majority of them have signed these affidavits. What harm has been done those who have signed those affidavits? The answer is: No harm has come to them and they have been a credit to their country, their union and to themselves. What harm has come to those who have not signed those affidavits? They and their union are deprived of their rights under the law. This sanction is necessary to bring clearly to the attention of the membership of that union the failure of their officers to file such an affidavit. Some have criticized this requirement as an insult to the citizenship and integrity of union leadership. In facing the current problem of totalitarianism against democracy, it would appear that each would be pleased for pride in his country to stand up and be counted.

We recognize communism acknowledges that its success is bred in strife and dissatisfaction and we know that they have found a fertile field in unionism. Unions form two facets for their dogma. First, unionism is an attempt by working peoples to improve their status. The dissatisfaction giving rise to the desire for unionization is a fertile field for Communist propaganda. Second, to control the working force is to control our economy, our Nation and our citizens. Let us assume without accusing for the purpose of illustrating our point, that the longshore unions are dominated by Communist leadership or their sympathizers. We know from past experience that those unions are capable of very effectively shutting our Pacific ports from all shipping. A transit union can stall our largest city to inaction within a few short hours. There are many other examples.

We know that Communists have infiltrated unions and we know that many unions, although giving lip service in bylaws forbidding membership by Communists, nevertheless have been unable to voluntarily rid themselves of them. Here the members have been given an assist in their problem by this law, yet their leadership clamors for repeal of this provision as un-American. Let us look to what one large union in the Pacific Northwest has said in response to the rumors that their union was run by Communists:

"Furthermore, the Taft-Hartley Act has certainly cleared that issue up as far as our organization is concerned. All of the international officers, many of the district officers, and a great majority of our local union officers have signed noncommunistic affidavits. The law is quite strict, and any officer certainly would not take a chance on perjuring himself in an affidavit turned over to the Government. However, there might be Communists from time to time slip into our organization because it is the aim of the Communist Party to work through labor organizations where they can get control."

Another large international union has been quoted as stating that they favor retention of this affidavit requirement and believe in its expansion to include representatives of employers. In this opinion I concur, and I shall feel no insult, but only pride, to be able to sign such an affidavit when the occasion arises. I am sure that all other representatives of employers in the lumber manufacturing industry will also be willing to sign such an affidavit. Those who give lip service to their patriotism and simultaneously desire repeal of this feature of the law are blundering into the net of the Communist and make a very effective front for the Communist cause. Frankly, I cannot see why there is so much furor over this issue. Hundreds of union, employer, and public representatives on the War Labor Board and its various committees and commissions signed an equivalent affidavit, and no objection was ever raised to my knowledge.

To answer those who say the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, requires unions to accept Communists as members, we note that the act does not forbid a union to make its own rules relative to the acquisition and retention of membership in the union.

Another provision of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, that has received severe criticism is the power of the Board to obtain temporary injunctions. This should be studied carefully, as you will find:

First: The Board must first issue a complaint that someone is engaging in an unfair labor practice. This is only done after a change has been filed and a thorough investigation conducted by the Boarl. This is time-consuming and not conducive to hasty or ill-advised action.

Second: Such an injunction may be obtained against an employer as well as a union.

Third: The injunction cannot be granted until the party against whom it is sought receives notice of the proposal to seek the injunction; and Finally, this provision is intended only for emergency use by the NLRB. It should be observed that in the first year of this law that, in unfair labor practice cases, under section 10 (j), injunctions were sought by the Board in only four instances—twice against employers, namely, General Motors Corp., in the case of a group-insurance plan, and Boeing Airplane Co., in compelling that company to bargain with a union; and twice against unions, namely, the Mineworkers Union and the Typographical Union. In every case the basis was in effect the refusal of either the union or the company to bargain collectively with the other in contravention of the law.

Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, labor leaders are no longer permitted to withhold from their membership at least an annual audit of the funds of the organization if that union is to have the protection of the law. The act requires that each union "furnish to its members annually financial reports" setting forth receipts and disbursements, including the purposes for which disbursements have been made. As employers, we have no concern with this, but it seems to me that employees who are members of a union have a right to this protection against racketeering, and I think the Government has an obligation to furnish such protection.

Employees are free under the Labor-Management Relations Act to seek an impartial, federally conducted, secret-ballot election to get rid of a union if they so desire. This is a right that they did not have under the Wagner Act. Statistics show that in over half of such elections the employees have eliminated the unions claiming to represent them. Without this statutory protection, those same employees would probably still be saddled with an unsatisfactory union, one which in reality did not represent their interests.

The right has been given to the employees to determine whether or not they wish to make membership in a union a condition of employment. You will read much, particularly in union publications, of the overwhelming number of elections in which the union has been successful, and by large margins. Even so, does it excuse such a requirement in those few plants where the employees have voted overwhelmingly in opposition to such a requirement? Furthermore, nothing is known of the wishes of those who are members of unions in which their leadership refuses to sign anti-Communist affidavits. If given the opportunity, how would they vote? Furthermore, it is left to the discretion of the union whether it will request an election, and I think you will agree that such elections are generally not requested when the outcome is in doubt. Finally, it should be noted that the largest percentage of the elections that have taken place thus far have been by unions which have had union-security clauses for years, and, therefore, it was anticipated that in such cases the unions would succeed. Would you give up your right to vote as a citizen of these United States simply because one political party has been successful in the last 7 out of 8 national elections?

Under the Wagner Act, the National Labor Relations Board in effect acted as investigator, prosecutor, and judge in any matter before it. History has long ago taught us that such a situation is not conducive to justice. The new law separated these functions so that those who shall judge the matter before the Board may not also be the prosecutors.

The Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service was separated from the Department of Labor and established as an independent agency. The Department of Labor as the spokesman for labor can hardly be expected to render fair and impartial efforts to unions and management alike. Title 5, section 611, of the United States Code provides specifically that: "The purpose of the Department of Labor shall be to foster, promote, and develop the welfare of the wage earners of the United States, to improve their working conditions, and to advance their opportunities for profitable employment." Only as an independent agency, not responsible to the Labor Department, can the Conciliation Service be impartial. It is just as logical to plan the Conciliation Service in the Commerce Department as to plan it under the Labor Department, and neither will satisfy unions and employers alike.

The rules of evidence to be used in proceedings before the Board were changed from those permitting uncontrolled hearsay evidence to those rules applicable to the district courts of the United States, adopted by the United States Supreme Court. These rules of evidence are based on years and centuries of experience by mankind in seeking to obtain an efficient judicial administration of the rights of peoples.

The Labor-Management Relations Act also provides a specific procedure to be pursued in the event of a national emergency created by a labor dispute. This procedure does not void the right to strike, but simply provides for certain steps to protect the public interest before that right may be exercised. The right to put this procedure in motion is reserved to the President. He has used it seven times and only once after the procedure was used in its fullest extent has a strike been called, and that was the recent longshore strike. As a matter of fact, the Labor-Management Relations Act specifically preserves the right to strike in the following language:

"SEC. 13. Nothing in this Act, except as specifically provided for herein, shall be construed so as either to interfere with or impede or diminish in any way the right to strike, or to affect the limitations or qualifications on that right."

It further provides in Section 502:

"Nothing in this Act shall be construed to require an individual employee to render labor or service without his consent, nor shall anything in this Act be construed to make the quitting of his labor by an individual employee an illegal act; nor shall any court issue any process to compel the performance by an individual employee of such labor or service, without his consent. * * *"

Much has been said of the President's alleged inherent power under such circumstances as constitutes a national emergency. We do not agree that such an inherent power exists, and if it did we have real cause for alarm and can only wonder through what other political gymnastics greater dictatorial power can be confined in one individual.

The Labor-Management Relations Act makes both unions and employers equally responsible under their collective-bargaining agreements and permits either to obtain redress from the other for violations of those agreements in Federal courts. This has not brought any flood of litigation upon the courts, but has made the parties to those agreements more cautious and responsible. The American people have been the beneficiaries.

Concerning the restriction placed by the Labor-Management Relations Act on unions, forbidding their making contributions or expenditures in connection with certain elections, let us note that the same prohibition applies to corporations. However, you hear little of this. It is our firm belief that a union should not be permitted to divert the regular monthly union dues of a union member to support a political party or candidate to whom he may be personally opposed; further, a union member should not be compelled to make special contributions for such purposes. It should be remembered that some union members are not voluntary members.

The Labor-Management Relations Act forbids strikes by Government employees. Recent strikes in the nations of Europe pointedly demonstrate the necessity and wisdom of such a provision. Although responsible democratically organized and operated labor unions have their place in our society, that place does not include the very lifeblood of the country which provides and protects their existence.

Secretary of Labor Tobin, in appearing before the Senate Labor Committee, stated that the right of the individual worker has been abridged. It is well for us to consider a few of the advantages that the individual employee has secured through the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

(1) When a majority of the individual members of a union feel that the union is not properly managing their affairs or representing them to their greatest benefit, they may, by following a prescribed procedure, dispense with the services of that union.

(2) If a union-shop-type agreement exists in an operation, the union is forbidden to charge unreasonable and discriminatory initiation fees.

(3) An individual is not required to join a union before accepting employment.

(4) Employees have an opportunity to vote by a federally conducted, secret-ballot election to determine whether or not they are to be required to belong to a union as a condition of employment.

(5) The employees may eliminate a "union shop" by secret ballot without fear of reprisal.

(6) An individual's union dues cannot be used for the purpose of supporting or defeating political candidates contrary to his personal preference.

(7) An individual employee who may be a member of a union by compulsion is free to take his grievances up directly with his employer subject to certain restrictions.

(8) Individual employees not only have the right to organize but the right to refrain from organization.

(9) Individual employees should no longer be deprived of the opportunity to work by reason of jurisdictional disputes or certain secondary boycotts.

Now let us see how much harm the Labor-Management Relations Act has done to unions. Labor Department statistics show that the normal growth in union membership nationally has not been retarded. Almost a million new members have been recruited by unions during the tenure of this act. Also, let us note that this law did not deter a third round of wage increases nationally. Furthermore, unions can strike and have struck as in the past.

What good has come to the public by reason of this law? After the terrible strike statistics which occurred in 1946 prior to the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act, in 1948 under this act there were 3,300 strikes or 33 percent less than in 1946; 1,950,000 workers were involved or 55 percent less than in 1946; and the number of man-days of idleness resulting from strikes in 1948 was 70 percent less than in 1946. There were only 34,000,000 man-days of idleness in 1948 as compared to 116,000,000 man-days of idleness resulting from strikes in 1946. No small amount of this reduction in labor strife is attributable to the Labor-Management Relations Act. Above all, both labor unions and employers are made responsible for their conduct.

Where is this so-called "slave labor" that was to be the lot of working people under this law? Look about you and you find none. Frankly, it would appear the only people who have to fear this labor law are ruthless labor leaders, Communists and fellow travelers. The working man has greater protection today than he has ever had. He is not only protected from the ruthless employer, but also from the ruthless in the labor movement. Finally, the public has secured its greatest protection from unnecessary, untimely and ill-bred labor turmoil.

Rather than going backward in labor relations by repealing the Labor-Management Relations Act, it would appear that there are some abuses which the present law does not cure, which this committee should seriously consider if it is going to legislate on this subject. Since the act specifically provides for an orderly method of determining whether or not a union properly represents a majority of the employees in an appropriate collective-bargaining unit, organizational strikes should be forbidden. For instance, neither under the Wagner Act nor the Labor-Management Relations Act is a union, defeated in a representative election, prevented from striking in order to obtain recognition by the employer or to compel the employees of that employer to accept the union as its bargaining agent, although in a free and unfettered election those same employees might vote against that union.

In essence, the Labor-Management Relations Act has brought stability, responsibility, care, and caution to the collective-bargaining table by unions and employers alike, not "confusion", as stated by the Secretary of Labor, Mr. Tobin. This, I testify to, not as a theoretical conclusion or from sitting a distance of 3,000 miles from the bargaining table, but from actual day-to-day experience at the bargaining table.

STATEMENT OF JOHN G. CURREN ON BEHALF OF NATIONAL LUMBER MANUFACTURERS ASSOCIATION AND OTHERS IN OPPOSITION TO H. R. 2032

Perhaps the most effective way in which to present my opinions on this subject is to give you below my analysis of the changes in the Federal labor law made by the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947.

DEFINITIONS

Supervisors.—Under the administration bill, employers must bargain with supervisors and cannot discriminate against them for union activity. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, supervisors are expressly excluded from the definition of the term "employee". This change has succeeded in removing supervisory personnel from the "fish and fowl" category to which they were relegated prior to the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. It eliminates the age-old situation of consulting and discussing matters of confidential company policy with the supervisory staff and then in the future bargaining with the supervisory personnel on the same issues. Thus, when they were administering company policies and acting in behalf of the company, they could be considered "fish"; at the later date, when full knowledge of the principles they were administering came up for discussion, they were on the other side of the fence as the "fowl" in the case. No class of employee can maintain his emotional, and mental stability in a logical and unprejudiced manner, in our opinion, if he is thrown into the position of representing at one time one side and at another time the other side.

Professional employees.—Under the administration bill, there is no provision pertaining to professional employees. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, professional employees are defined. This change is good in that it has eliminated some of the extremely aggravating and argumentative situations arising in trying to decide whether certain classes of employees were professional or not. It provides a basis of a written definition in making such determination.

Employer responsibility for actions of employees.—Under the administration bill, here is no provision pertaining to employer responsibility for the actions of supervisors or employees.

Under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the test of agency, in determining whether an employer is responsible for the actions and words of an employee or supervisor, is no longer controlled by whether the specific acts were authorized or ratified. This leaves the matter of employer responsibility for the actions and/or words of an employee or supervisor determined by the law of agency as established by the courts, a better criterion than making a determination based upon whether the employer was guilty of an act of omission in not specifically repudiating such actions, or inadvertently or apparently ratifying or authorizing such actions or words by either positive or negative action.

THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

NLRB.—Under the administration bill, a five-man Board continued but with power to prosecute as well as decide cases. General counsel abolished. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the Board was increased from three to five members. No particular advantage or disadvantage to the change, except that membership should be confined to a reasonable number to allow for greater unanimity of opinion and to stay away from a body too cumbersome to reach definite decisions without waste of time and argument. The judicial and prosecuting functions of the Board are separated, by placing authority for the administration of the former in the hands of the Board and the latter under the jurisdiction of the general counsel, to the extent that the general counsel is the final authority in respect to the investigation of charges and issuances of complaints. This is an excellent division of responsibility. It has worked to the advantage of both labor and management. Considering this move at the level of the regional offices, the regional director and regional attorney act independently of each other, insofar as their respective jurisdictions apply. It removed the possibility of any misplaced prejudices on the part of the regional director affecting the decisions of the regional attorney in unfair-labor-practice cases and allows for a better scheduling of cases. Despite the criticism of General Counsel Denham's actions in numerous instances and the "fire" he has had to withstand from both labor and management, he has done a splendid job in an extremely difficult position.

RIGHTS OF EMPLOYEES

Closed shop.—Under the administration bill, the closed shop is permitted. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the closed shop is outlawed. The United States Supreme Court has recently ruled that State anti-closed-shop laws are constitutional; therefore, this would seem to confirm the provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, regarding the outlawing of the closed shop. We believe that individual workers should be protected in their right to join or not to join a union—to remain or not to remain members—just as they individually wish and of their own free will.

Union shop.—Under the administration bill, the union shop is permitted without restriction; members can be fired for failing to keep membership in good standing. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, the union shop is valid only if the labor organization represents the employees and if a majority of the eligible employees has voted in a Board-conducted election to authorize such a provision. This amendment's principal consequence has been to provide an additional red-tape hurdle for the unions to clear and has impeded more prompt handling of other work by the Board, since it placed upon it the holding of thousands of such union-shop elections. The deficiency appears to be that, even though the union wins such a union-shop election, their victory does not make it mandatory upon management to grant a union-shop contract. Victory does not impose upon management the obligation to accede to a union-shop contract. On the contrary, the question of a union shop should be an appropriate subject for bona fide collective bargaining between management and labor. This required holding of a union-shop election has shown to be no more than "shadow boxing" and procrastination prior to settlement of the issue at hand.

An employee cannot be discharged at the request of the union under a union-shop contract (1) if the employer has reasonable grounds for believing that such membership was not available to the employee on the same terms and conditions generally applicable to the other members, or (2) if the employer has reasonable grounds for believing that the request for discharge was due to reasons other than nonpayment of dues or initiation fees. Since the meat of this provision is that an employee can be discharged under a union-shop clause only because of nonpayment of dues or fees, we believe, and it has so proved, that it is a protection to the individual employee from the wrath, whims, or petty personal prejudices of union leadership. As such, it strengthens our Federal labor law, instills confidence in the fairness of its provisions, and should be retained.

UNION UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICES

Union unfair labor practices.—Under the administration bill, there are no provisions protecting the employee or the employer from union unfair labor practices, except in regard to secondary boycott, in which the bill prohibits only strikes and secondary boycotts that would force employer to (1) bargain with a union in violation of the act or (2) assign work in violation of the terms of a certification; and jurisdictional disputes, in which the administration bill is similar to the present Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, except that the NLRB cannot get an injunction and it has the alternative of deciding the dispute itself or appointing an arbitrator to do so. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, it is an unfair labor practice for a union to—

(1) Coerce employees or an employer in his choice of representatives.

(2) Cause or attempt to cause an employer to violate subsection 8 (3) concerning the union-shop provision.

(3) Charge excessive initiation fees. The Board determines the question of excessiveness.

Two or these changes were made with the welfare of the employee at heart. The third (No. 2 above) rebelled against the past history of unions taking unfair advantage of the employer.

(4) Refuse to bargain in good faith with an employer. This change, together with the other three mentioned above, constitute nothing more than a "balancing of the scales" by making unions responsible and subject to unfair labor practices that management was subject to under the old Wagner Act. It is an equalization of the restrictions by making "what is good for the goose" also "good for the gander."

(5) Jurisdictional strikes and secondary boycotts are defined to be unfair labor practices. The Board is given the power to seek injunctions in Federal district court against such practices upon the issuance of complaints. The Board is also directed to conduct hearings and determine such disputes. The outstanding decision on this question is of recent date and was decided by Judge Wayne Borah, Eastern District of Louisiana, in the case entitled John F. LeBus, Regional Director, Fifteenth Region, NLRB, on behalf of NRLB, petitioner, v. Pacific Coast Marine Fireman Oilers, Watertenders & Wipers' Association and National Union of Marine Cooks & Stewards (CIO), respondents.

(6) Featherbedding practices would be unfair. These two changes have served an excellent purpose in that they are measures that have been successful in prohibiting unions from victimizing parties who are innocent and causing them to suffer losses or impairment of business in situations in which they are not directly involved—and over which they exercise no control—and provide an additional protection against the bodly abused practices of forcing employers to pay for work not performed.

Free speech.—Under the administration bill, there is no provision pertaining to free speech. Under the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, the "free speech" precedents established by the Board were clarified to the extent that employers no longer can be accused of an unfair labor practice because of expression of any views, regardless of whether written or oral, provided such expressions contain no threat of reprisal or force or promise of benefit. This has provided considerable relief to management, inasmuch as the unions, during their organizational campaigns, have always spoken freely to employees they were attempting to represent. Within my personal experience, some union organizers have had no respect for the truth, and in a veiled manner usually threatened them with loss of jobs unless they supported the union. This loosening of the free speech provision removed discrimination suffered by management who made a speech or posted a statement, which in itself was not coercive, but when taken with unfair-labor-practice charges and the two considered conjunctively was ruled to constitute an unfair-labor practice. Under the old law, neither an employer's speech nor actions, taken individually, might have been coercive, but the Board had the right to rule that taken together they were. Now each action stands on its own. This gives the employer the chance to correct misstatements and misrepresentations, to deny charges and allegations, to make explanations, and follow the democratic principle of allowing the employee to hear both sides.

COLLECTIVE BARGAINING AND TERMINATION OF CONTRACTS

Collective bargaining—Termination or modification of contracts.—Under the administration bill employers and unions must notify N. S. Conciliation Service of contract termination or modification at least 30 days prior to (1) contract expiration date or (2) the time it is proposed to make the termination or modification, whichever is earlier.

Under the L. M. R. A. of 1947, "to bargain collectively" means the performance of the mutual obligation of both parties to meet at reasonable times and confer in good faith concerning wages, hours of work, etc., and to embody any agreement into a written contract. It was intended to mean not necessarily that the employer must make any concessions as long as he bargained in good faith and did not resort to subterfuge; this has resulted in a diminishing of charges by unions of company failure to bargain in good faith, on the premise that they did not agree to accede to one or more of the union's requests. Such a premise placed the employer always in the position of having to give in on some point, whether justified or not, solely for the purpose of protecting himself against a charge of failure to bargain collectively or in good faith.

Bargaining collectively also provides a procedure in which either of the parties—as contrasted to the past situation in which only the union could take the action—may terminate or modify the contract by: (a) Serving written notice of termination or modification 60 days prior to the termination or modification; (b) offering to meet and confer with the other party for the purpose of negotiating a new agreement; (c) notifying the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service of the existence of a dispute within 30 days after the 60-day notice of termination or modification, and simultaneously therewith also giving notice to any State mediation agency; (d) continuing in full force and effect, without resorting to strike or lock-out, the existing contract for 60 days after notice is given of termination or modification. Until this procedure was written into law, the only manner in which the employer could test the majority status of the bargaining representative was by first submitting himself to a charge of unfair labor practice of refusal to bargain by refusing to meet with the union. The Board then investigated the charge and based upon that investigation could either direct the company to bargain collectively or direct the conduct of another election if the majority status of the union was in doubt—which occurred only in rare instances.

This change also provides that such modification or termination procedure is applicable only at the time contracts can be reopened under the terms of the agreement. It specifies that any employee who strikes during the 60-day notification period loses his status as an employee, which makes for considerably less strife, turmoil, and work stoppages and tends to stabilize working conditions and production of goods for the public welfare.

REPRESENTATION PROCEDURE AND ELECTIONS

Employer election petitions.—Under the administration bill there is no provision pertaining to employers asking for an election of representatives if the union claims recognition.

Under the L. M. R. A., 1947, an employer can file a petition with the Board for a representation election once the union makes a claim upon the employer that it represents a majority of his employees. Before, only unions or employees could file representation petitions after the employer had refused to recognize their claim. If the union or the employees chose not to file a petition the matter was left dangling, which created dissatisfaction among some of the workers, cause the organizational campaign to be strung out, and always affected the efficiency of the workers, decreased normal production and unnecessarily delayed the determination of the issue at hand. Now, if the union or the employees do not file a petition after being denied recognition by the employer, the employer has an opportunity to have an unsettled question decided by petitioning the Board for a representation election. This has eliminated a great deal of strife that occurred when recognition is denied and the union or the employees fail to file a petition. Only one valid election on a year can be held, except where there is necessity for a run-off election. Once a year is often enough to subject an employer to a representation election and eliminates a rival union from picking up where a defeated union left off.

A further protection and upholding of employees' rights is found in the change which allows 30 percent of the employees to file a petition with the Board to hold an election for the purpose of decertifying an incumbent union. It provides an opportunity for employees to either change union affiliation or dispense with it entirely if they feel they are not satisfied with the organization that represents them.

While the union is still the exclusive representative for all employees in a given unit, individuals may present their grievances personally, rather than through the union, provided the bargaining representatives are given an opportunity to be present. This gives more protection to an employee in a given unit who may not belong to the union and is thus given the chance to argue in his own behalf if he finds that his not belonging creates an attitude on the union's part of not giving to his grievance the consideration it deserves.

Plant guards.—Under the administration bill, plant guards, like professional employees, are not included in any of its provisions.

Under the L. M. R. A., 1947, plant guards and watchmen can be recognized as a group of guards, or watchmen provided they are not affiliated either directly or indirectly with a labor organization that admits rank-and-file employees. This is as it should be. In cases of strikes by rank-and-file employees, the plant guards could come in for protection and insurance purposes. In many instances in which a plant is struck the town may draw its power from the plant and some provision should be made for the continuance of such utilities for the benefit of the public welfare. To do this it is necessary that guards should be available for normal duty.

Filing requirements.—Under the administration bill, filing requirements with respect to financial and other information with the Department of Labor and non-Communist affidavits with NLRB, are omitted.

Under the L. M. R. A., 1947, no petition or charge filed by a labor union can be investigated unless the union shall have filed with the Secretary of Labor, a financial report and a report showing its name, address, names of three principal officers and compensation of all persons receiving more than $5,000, amount of initiation fees and dues, and a copy of its constitution and bylaws. This is another protection for the individual employees. It at least assures union members that if their bargaining representatives are determined to avail themselves of the facilities of the Board, they will be provided with an accounting of the financial status of the union, which is a matter over which many union members have complained loud and long in the past. This is as it should be. The filing of anti-Communist affidavits is something that there has been need for a long time. However, management should have been required to sign a similar anti-Communist affidavit. If we are going to ask for a 50–50 break on other clauses in a law, we should not only agree, but sponsor an equal break in all clauses. We fully realize that the need of ridding the Communist influence in unions was brought about by testimony of high ranking union officials including Philip Murray, William Green, and John L. Lewis, and not on the testimony of management. This provision has been successful in accomplishing the end for which it was written. But we believe there should be separate legislation dealing with the Communist problem in general, and not included in the Labor Management Relations Act, if it is to affect labor alone. If the anti-Communist pledge is to affect labor and management then it should be included in a labor act. There is a case pending before the United States Supreme Court and on the docket for February, testing the anti-Communist affidavit and in our opinion it will be declared unconstitutional for the reason that the act affects two parties—labor and management—and only one party—labor—is required to file the affidavit.

UNFAIR LABOR PRACTICE PROCEDURE

Statute of limitation.—Under the administration bill there is no time limitation on charges but Board cannot act on (1) charges under the L. M. R. A. 1947 unless alleged practice is also "unfair under administration bill" and (2) charges under Wagner Act if filed after January 1, 1949.

Under the L. M. R. A. 1947, the main changes on this subject are that while unfair labor practice charges are to be conducted as in the past, there is now a 6-month period of limitation on charges, giving some measure of protection in knowing that nothing that has occurred more than 6 months in the past can be considered as an unfair labor practice. A change was made in the test of the Board's findings of fact. Under the old act, they were conclusive if supported by evidence, which created a rather uncertain and ambiguous situation. Now the Board's findings of facts are conclusive only if supported by substantial evidence, and the rules of evidence applicable in Federal district courts govern Board's hearings, which gives both management and labor a definite basis from which to work.

GENERAL

The comments made on the above changes are my own opinions, based upon the experience of observing the application of those changes to the sets of circumstances that surround management-labor relationships. It is my opinion that such changes are sound, that they have improved relationships between labor and management, that they have resulted in less strife, fewer and shorter strikes and—most important—that some of the allegations of hardship made by unions cannot be upheld. This can be substantiated by the 100-page congressional report by the "watchdog committee." This committee was appointed to study the effects of the Labor-Management Relations Act which strongly upholds the position that unions have not suffered as a result of the act. Further, it is our belief, that with the free speech provision, allowing management to express its views prior to a representation election, management feels that it has had an opportunity to present its side of the picture without being hampered by the penalties under the old law. Consequently, when management loses an election under the Labor-Management Relations Act, their attitude in the bargaining is much better than if they were forced to enter into bargaining with the feeling that they didn't have half a chance to get their side of the story across. Within our experience it has caused better relationships, has decreased the tempo of the bargaining table bickering which accomplished little and accompanied many transactions under the Wagner Act.

BELLINGHAM, WASH., 3.

GEORGE J. TICHY,
Spokane, Wash.:

You may inform Senate and House Labor Committees that this group of 50 logging-industry employers in northwestern Washington are profoundly disturbed over proposed emasculation of Taft-Hartley Act. Most notable result to date in this area has been the stabilizing influence on both employers and employees, with a corresponding increase in operating efficiency and employee productivity. With approximately 3,000 employees involved, the year 1948 was completely free from work stoppages with exception of one small operation where 1 day was lost. In preceding years some type of wildcat strike or job action was occurring every few days. The restraining influence of the law has compelled the union leadership to abandon previous disruptive tactics and policies and return to fundamental collective-bargaining principles. Reports from the field clearly indicate that if the truth were known, the preponderant majority of rank-and-file union members in our section of the industry are privately pleased with the end result of 2 years under Taft-Hartley. We sincerely hope that the Senate and House committees will avoid hasty and ill-considered action in repealing this law.

R. I. STUDEBAKER,
Secretary-Manager, Tri-County Loggers Association, Bellingham, Wash.

STATEMENT OF CHARLES S. HOFFMAN ON BEHALF OF OREGON COAST OPERATORS

I will briefly summarize some of our experiences which illustrate effects of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 upon industrial relations within the lumber industry of southwestern Oregon.

In section 2 (3) the definition of "employee," specifically exempting "any individual having the status of an independent contractor," ended what had been a continuing dispute between the IWA-CIO and logging operators in this area. Prior to passage of the act the representative of IWA local 7–140 had repeatedly asserted that all contractors and their employees automatically come under the terms of the working agreement covering employees of the company which had granted a contract for logging operations. These claims were made by the union at various times for various contractors carrying on logging activities for E. K. Wood Lumber Co., Gardiner Lumber Co., and Cape Arago Lumber Co. We agreed with the union on any case where the contractor was not independent or where the contractor consisted of piece workers such as a cutting crew. In certain cases, independent contractors were forced to accede to the union's claims and recognize the union in order to avoid strikes which had been threatened. The L. M. R. A. has given support to the principle that an independent contractor is an employer in his own right and that any union agreement can only be negotiated between him and his own employees.

The exclusion in the same section, paragraph (3) of "any individual employed as a supervisor" has helped the employer keep its management representatives out from under union control. Before passage of the act both the AFL and the CIO, but particularly the CIO, tried to force working supervisors into the union. Likewise we have experienced cases at Gardiner Lumber Co. and at Cape Arago Lumber Co., where former union employees were promoted to supervisory positions in the logging departments and were refused withdrawal cards by IWA local 7–140. Although the provision of the act has not eliminated union pressure on this point it has reduced this pressure and strengthened the position of the operators and also the position of the supervisory employee himself who knows that he cannot represent both management and the union.

The specific definition of "supervisor" in paragraph (11) of section 2 has been a major help to management and to supervisory employees involved by reducing the endless argument and dispute as to what constitutes a supervisor. The number of grievances arising under this point has been considerably decreased since passage of the act.

The provision of section 8, paragraph (a) (3) providing for union shop elections has been helpful mainly in restricting undemocratic powers of union officials who have not qualified under the act. This particularly applies to the Reedsport area of IWA local 7–140 where the union is not qualified and where the check-off provision coupled with heavy fines or the threat of heavy fines maintained a pseudo-dictatorship over the employees. With the union shop outlawed by noncompliance with the act, the employees have less fear of being blackballed from the industry by action of the union. For example, the local has threatened a fine of $100 for any member who works on Saturday at straight time, even though the contract expressly provides overtime only if it is the employee's sixth day worked.

In this area outside of the jurisdiction of IWA 7–140, both AFL and IWA locals have complied with the act. The employers feel that UA election with such locals is probably wasted effort and only a halfway measure. They would either eliminate the provision for the election or restrict union shop and maintenance of membership along with the closed shop.

Section 8 (b) describing unfair labor practices for labor organizations has done more than any other factor to increase union responsibility as shown by closer observation of contractual provisions and a reluctance to yell "strike" every time they see something they want changed. The result has been more serious negotiation in place of numerous quickie strikes and threats of strikes.

We would like to see paragraph 8 (b) (6) expanded or clarified to include a restraint upon union demands claiming pay for unworked make-ready time which is quite prevalent under IWA local 7–116 and 1–140. The unfair principal involved in featherbedding applies equally to the situation just mentioned.

Section 9 providing for representation elections has reduced the number of strikes and threats of strikes over representation where only one union was involved. Prior to passage of the act many operators faced with a strike threat capitulated by recognizing the union making the claim. In a specific instance since passage of the act, IWA 7–140 made such claims upon a new operation established by the Reedsport Logging Co., and threatened to strike unless immediate recognition was granted. The employer offered to determine the issue by an NLRB election and so informed his employees. The union is not in compliance with the act and could not request an election. The employees showed no signs of dissatisfaction with working conditions and continued working without a strike and its resulting economic loss.

Contrast the case discussed in the preceding paragraph with our experience in July 1946 involving a dispute between IWA local 7–394 and the Powers Mill Co., at Powers, Oreg. The union presented the company with a proposed contract and was told to sign it or there would be a strike. The company questioned whether the union actually represented a majority of its employees. The company was given only 3 or 4 days' time in which to sign the agreement proposed by the union. The company refused to sign the agreement and the mill was struck. Either shortly before or shortly after the strike, the president of IWA district 7 offered a card check but could show only 6 member cards out of a crew of 20. Because of the exceedingly prounion nature of the proposed working agreement the company requested assistance from the association and a counter proposal was drawn and submitted to a committee representing the union. The company was not in a financial position to maintain a refusal to recognize the union, so negotiations were conducted while the mill was being struck. The union was recognized as the bargaining agent and a contract was agreed upon, after which work was resumed. The strike lasted approximately 2 to 3 weeks. This type of situation can be avoided under the L. M. R. A. but will most certainly exist again if we return to the prounion principles of the Wagner Act under which an employer could not request an election to determine if the union had majority representation.

In this area, the non-Communist affidavit requirement has largely accounted for dismissal by the IWA of one local business agent, one district secretary, and one district president. These men refused to sign the affidavit and they no longer hold office. The booklet titled "Meet the Woodworkers," recently published by the IWA-CIO has this to say on page 13 about Communists in CIO unions: "* * * the Taft-Hartley Act has certainly cleared that issue up as far as our organization is concerned. All of the international officers, many of the district officers, and a great majority of our local union officers have signed non-Communist affidavits." If it is felt that discrimination results from requiring only union representatives to sign a non-Communist affidavit I can speak for our members and for myself in saying there would be no objection to my signing such an affidavit.

The provision involving secondary boycott is being tested now in a case before the NLRB in Washington involving picketing first of the Rolando, then of the Irwin-Lyons Lumber Co. mill and their logging operations, and since early in December picketing only of the Rolando at the company dock in North Bend, Oreg. This picketing was and is conducted by the International Longshoremen's and Warehousemen's Union, by the Marine Cooks and Stewards, and by the Marine Firemen, Oilers, and Wipers. The mill employees, the majority of whom were members of the LSW–AFL did not or could not pass the picket line. The logging crews, represented by the IWA-CIO likewise did not work. The present case before the NLRB will depend upon provisions of the L. M. R. A. for protection to the Irwin-Lyons Lumber Co. and to the AFL crews of the Rolando. A reversal to the Wagner Act would leave no solution for such a dispute beyond wasteful economic force.

STATEMENT OF C. L. IRVING, SECRETARY-MANAGER, PINE INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE, INC.

The language contained in section 1 (a) and (b) has done much to dispel the fallacious theory that "labor" and "labor organizations (unions)" are synonymous terms. We have noted that "labor" (employees) have been more insistent on their individual rights.

Recognizing the public stake in the problem by writing it into the law has awakened public interest and satisfaction in local communities.

The language in the short title and declaration of policy is useful. Like the preamble to a labor agreement, it might be called "hay." "Hay" is, however, a very necessary declaration of intention in both instances.

"Labor" and "union" are not synonymous terms any more than "employers" and "associations" are synonymous terms. They can become synonymous in practice only through the application of the theory that the rank and file, in both instances, determines policy and issues the instructions to the hired men wih due regard for their informed opinion. A reverse theory should be discouraged in a democracy, and has been discouraged by this law.

The public, which has been paying and paying for industrial-relations warfare, is entitled to the consideration it receives.

TITLE I—AMENDMENT OF NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT (WAGNER ACT)

Findings and policies.—The general knowledge that unions are recognized to have certain obligations in the sphere of collective bargaining has had a stabilizing influence.

In the Labor-Management Relations Act, for the first time, legislators have spelled out the responsibilities of unions and employers to the American public. The public, as represented by Americans not affiliated with either employers or unions, likes this recognition.

The further declaration of intention is good.

Definitions.—Except as specifically commented on below, our experience would indicate the definitions have met with general approval.

They are good definitions.

The exclusion of supervisors from the definition of the word "employee" did not bring serious problems to our section of the lumbering industry. We have never had a move to organize supervisors into unions, and neither union particularly wanted them in with their rank and file union. "Working foremen" have always been a problem, and will always be a problem, so long as unions contend that supervisors shall do no work, and so long as efficiency of operation, with a view to a lower-priced product for the public, demands productive work on the part of this type of man.

Supervisors should be left excluded from the employee definition. They are a part of management, and should be so recognized. Supervisors cannot be recognized as part of management if they are to be set up in unions in opposition to management. Any unrealistic and unhealthy realinement that divorces supervision from management will mean the buying public will pay higher prices because of higher costs.

Since our direct experience under the Labor-Management Relations Act has been entirely for employers in logging and lumbering, there has been no question but that they were engaged in the production of goods for interstate commerce.

"Commerce" that is interstate in character should be more narrowly defined. Interpretations placed upon the coverage of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, have been too broad, with the Federal law assuming too much jurisdiction and leaving too little to State law. The States should be expected to assume responsibility for intrastate business.

Most of the definitions have been built up through a long history of cases before the NLRB under the Wagner Act. It is most helpful to have them in the law, and in one place, where they can readily be found.

National Labor Relations Board.—Expansion of the Board from three to five members, and the provision for three member panels, together with a separation of duties by creation of the office of general counsel, has been most successful from the standpoint of getting the work done. The National Labor Relations Board has been able to accomplish a prodigious amount of work, and good work, since the effective date of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947.

A new note of equality before this governmental agency has been injected into proceedings before the Board. Employers and employer representatives have more confidence in the Board. There has been no union criticism of the Board set-up, although there has been criticism of the general counsel by union leaders and union attorneys.

A separation of "policing" and "prosecution" functions from "judicial" functions is necessary to impartial administration.

Rights of employees.—We have noted more recognition by unions of individual and minority rights.

It is the history of civilization that individual dignity, freedom, and initiative in thinking and action builds up and sustains a high "average" in welfare and progress. A reverse process of building on an "average" has never been sustained because of the loss of individual rights and incentives. The rights of individuals and minorities should be afforded all possible protection.

Unfair labor practices.—Not one unfair labor practice charge has been filed against an employer member of this organization since the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, and only one was filed during several years prior to its enactment. No illegal contracts have been signed under the union membership restrictions, nor have there been any strikes to compel the signing of such contracts. The number of union-shop contracts has increased. So have material benefits in wages. Prior to the enactment of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, only 35 percent of our International Woodworkers of America, CIO, contracts contained union membership requirements so restrictive as a union shop. This union now has only one contract among our members that does not contain a union-shop provision.

The unions have lost a few union-shop elections. This has tended to keep them on their toes regarding individual service to individual employees. There is more respect for individual integrity.

The objection of employees to compulsory union membership has been partially removed by the clearing up of the situations under which an employee can lose his job. I refer to the fact that membership must be available to the employee on the same terms and conditions as generally applicable to other employees, and that his obligations are met by the willingness to pay initiation fees and dues uniformly required as a condition of acquiring or retaining membership.

In addition, employees have recognized that the right to petition for decertification provides them with a return road if return seems advisable. No longer is compulsory union membership a road of no return. (Union leaders have long argued that union membership is a lifetime obligation. Resignation is not recognized.)

In viewing the overwhelming results of UA elections by which unions are authorized to seek union shops, the casual observer fails to realize that the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, did its job by "cleaning up" the reasons for which a union could request discharge. Employees have no objection to paying their freight. Employees do not, in general, approve of closed shops or closed unions, and they realize that union-controlled hiring is most susceptible to discrimination. They appreciate their right, guaranteed by the Labor-Management Relations Act, to petition for the chance to unload an unsatisfactory union, or its compulsory membership requirements. Their objections were to the many internal control abuses inflicted upon them by unions that were ignoring or trampling rough shod over the rights of individuals and minorities.

It is significant to note that the only industries who have suffered real trouble as the result of the prohibition of the closed-shop contract have been the printing industries, the maritime industries, and the building-trades industries. It is even more significant to note that it is in these industries that the public has paid the highest price for one-sided bargaining because of overwhelming strength on the side of the unions. Employers in these industries almost had to cease doing battle for their customers, and have almost uniformly ceased to do so. The American maritime industry was nearly eliminated from peacetime shipping competition by the high costs of shipbuilding, loading, and operation. Prohibitive labor costs in the building-trades industries through wages, practices, and union employment controls, have been the greatest single factor in putting the price of homes beyond the reach of most Americans. A subsidization program now seems necessary to some people, when in fact subsidization will only cement the errors into permanency. In the printing industries, the public has been denied its rightful share of the benefits derived from the vast amount of technological improvement.

I favor the continued prohibition of the closed shop for the reasons outlined above. The provisions for compulsory UA elections might very well be eliminated where there is agreement on compulsory union membership after a 30-day period. The rights of the employees to petition to have the union-shop authority of the union denied or removed from the contract should be preserved because it is the best safeguard against uncontrolled union leadership and rampant majority domination.

Always giving consideration to this right of self-assertion by the employees—who are the ones most affected by a compulsory union membership provision—the contracting parties, that is, employer and union, should be given the right to make such a contract if they so desire.

The employee right to petition for decertification of the union, or withdrawal of the right to include a union shop provision, removes a cause of misunderstanding between employers and employees, and employers and unions. Under the Wagner Act, employees dissatisfied with union conditions would approach the employer with their problems. He had only two recourses in handling the problem: 1, advise them he had no interest in their problem, or (2) refuse to bargain with the union, and risk an unfair labor practice charge. Under the the Labor-Management Relations Act, he can refer them to the NLRB, and a cause for friction has been removed.

Union unfair labor practices.—No employer in our membership has filed an unfair labor practice charge against a union.

Twelve years of experience under the Wagner Act taught all of us that unions can and do commit unfair labor practices, and that such unfair practices should be defined and prohibited. Most of the unfair practices outlined in the act for unions are also unfair when committed by employers. This is equality in the eyes of the law and is as it should be. There can be no legitimate defense of secondary boycotts, hot cargo, jurisdictional strikes in the fact of certifications by the National Labor Relations Board, excessive initiation fees and dues, featherbedding, or any other form of coercion or intimidation. Whatever antimonopoly rules are applied against employers—no more, no less—should be applied against unions.

The public approves the conduct of industrial relations on a businesslike, rather than on emotional basis.

Forcing self-employers in one-man business, or "mom and pop" business, to join a union is simply tribute or "taxation without representation." There can be no services rendered to these people on wages, hours, and working conditions through representation by a labor organization.

Free speech.—Employers in this association have been exercising their free-speech rights since the Supreme Court clarified them several years ago despite the fact that the NLRB, under the Wagner Act, tried to deprive them of their constitutional rights. The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, provision merely writes the Supreme Court ruling into the law.

We have noted that employees expect and appreciate accurate information and the frank opinions of their employers.

Freedom of speech is guaranteed by our Constitution. There can be no quarrel with its written expression in a law laying down the rules for the prevention and handling of economic strife.

Obligations of employers and the representative of employees under collective bargaining.—There has been no difficulty in this area regarding the terms under which contracts may be terminated or modified.

Maybe these rules are not the best ones that can be found, and if better ones can be found we should get them. In the meantime, these rules have certainly been an improvement, and a protection to the public.

Representatives and elections.—For many years, we have insisted on NLRB certification of representation, after a secret-ballot election, before extending recognition to a union.

Requiring a secret-ballot election, conducted under governmental auspices, in a proven, democratic, and American process.

Our experiences, or my opinion, are not too pertinent as to the balance of this section. It outlines, more or less, instructions to the National Labor Relations Board. Consequently, comments below are to specific portions of the section.

Individual employees and their grievances.—We have noted that union representatives now pay more attention to the grievances of individuals and minorities. Most of these grievances are now settled at the immediate supervisor-workman level thus eliminating one of the most irritating aspects of day-to-day collective bargaining.

The provisions that collective-bargaining agreements shall be complied with in such grievance adjustments, and that the union shall have an opportunity to be represented in discussions, are sufficient guaranties to the unions.

Craft units.—Some craft unions affiliated with the American Federation of Labor, notably the operating engineers and the teamsters, have attempted to move into established industrial units. These efforts have been defeated, and have been opposed by the Lumber and Sawmill Workers, AFL, the International Woodworkers of America, CIO, and employers.

The National Labor Relations Board has usually done a good job on this question of unit determination. I can think of nothing that would be more disturbing to the economic atmosphere of this country than for every manufacturing employer to have to deal collectively with each of the craft units that could conceivably be set up in his organization. I once handled an NLRB case in California where the LSWU, AFL, and the IWA-CIO, sought industrial units among employees of a lumber manufacturing concern. The teamsters sought to represent logging truck drivers in woods operations and carrier operators in lumber plant operations, as well as all employees working in the loading or unloading of such equipment. In the same case, the operating engineers sought a unit composed of logging caterpillar operators, truck road construction crews, and hoisting engineers in the woods operation, together with the power plant employees and the operators of machines used in hoisting lumber in the plant operation. Neither of these two unions claimed any jurisdiction over the balance of the employees actually engaged in handling of logs and lumber. At the very best, the granting of their petitions would have meant three union contracts and three sets of collective bargaining negotiations for an employer with a labor force of 140 people.

To carry this craft business to its ridiculous extreme at this small operation, the machinists might have sought a unit composed of the machine shop and mechanical employees, the electricians for a small electrical crew, the carpenters and joiners for a few millwrights, the various brotherhoods in a small 10- or 15-man railroad operation and track crew, and the culinary alliance in the cookhouse. In addition there could have been a professional employees unit, a unit for guards, a supervisors unit, and a unit among clerical workers, and I am sure I've missed a few.

I wish to repeat the comment that, both under the Wagner Act and the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, the National Labor Relations Board has by and large, done a good job on unit determination. The special protection to craft units, if interpreted narrowly, is dangerous, and a constant source of irritation between unions as well as employers and unions.

We have dealt and deal with craft unions, and successfully, in special circumstances usually of a temporary nature. Their former "take it or leave it" attitude has been succeeded by an attitude of reasonable argument and negotiation under the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947.

Guards.—Guards and watchmen in the Pine Industrial Relations Committee, Inc., area have been excluded from contract coverage. A better job of plant and property protection has been secured thereby.

When watchmen used to be in a unit with production workers, they often looked to union strike leaders for instructions in strike situations because of their fear of retribution through the union, and with consequent loss in efficiency of protection.

Divided loyalty can only be harmful to this type of employee, and to the results of his work.

Twelve-month periods between elections.—Prior to the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, some of our member companies have experienced three or four elections within a 3 or 4-month period. Obviously, the union can lose two or three elections and then win another one through the sheer force of repetitive voting. The employees, even though they may not desire a union, get disgusted, and believe that government is aligned with unions against them.

Since the enactment of the new law, we have noted that unions apply for elections only after they have done a thorough selling job in organization. When the union does this job well, they are strong unions because of member understanding and participation. Our employers prefer to deal with that kind of strong union.

Unions should be required to sell their product or service just as any other product or service is sold. Employers, and their employees, have a right to expect freedom from organizing pressures for a reasonable period of time after the employees have expressed themselves on the subject in fairly conducted, secret ballot elections.

An exception might be made when unions fail to exercise the bargaining rights they have won.

Filing of union records and financial statements.—This provision has no effect on collective bargaining between employers and employee representatives.

This requirement of the law should be retained. Union members, especially, are appreciative of the information it gets them concerning the financial manipulations of their officers.

Non-Communist affidavit.—There are very few Communists among the members of either union in the Pine Industrial elations Committee, Inc., area.

One of the two unions with which we deal has had this problem to combat in other areas in the West. The requirement for non-Communist affidavits has enabled them to make progress in cleaning up their problem. I know it will be argued by those prejudiced against this requirement that they would have cleaned out the Communists anyhow. It is interesting to note that the job was not done until passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. One of this union's booklets to their members, in commenting on the subject of rumors that its union is run by Communists, says, "Furthermore the Taft-Hartley Act has certainly cleared that issue up as far as our organization is concerned."

There are suggestions that employer representatives should be required to sign the affidavits on the same terms as union representatives. I have no quarrel with this proposal. The Communist and his ilk, including fellow travelers, must be brought out in the open where they can be smelled.

In my opinion, there is only one valid reason for refusing to sign a non-Communist affidavit in order to secure the benefits of democratic laws. A Communist should refuse to sign the affidavit.

Prevention of unfair labor practices.—This section of the law is largely technical, and can be better commented on by a legally trained administrator. Generally peaking, if enforcement injunctions are to be used against employers, they should be used against unions.

The decentralization theory, accomplished by conceding jurisdiction to recognized and consistent state agencies, should be retained. Democracy cannot be retained through centralization. Recognition of State jurisdiction can help solve the border line commerce problem.

The statute of limitations in the filing of unfair labor practices and the requirement that evidence substantiating the charge shall be submitted within 10 days of the charge are good rules to keep. In the past misleading charges were filed for the advertising value they contained in organizing employees, and with no idea of actual processing. The NLRB's records, under the Wagner Act, show unfair labor practice charges being brought years after the alleged acts were supposed to have taken place.

The Labor Management Relations Act, 1947, has eliminated the use of the NLRB, and the unfair labor practice charge, for organizational publicity purposes only. This furthers the equalization theory, and prevents a form of blackmail.

Technical commentators on this section should always bear in mind the inalienable right of an American citizen—whether he be an employee, an employee representative, or an employer—to seek and secure justice through the courts.

Investigatory powers.—These are technical provisions.

Limitations.—We've had no strikes since the new law became effective.

The right to strike should be protected so far as it is consistent with public welfare, but strikes should be approved by involved employees in secret ballot election.

Supervisors should be excluded from the definition of "employee." (See comment under "definitions" above).

The right of States to consider local conditions, and the desires of its citizens to enact more restrictive provisions regarding compulsory union membership should be recognized and vigorously defended. In a country as vast as is our country, with the varying conditions in various areas, there is every reason for decentralization of control.

Along this line, Supreme Court comment in the decision upholding North Carolina, Nebraska, and Arizona right-to-work laws is necessary reading not only as to the validation of State laws restricting compulsory union membership, but as to whether unions really need this form of security.

Effective date of certain changes.—I can't help remarking that a revised law will make it necessary to meet time requirements all over again even though these time requirements have been met. I am reminded that a great deal of constructive inquiry and work toward a better solution of difficulties between labor organizations and employers will have been wasted. Learning a new set of rules, all over again, will not be conducive to economic peace in our nation, and we need that peace if we are to achieve our aim of leadership in securing world peace.

More than anything else, our employers and employees need stability. They like to be able to figure ahead. Everytime the laws governing industrial relations procedure are changed, there is the need to consult lawyers, accountants, etc. These changes and consultations do not make for stability.

TITLE II—CONCILIATION OF LABOR DISPUTES IN INDUSTRIES AFFECTING COMMERCE; NATIONAL EMERGENCIES

Employers have been gradually gaining confidence in the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service because of its independent agency status. Conciliators in the old days, under the Department of Labor, were viewed by employers in this industry as simply Government-paid representatives of the unions. Commissioners of the service were generally tolerated, but seldom usefully used. Today, employers are accepting arguments that the Service is impartial.

Employers will not have confidence in any mediation or conciliation agency that is under the direction of the Secretary of Labor, or in the Labor Department. They take the enabling act creating the Department of Labor literally, as they well should, and expect it to follow that dictate as labor's representative in the administrative branch of the Federal Government.

National labor-management panel.—We have had no direct experience with this body.

This panel has been of considerable value to the Mediation and Conciliation Service in setting up their activities. It can continue to be useful. The public likes the idea of a bureau seeking the advice of citizens.

National emergencies.—Since we have had no strikes, there has been no opportunity of declaring us a national emergency. This is a small-business industry. In our association, the average member company employs approximately 150 employees.

President Truman has made pretty good use of this provision in the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947. Perhaps it can be improved upon, since it has little effect on law defiant unions. If there are ways to secure these improvements, they should be used. Fact-finding recommendations might be helpful before the jury of public opinion.

It is certain that neither unions nor employers have a complete right to go their own way in their desire to accomplish some of their aims, if that be at the expense of the great American public. The Federal Government of the United States will always have a hard time justifying a proemployer position, or a prounion position. They should never have any trouble in justifying a pro-American public position.

TITLE III—SUITS BY AND AGAINST LABOR ORGANIZATIONS

None of the members of this association have been sued by a labor organization. Neither has one of the members filed suit against a labor organization.

The right to redress through the courts has been a powerful and stabilizing influence on every matter connected with the history and development of America. There should be the right of redress to the courts, either by a labor organization, employees, or an employer, when damage results from breach of contract or any illegal action. This right to redress through the courts should especially be open to third parties.

This particular provision of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, has had more to do with the acceptance of contractual obligations and responsibility by unions and their agents, as well as their members, than has any other single thing. Employers, too, have been brought alive to the fact of their responsibilities and their obligations. The American public can only benefit from such acceptance of responsibility.

Voluntary, revocable check-off.—Our dues check-off provisions have always been voluntary and revocable. We have had no automatic check-offs.

We have no health and welfare programs in the John L. Lewis sense. There are many group insurance and hospital programs that have come into the picture through voluntary, cooperative action on the part of employers and emplolyees.

Fines should be prohibited as withholding items. I see no objection to collecting initiation fees, as well as regular recurring monthly dues through the medium of a voluntary revocable, individual check-off, if the contracting parties agree to that procedure.

As to health and welfare funds through the medium of collective bargaining, I want to issue a warning. The trend of interpreting the phrase "wages, hours, and working conditions" as including everything under the sun is dangerous. It will eventually break down the collective-bargaining process, and make it necessary to go to complete governmental regulation. The back of the collective bargaining process will be broken by simply carrying too much weight. Unless we want collective bargaining failure, we had better not permit the expansion of the commonly recognized definition of the terms. Actual wage rates, hours of work actualy performed, and the job conditions under which work is performed during these hours of work for that rate of pay is about as far as collective bargaining can function and remain as one of our successful democratic processes for the settlement of labor disputes.

Boycotts and other unlawful combinations.—We have experienced no boycotts or other unlawful combinations within our membership since the passage of the Labor Management Relations Act, 1947.

That kind of experience is good for all of us. If the language of the prohibitions needs clarifications, it should be made more definite. There is no place in the American scheme of things for coercion or intimidation by any means or by any persons or organizations. Secondary boycotts, jurisdictional disputes, hot cargo, etc., offends the public.

Restrictions on political contributions.—However this thing cuts, it should cut both ways when applied to either corporations or unions.

It is to be hoped no labor-bossed political machine can develop. Because such a political machine would be national in scope, it would be more dangerous to the common welfare than have been localized political machines.

Strikes by government employees.—A study of the events in some of the western European countries with whom we have been trying to live—and work for—during the past 2 or 3 years should be sufficient evidence that strikes against the Government should be outlawed.

TITLE IV—CREATION OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY AND REPORT ON BASIC PROBLEMS AFFECTING FRIENDLY LABOR RELATIONS AND PRODUCTIVITY

This joint committee can be a powerful force in avoiding the mistakes of the Wagner Act. The biggest mistake under the Wagner Act was letting it go so long without amendment. The joint committee, properly functioning, can help avoid repetition of that mistake by recommending preventive minor operations. The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, ran into trouble because it had to be a major operation in order to cure a deep-seated ailment.

The public likes this businesslike approach to legislation.

TITLE V—DEFINITIONS

See our comment on title I, above, regarding "industry affecting commerce" and the dangers in broad interpretation of this term.

Saving provision.—Although turnover rates have decreased, when compared to the preceding four or five war years under the old Wagner Act, they have decreased because of economic and social conditions, not the new law.

The right of any employee to quit his employment should be protected. It has not been damaged by the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947.

Separability.—This seems to be good legislative draftsmanship.

STATEMENT OF C. L. IRVING BEFORE THE SENATE COMMITTEE ON LABOR AND PUBLIC WELFARE, FEBRUARY 17, 1949

My name is C. L. Irving. I am secretary-manager of the Pine Industrial Relations Committee, an employers' industrial relations association. We serve lumbering employers in the western pine lumbering area of central and southern Oregon, and northern California, from a headquarters office in Klamath Falls, Oreg. I am appearing here on behalf of the National Lumber Manufacturers Association, an organization composed of 15 regional lumber manufacturing associations throughout the United States.

Industrial relations has been my business life since 1935, the year the Wagner Act was enacted. Until 1942, I was in charge of personnel work, labor relations, and public relations for one of the lumber companies. In 1942, I helped the Pine Industrial Relations Committee get started, and I've been its operating head for the past 5 years.

A Federal labor law, to be effective in promoting the national welfare, must contain several essential features. It is no longer sufficient to lay down vague rules and generalizations for the guidance of parties to collective bargaining, or of Government administrative agencies regulating collective bargaining.

Years of operation under a labor law now generally conceded to be insufficient, the Wagner Act, have taught industrial relations men that neither employers nor unions should be the prime beneficiaries of the law. Rather, the law should be aimed toward protection of the consuming public, and employee citizens.

1. The rights of the consuming public should be recognized in any law governing employer-employee relations. The Government is the logical representative of that public. It should intervene in work stoppages affecting the national health and welfare, and our national labor law should outline a procedure for so doing.

2. The rights of individual citizens must be recognized, and vigorously defended. In our western lumbering industries, employers are individualistic, employees are individualistic, and the representatives each of them selects are individualistic. This characteristic of people is developed by the nature of the problems and the work. No effort to cast them in the same mold, by compulsion, even though countenanced by the law, has contributed to their happiness or well-being.

3. There should be equality for employer and employee representatives in the eyes of the law, and before the governmental agencies charged with enforcing the law or assisting the parties.

4. The rights of States to be interested in the problem should be recognized, and that interest should be encouraged. The desires of their citizens to regulate according to the more localized needs should supersede Federal law, and not be wiped out by Federal law, in the absence of proof of need in the national interest.

5. Rules for guidance must be enunciated within the framework of the law, and provision made for enforcement of those rules. The rules, or the enforcement, cannot be successful unless there is fairness and impartiality toward both parties. In this respect, the right of redress through the courts, both in enforcement and for loss-recovery purposes, should be outlined as to procedure, and afforded to the parties in industrial relations, as it is to all citizens. This is especially true as to contractual obligations. Industrial relations, as to employer, employee, or employee representative, should be expected to operate on sound business principles. The time for emotionalism is past, and the emotional approach has been too costly to our country in terms of strikes, and loss of productivity and financial return in wages and profits.

6. A labor law should be definite and clear. The Congress should enact a complete law, not one to be developed by administrative action or court interpretation. Codification of rules and findings developed under the Wagner Act, and from the deficiencies of that act, makes this now possible.

7. Finally, allowance should be made for legislative error in the light of experience, and arrangements made to promptly correct them as well as to provide a check on administrative actions to insure conformance with the intent of Congress.

It is my belief that the Labor Management Relations Act of 1947, is such a law as I have described. It should not be repealed. If amendments are found necessary or desirable they should be made in the public interest, not in the interest of any particular segment of our economy.

COMMENTS BY WALTER A. DURHAM, JR., OF THE LUMBERMEN'S INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS COMMITTEE ON THE MAJOR PROVISIONS OF THE THOMAS-LESINSKI BILL (S. 249 AND H. R. 1395) AS ORIGINALLY PROPOSED

Title I.—Amendment of National Labor Relations Act:

Section 1 would remove references to union abuses of the public interest and not only glosses over the truth but implies that employers are the only group of citizens who have obstructed commerce.

Section 2 would remove the exemption granted to supervisors and professional persons under the L. M. R. A. and would open the road again to encroachment of management prerogatives. To subject supervisors once more to divided loyalties will not only impede productive efficiency but will destroy good relationships—particularly with foremen of logging camps—built up during the past year.

Section 3 removes the independent office of the general counsel and again would place the Board in the role of prosecutor and judge—a procedure foreign to American ideals of fair play and justice.

Section 7 would remove the protection accorded to citizens to join or not to join a labor organization as they individually see fit.

Section 8 would remove all references to unfair labor practices by unions, and will surely reverse the trend toward union responsibility that we have seen in the lumber-industry negotiations during 1948.

Section 9 (a) would remove the clarification of the right of an individual employee to present grievances individually to his employer without intervention of the union.

Section 9 (b) would determine the appropriate bargaining unit only in the light of the full benefit to employee organization and with no regard to employer views or even to practical operating requirements in the industry. Further extension of craft unionism and jurisdictional strife can only result from such a one-sided and unrealistic determination of bargaining units by the Board.

Section 9 (c) would remove the right of employees to challenge the continued existence of a labor organization by appropriate petitions to the Board, and will put the public at the mercy of labor-dynasties which have perpetuated themselves without regard to views of their membership. The employer likewise would be prevented by the proposed bills from seeking a determination of a representation question. This is an especially important question in the lumber industries, where at least one of the two equally powerful AFL and CIO woods unions has declared war on the other until jurisdictional victory is complete. Some employers have a CIO woods union and an AFL mill union, all getting along fairly well under the present law.

Section 9 (e) would eliminate the requirement for a union shop election, which has been considered of dubious value as a mandatory feature of the

L. M. R. A. It would be better to retain the election machinery if a certain percentage of the employees desired to avail themselves of an election to assist them either in gaining or in removing a union-shop clause. In the lumber industries, the unions have used elections in the "easy" cases where some form of compulsory membership previously existed prior to the passage of the L. M. R. A.

Section 9 (e) also would drop the provision that in a representation election, employees on strike but not entitled to reinstatement could not vote. During the relative harmony in lumber labor-management relations of the past year, there has been little occasion to test this provision. It would avoid the packing of ballots by professional strikers and should, as the shipping industry of the west coast has learned, prevent some of the wanton violence to life and property which has occasionally accompanied recognition strikes in the past.

Section 9 (f) would eliminate the requirement that financial statements be filed by any union prior to availing itself of Board services. This requirement has done much to assist lumber unions in an honest attempt to show their accomplishments to the unions. It is a sign of maturity and responsibility which many of the union leaders of my acquaintance would like to see retained.

Section 9 (h) would remove the requirement that non-Communist affidavits be filed before a union can use the services of the Board. The international scene as well as the domestic drift toward a collectivist "welfare" government makes imperative the retention of this safeguard, which I believe should be extended to employers. The CIO International Woodworkers, after fighting a successful battle to rid themselves of certain left-wing officers in the Pacific Northwest, prints the statement that "Furthermore, the Taft-Hartley Act has certainly cleared that issue up as far as our organization is concerned."

Section 10 (a) would clip the powers of the Board in preventing unfair labor practices by removing its right to action in the Federal courts, and will permit the Board to take action only in those cases it may be pleased to consider. Court procedure has been successful in eliminating a particularly obnoxious secondary boycott involving a western Washington sawmill which had continued for months prior to the passage of the L. M. R. A.

Section 13 would appear to restore an unlimited right to strike, particularly when coupled with the fact that the new section 8 defines not a single unfair labor practice of unions.

Title II is omitted in the proposed bill, which will make possible the return of the Conciliation Service to the United States Department of Labor. During the past year the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service has done much to establish itself as a true independent public agency, and the employees I have met in the agency have appreciated the new air of impartiality which was impossible in a department charged specifically with the duty of furthering the interests of labor.

Title III is also omitted, which would lift suits by and against labor organizations. It is my observation that the new law has made for more dignity and responsibility in the conduct of both employers and unions in their bargaining relationships, and it would be a distinct loss to the public to tempt one side back to the era of irresponsibility. It is extremely unfortunate that the new bill proposes to remove the restrictions upon contributions by groups, banks, or labor organizations in connection with Federal elections. Our whole system of government is based on the expression of individuals, not of citizens in the mass without regard to the rights of minorities in the group.

Title IV of the present law provides for a joint committee to study "basic problems affecting friendly labor relations and productivity." Loss of this feature in the proposed bill will remove an orderly and proper method for the Congress to continue the study of its own labor law. My friends in legal and college circles have great admiration for the quality of the two reports issued by the present joint committee.

In closing, I most strongly urge that any form of compulsory union membership be limited to the payment or offer of payment of regular monthly dues. The harsh requirement that a citizen must keep membership in any organization "in good standing" is not in keeping with American traditions of individual dignity and freedom. I do not approve of compulsory membership in any association for any purpose, but if we are to have it under the new labor law, let's have it in a form which does not seal the lips of an employee who would stand in fear of labor dictatorship if compulsory membership is not prescribed to mean payment or offer of payment of regular monthly membership dues.

Finally, in my conversations and radio debates with labor union officials and attorneys, they have failed to offer a single constructive suggestion for amending the Labor-Management Relations Act, except that the non-Communist affidavit requirement be extended to employers.

Mr. BAILEY. At this time the committee would be glad to hear from Congressman Lucas of Texas introducing one of his fellow Texans, who was scheduled to appear here this morning, a gentleman by the name of Charles Brooks.

Mr. LUCAS. I appreciate the opportunity of introducing Mr. Brooks. I had the pleasure of going to school with him down in Texas, and I observed his attention and knowledge in the labor field.

Mr. Brooks, in 1933 or 1934, as a member of the National Labor Relations Board, was one of the administrators of the Wagner Act, and then after his service in the Army during the war, he came back, and because of his knowledge in the field he was selected as first assistant to Mr. Denham, and today, I understand, he is going to talk about the administration of both the Wagner Act and of the Taft-Hartley Act, so that you members of the committee may understand the difficulties which arose under both acts.

Since October of 1948 Mr. Brooks has been with the Texas Co., but I understand he does not wish to appear here as a witness representing the Texas Co., but he is to testify only as to his administration under both of the labor acts which have been upon the books.

I think I should say, and you all understand, I do not necessarily subscribe to what Mr. Brooks will state, but he is my friend, and I take pleasure in presenting him to you.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Congressman.

You may proceed, Mr. Brooks.

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES M. BROOKS, ATTORNEY, FORMER MEMBER OF THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, by way of introduction, from 1937 to August 1947, except for 3½ years' service in the Army, I served in various capacities as an attorney with the National Labor Relations Board under the Wagner Act. From August 1947 until October 15, 1948, I served as associate general counsel of the National Labor Relations Board under the Taft-Hartley Act. In the latter position I supervised the investigation and trial of cases before the Board and the administration and personnel of the Board's 28 field offices. Since October 18, 1948, I have been on the legal staff of the Texas Co., 135 East Forty-second Street, New York, specializing in labor law.

My purpose in appearing before this committee is to give my personal opinions based upon my experiences during the past 11 years, working under both the Wagner Act and the Taft-Hartley Act, in the hope that they may be of some help to you in writing a labor law. I shall try to be objective in my statements and in giving answers to any questions the members of the committee may ask, limiting myself to my experiences; and I can sincerely state that I have no ax to grind. What I say today will be my personal conclusions and does not necessarily reflect the view of the company with which I am associated.

Good labor relations: My experience in this field has taught me that good labor relations are not produced by law. They result, in my opinion, from fair treatment, recognition by each party of the rights of others, and mutual respect of the employer and employee representatives one for the other. By the nature of things today, however, a Federal labor-relations law seems to be necessary. It is the rule now instead of the exception that employers have contractual relations with their employees' chosen representatives. It is, therefore, important that an orderly procedure be available for the selection of the collective bargaining representative by the employees. Where two segments of our society, such as labor and management, are bargaining with each other on the conditions and circumstances under which they will associate with one another, rules of conduct should be established. That is the function of a modern-day labor-relations law.

1935 versus 1949: Those advocating a return to the Wagner Act must have lost sight of the fact that the relative strength of labor organizations and management associations is more nearly equal now than it was in 1935 when the Wagner Act was enacted. As Congress noted in section 1 of the Wagner Act, there was in 1935—> inequality of bargaining power between employees. * * * and employers * * *—

because the former did not possess full freedom of organization while the latter did. That was true at the time it was written into the Wagner Act, and there were only approximately 4,000,000 members of labor unions then. Today there are more than 15,000,000.

Labor unions today are as strong economically and politically as the employers with whom they do business, and in some cases stronger. The evils which the Wagner Act was designed to correct do not exist today, with certain very rare exceptions. Congress found in 1947 that the new evils had arisen; namely, abuses by labor unions of the power and authority which they had gained during the preceding 12 years.

Equality under law: The 1949 version of a labor-relations law should, therefore, take into consideration the fact that equality rather than inequality of bargaining is approximated, and that rules of conduct must be designed to apply to both parties in the field of labor-management relations. The rights of both should be guaranteed; but each must assume his responsibilities.

Moreover, the strength of organizations and the prevalence of collective bargaining relations in our industrial society today means that if labor and management resort to their economic strengths to settle their disputes, a very large portion of the public itself feels the impact with adverse effects. So, it should be the concern of our Government that a labor-management relations law take into account the public, which is the innocent bystander, and incorporate protections for the public into the law.

Freedom from coercion: The individual employee should be guaranteed by law the right to organize for the purpose of collective bargaining. The employer should not be permitted to restrain or coerce the employee in the selection of his bargaining agent or to hinder him from engaging in concerted activity for his welfare. In like manner, labor unions should be prohibited from restraining and coercing employees in the exercise of their rights to refuse to participate in union activities. It is well known that labor unions do from time to time use coercive and intimidatory tactics to persuade employees against their wills to support a union.

It may be true, as some have said, that unions learned their coercive and intimidatory tactics from employers. I do know that in the early days of the administration of the Wagner Act there were numerous cases where employers used spies, thugs, strong-arm squads, and other such means to prevent union organization. I also know that after the passage of the Labor-Management Relations Act in 1947, the Board's offices had brought to their attention a number of cases where unions were using the same kind of tactics. I remember, for example, a case involving a small coal company in the State of Kentucky. The case was settled after a charge was filed, but the investigation prior to its settlement revealed that the United Mine Workers Union confiscated the employer's property, severely injured several persons who attempted to come on the property, and otherwise threatened the lives of any who interfered with the union's activities to obtain a closed-shop contract from the employer, although the employees were not members or adherents of that union.

I remember also the threats, intimidation, and coercion by the Furniture Workers Union against the employees of Smith Cabinet Manufacturing Co. (Smith Cabinet Mfg. Co., 23 L. R. R. M. 1424). Other such cases which I remember include the Sunset Twine & Line Company case (23 L. R. R. M. 1001), and the cases involving several West Virginia coal companies (23 L. R. R. M. 135).

These kinds of tactics are not typical of unions, of course, just an antiunion activities are not typical of employers. The point I am making, however, is that the law should protect the employees from these coercive tactics if they are used either by unions or by employers.

Requirement to bargain: Any labor law should retain the present requirement that employers bargain with the duly chosen representatives of his employees in the bargaining unit. By the same token, no one has told me nor have I read anywhere why the same requirement should not be exacted of unions. If a labor organization demands that an employer sign a contract with it on behalf of his employees, that employer should have a legal right to charge that union with an unfair labor practice of refusal to bargain if the union refuses to discuss the provisions of the contract. Prior to the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act, the Labor Board had taken cognizance that there was such a thing as a union refusing to bargain, but there was no provision in the Wagner Act to require it to do so nor a remedy that the Board could invoke. The present requirement that unions must bargain in good faith should, in my opinion, be retained. We should not revert to the situation where a union can offer a contract on a "take this or take a strike" basis without the employer having a legal recourse.

While I was with the Labor Board under the Wagner Act, the rules with respect to the requirement of a company to bargain with its supervisory employees was changed three times. The problem presented by the anomalous status of supervisors was a constant source of difficulty in the administration of the Wagner Act. As the Board pointed out in the Maryland Drydock case:

> The very nature of a foreman's duties makes him an instrumentality of management in dealing with labor.

The Board also observed in that case:

> To hold that the National Labor Relations Act contemplated the representation of supervisory employees by the same organizations which might represent the subordinates would be to view the statute as repudiating the historic prohibition of the common law against fiduciaries serving conflicting interests.

We with the Board found ourselves telling management, "You violated the law because your foremen aided one union against another." Then the next week we had to tell the company to bargain with that same union on behalf of those foremen. It is my personal opinion that supervisory employees should be excluded from the operation of a Labor-Management Relations Act. An incongruous situation inevitably results if they must "fish" with the employer today and may commit a "foul" for him tomorrow.

Employers' petition: Under the Wagner Act the Labor Board rules provided that an employer could file a petition asking for an election only if two or more labor organizations were demanding representation for the same group of employees at the same time. I knew of several instances in my experience where a labor union demanded an employer to recognize it and sign a contract, but the union refused to file a petition seeking an election to prove its majority representation. It seems only fair to me that since there is available a means of proving, by the accepted American method of the election, that the union represents the employees, the employer should be permitted to ask for an election if the union refuses to do so. This provision in the Taft-Hartley Act to my knowledge has not operated unfavorably to unions and, as a matter of fact, under the Board's rules, the petition of the employer will be dismissed if at any time prior to the election the union withdraws its demand. It is clear, therefore, that there is no merit to the claim that his offers an employer a device to force an election upon a union at a time when it does not want it or is not ready for it. The only thing it does is to provide a means by which the employer can determine, in the orderly manner established by Congress, whether or not his employees want the union which is claiming recognition.

During my 14 months with the Board under the Taft-Hartley Act, it was my observation that this provision and the 1-year rule regarding repeat elections had a wholesome and stabilizing effect upon labor relations. The demands for recognition were made usually only after the union believed it was in a fair position to win an election.

Jurisdictional disputes: I have had some experience with jurisdictional dispute cases, but in nearly all of them the filing of the charge caused a settlement and the strike was ended. I cannot understand why a disruption of the flow of interstate commerce should ever be tolerated simply because each of the two unions is trying to force an employer to recognize it as the bargaining agent for his employees, or to assign work to it rather than another union. Labor unions have hailed the Wagner Act as their magna carta because it guarantees the right of an employee to join a union of his own choice. Why, then, should a union be permitted to force the employee to join a particular union? What choice has the employer when two unions close his plant because they are fighting over the jurisdiction of his employees? Isn't it only fair that he be permitted to ask his Government to stop the fighting until the dispute has been settled by orderly Government processes?

Moreover, to enjoin the strike only after an award has been made, as the present proposal would do, is like calling the doctor after the patient is dead. It is very little better than nothing because one of the unions will have won out or the employer will have taken bankruptcy long before the Labor Board will have rendered a decision. At the present rate that the Labor Board turns out decisions, it would be a minimum of 1 year, from the time that the charge was filed, the hearing held, the report sent to the Board, it is studied and analyzed by a member of the legal staff, or a Board member, and a decision issued.

It seems to me that once it has been determined that there is a jurisdictional dispute and that a complaint should issue, the enforcing agent should be authorized, not required, to seek an injunction pending disposition by the Board, if the gravity of the situation is such that an injunction is called for. And that is why I would advocate the discretionary injunction rather than the mandatory injunction.

Separation of functions in the Board: The general principle of the separation of the prosecuting and administrative functions from the judicial functions in the National Labor Relations Board should, I think, re retained. The Taft-Hartley Act, however, leaves much to be desired in that respect. The respective duties and authorities of the two branches should be clearly and unmistakably defined by law. If they are both in the same agency it should be only for housekeeping purposes, I think.

I served in four regional offices and in two different capacities in Washington under the Wagner Act when the three Board members constituted the administrative and prosecuting head of the agency. As I indicated, I served 14 months supervising field operations under the Taft-Hartley Act when the independent general counsel served as the prosecuting and administrative head of the agency.

On the basis of all these experiences, it is my considered judgment that the functions of the National Labor Relations Board should be separated.

Trying to be brief, I shall list some of the reasons for this opinion:

(1) The agency deals with the most controversial and emotional of all subjects handled by administrative agencies.

(2) The Board members can handle more cases when they are not plagued with administrative and personnel problems outside their respective staffs.

I have known of instances where many hours of the time of all the members of the Board have been consumed in discussing who will be the chief attorney in one of the regional offices; and under the old set-up, a Board minute was required to be entered after the meeting of the Board itself before a person above the first two professional classifications could be promoted.

(3) There can be no charge that the Board considers cases other than on the record and in a judicial manner if it is not charged with the administration, investigation, and prosecution responsibilities.

(4) More expeditious treatment can be given to cases submitted by field offices to Washington for advice whether to prosecute, if final clearance from the Board members is never required.

(5) The staff members of the field offices enjoy a greater confidence from the parties if their orders regarding investigation and prosecution emanate from a source different from that which is also the final judgment in the case after trial. And believe me, gentlemen, in my position I heard and had illustrated to me many, many instances of that kind of situation, being in daily contact with the regional offices. The public felt that when they went to the office, whether they did or did not. That is not the point I am making. But they felt that they got a better deal if the boss of that person in the field office was not the individual who later would sit as the judge.

(6) The nature of the cases handled, the number involved and the dispersed nature of the Board's administration makes it impossible to avoid the discussion of cases from time to time with one of the parties at the Washington level while the cases are still in the investigation stage. Prior to the Taft-Hartley Act the party was never content in such circumstances unless he could talk with a Board member. Such was not only time consuming to the Board member but also did not encourage the parties to the belief that objective and judicial treatment was given when the case came before the Board on the record.

To illustrate, you gentlemen here are called upon from time to time by constituents to intercede with an administrative agent. If one party at your behest is allowed to talk to a Board member about a case that is being investigated and then later that case is tried, prosecuted, and comes before the Board as the final judge, the parties certainly feel that they are not getting the same judicial and objective treatment on the basis of the record made when both parties are present, if such is allowed. I think, in short, it is just against a fellow's nature to enjoy having the cop who arrested him pass sentence on him.

The closed shop: As long as I am able to remember the sad stories told me while I was with the Labor Board by employees who were "fired" from their jobs because they had displeased a union leader in exercising their right to freedom of speech and opinion, I cannot favor a closed shop; as to the union shop, I would approve it only to the extent that the payment of dues is required. There is also still fresh in my mind such cases as the one where a woman was denied employment in Martin Bros. Box Co. in Oakland, Oreg., because the union refused her membership card due to a personal dislike. It may be that the bargaining agent merits some form of security—I can understand that argument—but the denial to a man of his right to work in order to satisfy the whim of or to perpetuate in power one or more leaders of any organization, labor, fraternal or otherwise, is contrary to my understanding of Americanism.

Secondary boycotts: From my observation in dealing with secondary boycott cases which came before the Board while I was there, I can see no basis upon which they are justified as a general rule. Where a union applies its economic pressure to an innocent party to win a dispute with someone else it is, in my opinion, wrong. There is not now and there never should be a law which compels an employee to work if he does not want to do so. There is, and I think there should continue to be, a law by which a union can be ordered to cease applying pressure to a party with whom it has no dispute and against whom it has no complaint, except that it wants to force someone else to grant its demands.

I think Congress should note that in the vast majority of these types of cases the union ceased its boycott when a charge was filed. When I left the Board four and a half months ago these cases had considerably diminished in numbers and in severity.

I do think that the law should not require application for an injunction in these cases but should leave the question of seeking an injunction to the discretion of the prosecutor. The reason for that is that we found that many of those cases had merit, but they were not of such grave import that injunctive proceedings were warranted.

Decertification: To my mind the provision of the present law authorizing elections to determine if the employees want to continue their bargaining agent was a much-needed reform. Time and again, employees came to me while I was in the field with the Labor Board and asked, "How can we have an election to unseat the union as our bargaining agent?" The only answer I could give under the Wagner Act was "You must select another union to replace the present one." "But we don't want another union," they would say. I had to reply, "I'm sorry, then; you can't have an election."

Why should this democratic process be opposed? It is nothing more than the procedure of "recall" long practiced in democracies. It cannot hurt a union which the employees want and it does give the individuals a chance to determine democratically the tenure of their bargaining agent.

I would like at this point also to digress from the statement for a moment to include something I have omitted with respect to the rights of replacements of economic strikers to vote and the fact that the present law prohibits the strikers themselves from voting. The Supreme Court, back in 1938, in the Mackay Radio case, decided under the Wagner Act that economic strikers were not entitled to reinstatement if they had been replaced; in other words, that he had lost his employee status by taking the chance on engaging in a strike, if he had been replaced and if the strike was not caused by a law violation.

After that decision, however, the Board issued a decision in the Columbia Pictures case which nullified that Supreme Court decision to the extent that it provided that if these strikers had been replaced, both the strikers and the replacements would vote. In that Columbia Pictures case, the result was that 54 strikers voted and 50 employees who had replaced them also voted. 104 people voted with respect to 50 jobs. The strikers outnumbered the employees. The result was that the strikers voted for the union that was on strike; the people who had been replaced voted for the new union that they had chosen.

The Board certified the striking union, and still to this day the employees working in that particular unit in a Columbia Pictures—and the case occurred years ago—do not have bargaining agent because of that rule. Now, that is the background of the reason for the insertion of the provision regarding replacements voting and strikers not voting.

I think very honestly and sincerely that Congress should try to work out some kind of definition of "current labor dispute," different from the one that has been applied by the Board. The Board calls a labor dispute current as long as there is a picket marching up and down. In the St. Petersburg (Fla.) Times case, where the Board refused to find that the company had violated the law, still there was a picket line, and the employees on the job there were not, under the Wagner Act, prior to this present situation, entitled to choose a bargaining agent of their own.

If Congress could work out a definition, in my opinion, of what is a current labor dispute, something to the effect that once the operations have resumed normalcy, or returned to normalcy, the strike would no longer be current insofar as who would be eligible to vote, then I believe with all of the guarantees contained in the law, that an employer cannot interfere with, restrain, or coerce, that he cannot dominate and support a union, it would enable the employees who have replaced the strikers as permanent employees to vote and choose a union of their own choice.

I think certain changes should be made in this law, very definitely. I believe, probably, that we will not have a good feeling of labor relations among management and labor unions as long as it bears the present name. I suppose that is typically American. We get sold on something, and we just will not give up until we accomplish our objective.

Apparently, labor unions, rightly or wrongly, do not like the name "Taft-Hartley," and the members of labor unions have been taught that if that name is mentioned, they must frown. So I suppose that the name should be changed.

I think also that section 10 (l) of the present act, which is the provision requiring, or making mandatory, the application for an injunction in certain cases, should be repealed. I think the application for injunction should be discretionary rather than mandatory.

I think that the union shop election requirement should be amended, if not repealed entirely. The most that I think that it should provide is that there might be an election whereby the employees could contest the right of the union to make union shop contracts; in other words, that the first union contract could be made without an election, but that if the employees later petition for an election to determine whether or not that right should continue to exist, then the election could be held, and then only.

I say that I think it should be repealed altogether, but at the most it should provide for that kind of election.

I think the non-Communist affidavit requirement should apply to both parties and that Congress should more clearly specify what officers and persons must file.

I think that the "last offer" election provision should be repealed. That is the provision whereby the Labor Board conducts an election to determine whether the employees wish to accept the last offer of the employer as stated by him. That is the only section, incidentally, of the emergency strike title of this law that I had any experience with I did have some experience with it.

I think that section 8 (d) of the Taft-Hartley Act, which is the provision defining collective bargaining, should be amended to specify clearly the rights of the parties to a contract respecting its modification or termination.

Gentlemen, I have tried to illustrate some of the important aspects in which I think our labor-management law should be equalized. I have given much thought to this question of a fair labor law since I returned from the service. I think it is much needed. For the most part, I think that the present law has approached that equality which is necessary.

Congress will, in my opinion, do well for the country, and I include labor unions, if it does not change the existing law as radically as it is proposed to do in the bill before you.

I think the law should be given a longer test in somewhat and substantially the same form that it is now, with Congress giving constant study to the deficiencies in a deliberate and orderly fashion, not under such strains of terrific political pressure as exist today.

This field of labor-management relations, in my opinion, above all others is one where reason departs when emotion enters.

Thank you, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. At this point, the Chair would like to say that this committee cannot function legally while the House is in the Committee of the Whole considering general legislation. I am sure the members of this committee want to question the gentleman, because he has a first-hand knowledge of the questions that this committee desires information on.

In view of this fact, the committee will stand recessed until 6 o'clock tonight, at which time we will resume the questioning of the gentleman who is before this committee at the present time.

(Whereupon, at 12 noon, the subcommittee recessed until 6 p. m. of the same day.)

NIGHT SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 6 p. m.)

Mr. KELLEY. The subcommittee will please be in order.

Mr. Brooks, this morning you finished your prepared statement, and I believe you appear tonight in order to answer some questions the members might like to ask you; is that right?

TESTIMONY OF CHARLES M. BROOKS—Continued

Mr. BROOKS. That is right, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. We will proceed with that.

Mr. Jacobs, will you proceed?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Brooks, in the next 10 minutes that I have, to ask you a few questions, I want to clear one point at leact:

I believe I remember that you made the statement that unions were as strong economically as employers; am I correct about that?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you state for the record the value of the company you are now engaged by?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. For the record, as I get it from the Library of Congress, the figure is $1,116,165,.665.

Do you know the value, the total value, of the treasuries of the first 32 international unions?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. For the record, and with reference to Life Magazine as of May 31, 1948, we will let the record show that the total value of the first 32 international union treasuries' assets is $214,164,810.

Assuming those facts to be correct, Mr. Brooks, it seems to be quite a disparity; in other words, your company standing alone is worth about four times as much as the first 44 international unions' treasuries combined, if those facts are correct, and I take it you will assume for the purpose of your examination that they are?

Mr. BROOKS. I will assume that they are correct, sir. If you think that they are, I will.

Mr. JACOBS. They are not my figures. I procured the figure in reference to your company from the Library of Congress, and I have a bad habit of saving what some of our publications have to say from time to time, and file them away under an index so I can make reference to them later.

Do you have any idea—to get another comparison—as to how much the first 32 corporations in the United States are worth?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir, I do not.

Mr. JACOBS. Again, for the record—and this is a very rough figure, because my computation was hurried—it is about $88,000,000,000.

Are you aware of the fact that there are quite a number of corporations who have more assets and employees than there is wealth and population in certain States?

Mr. BROOKS. I have never seen those figures and have never compared them, so I cannot say; no, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not think that is something that would bear upon the statement that you made this morning, that the unions have acquired as much economic strength as the employer?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; because it is not germane to the thought I was putting over.

Mr. JACOBS. I am referring particularly to the statement that the unions have acquired as much economic strength.

When we speak of economic strength—

Mr. BROOKS. Would you like me to explain what I mean?

Mr. JACOBS. Let me approach it in this way: When we speak of economic strength, of course we mean the power of a man or an organization to sustain himself in an economic contest; that would be what I think. Would you accept that as a fair definition?

Mr. BROOKS. Not all-inclusive; I would accept that as one definition, one facet.

Mr. JACOBS. In what other factor did you think that the unions acquired additional economic strength?

Mr. BROOKS. Their power to claim an industry, the Nation economically, is what I had in mind.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you speaking of the so-called emergency or crisis strike, or are you speaking of the strike against some individual company that does not necessarily create a crisis?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; I had in mind, when I made that statement that the power of a union to close an industry exerted an economic strength.

Mr. JACOBS. You mean a whole industry throughout the country?

Mr. BROOKS. A whole industry, or a segment of industry, or a large corporation—take the American Telephone & Telegraph system, as one.

Mr. JACOBS. You would have, of course, a different factor there. You have a utility that has a complete monopoly?

Mr. BROOKS. That is right.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us get back to the industries we speak of as being in a free economy like your industry. The time may come when we will have to deal with the utility in an entirely different way. In your industry, do you think the right to strike in regard to any one corporation, regardless of how big it is, should be curtailed?

Mr. BROOKS. Congressman, that is an entirely different subject than what I was talking about here. It all depends on what you mean by "curtailed," and to what extent. I was not trying to give this committee the impression that I thought unions should be prohibited from striking. As a matter of fact, I stated there should be a law to compel a man to work, and the statement about the economic power was intended, as I just described—maybe it is a poor choice of words, and if it is I would like to explain it to you.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, in the last analysis, the man that goes on strike usually has very little money, and he certainly is not in a position to sustain himself as well as the owner of a business. You would agree to that?

Mr. BROOKS. That I could not answer categorically, Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. Let me ask you this question: Do you think it is fair to ask people to answer questions categorically in regard to this problem?

Mr. BROOKS. It depends on the question.

Mr. JACOBS. I had in mind particularly the General Electric questionnaire. Let us pass that for a moment and go to the other phase you testified about, in regard to decertification.

At any rate, in your mind, the provisions of section 10 (l) should be repealed? That is the mandatory injunction?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Have you read Business Week for December 18, 1948, the editorial, in which they talked about that subject? Do you agree with its conclusion?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you disagree with Fortune, for November of 1948, I suppose?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not recall that issue of Fortune.

Mr. JACOBS. How about Life for November 29?

Mr. BROOKS. Nor do I recall that.

Mr. JACOBS. I presume if you disagree with Business Week you disagree with them, because they were about the same.

Do you agree with Senator Taft in the statement he is reported as having made in regard to the same subject?

Mr. BROOKS. The statement of Senator Taft has been reported variously, and I do not know whether I agree with it or not, because I have not seen it verbatim.

Mr. JACOBS. I think that is a fair statement, because I have only seen reports in the newspapers, but I do want to ask this question: Even though you repeal section 10 (l) you would have in effect section 10 (k), which is the discretionary——

Mr. BROOKS. 10 (j).

Mr. JACOBS. That is in reference to (D) of 8 (b) (4)?

Mr. BROOKS. 10 (k) relates to 8 (b) (4) (D).

Mr. JACOBS. Ultimately, if a decertification occurred, it would be an unfair labor practice to go to a man and try to get him to refuse to work in order to coerce the employer into recognizing the old union, or bargaining with them in any way; is that correct?

Mr. BROOKS. That is not correct.

Mr. JACOBS. You say that is not correct?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You have a different construction, then, of the decertifications? Would you explain that to me?

Mr. BROOKS. The Board interpreted in the Perry-Norvell case—there is also another case, but I cannot think of the name of it right now, but it was highly publicized at the time. There was a strike out in Dayton, Ohio, and I think you probably recall it——

Mr. JACOBS. No, I do not.

Mr. BROOKS (continuing). Where a decertification election was held and the petition which was favoring the proposition to remove the union carried; in other words, the union was decertified, but in that case the strike continued, and it was interpreted—and at that time I was still with the Board—it was interpreted that 8 (b) (4) (C) does not apply to such a situation because 8 (b) (4) (C) is very explicit. It provides that any union or its agent—not any employee, but any union or its agent, which is engaging in a strike or induces the employees of any employer to engage in a strike for the purpose of forcing an employer to recognize a union when another union has been certified, is a violation. It does not prohibit—if I might continue or I will stop on this if you want.

Mr. JACOBS. I only have 1 minute.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. IRVING. I will yield all of my time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. I just had one additional question.

I just wanted to ask you, as a lawyer, if you do not think that that decision did a little violence to provision (C) under 8 (b) (4)?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; I was in on the decision, and I thought I was making a correct decision.

Mr. JACOBS. I did not know you made the decision or I would not have asked you the question.

Mr. BROOKS. I did not make it alone, but I was in on making the study. It was based on a lot of research and a lot of study.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving? You have 9 minutes.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you.

In regard to the building trades, do you consider that the unions are always responsible for the jurisdictional strikes? Can you feature any other situation where they are not?

Mr. BROOKS. If I understand—First, may I say, Congressman Irving, I am not indicting building trades craft unions, and if I said anything today that implied that I am indicting those unions because of the fact that they do engage in jurisdictional disputes, or because there are jurisdictional disputes in their industry, I would like to clarify it and say I had no such intention of indicting them, generally; but to answer your question, if I understand what a jurisdictional strike is, I would have to say it would be caused by a union.

Mr. IRVING. It would be caused by a union?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir, if you and I have the same definition in mind of jurisdictional disputes.

Mr. IRVING. I did not mean to infer the same thing you are talking about. I do know that you had indicted them. I have necessarily been away, and am not fresh on all of your testimony. I was merely asking a question. I have this idea in mind, that if a contractor or an employer wanted to put a certain craft on the work, and he knew that the work belonged historically to another craft, that that sometimes will cause a jurisdictional dispute. Getting at it from an economic standpoint, he might put the laborer on the carpenters' work or the boilermakers' or the cement finishers' work, because it was cheaper for him to do that. I think that the carpenter, or any other trade, would be justified in engaging in a very serious dispute there in the protection of their rights. That has been known to happen in many instances when the contractors chose to put a craft, whose scale was considerably less, on the work which historically and normally belonged to a more skilled craft in order to save money. That causes jurisdictional disputes sometimes, and sometimes strikes.

Mr. BROOKS. That is where the dispute arises, because one union says historically, normally, or for one reason or another, that "that work belongs to us;" and the other union says for some other reason "that work belongs to us." There you have the dispute. I think that there should be machinery established to settle that dispute in an orderly fashion so that innocent persons would not be hurt as a result of the squabble that goes on, and that is my only feeling about the matter.

Mr. IRVING. Then that is the situation that is created by management itself?

Mr. BROOKS. Congressman, I think that there have been numerous situations in the labor field that are bad that have been created by management, and I think that all evil practices of management should be curbed by law.

Mr. IRVING. There are other situations reverse from that where they may put a higher rate craft on the job because they do not like the reputation, or something else about the lower-rated craft organization, and that causes disputes. Quite often the supervisory force is from one craft or another—particularly, from the craft I mentioned, the carpenters. Because of their general knowledge of construction, many are put in as superintendents. Many of them become contractors and employers in management. They do have a feeling for their own trade, I presume, and if they show any preference, that could cause the foreman and the supervisor to be thrown out of the union picture. The unions have no control over such situations, generally speaking, unless it is something quite serious. They understand their own work, and they can get along that way; that is, by the representatives telling the foreman or superintendent: "Now, you go along in a certain fashion that we have been going along in in this district, this area, and we will have no disputes or trouble." But when they do not have that power over this supervisor, or, at least, a chance to talk to them, they often have no other recourse.

That arises particularly when a man comes from, say, the east coast or the South or Central States, or from some other territory where the rules and the jurisdiction of work is different. Then they try to put in effect the practices in their territory, and it does not work out in the new territory, wherever they are, and it causes a great many of those disputes. The thing I am trying to develop here is that there has been a great deal made out of jurisdictional disputes, many of them which are caused by managements themselves, rather than the unions.

They have a privilege under those building-trade contracts of selecting the craft the work belongs to, but many times they refuse to take that initiative, or that privilege, and thereby cause a dispute. If the contractor would say, "I have this privilege under our contract of giving the work to the craft that I think it belongs to, subject to a decision," then there would be no impasse. But when he refuses to take the responsibility that he has agreed to, it causes a dispute right there, sometimes before the work even starts, or when it is starting.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute left.

Mr. IRVING. That is all.

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, I think all that you have just said, Congressman, might be evidence that should be presented to a tribunal set up to resolve the dispute, and there are a lot of reasons that these disputes occur.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. This is the same gentleman who was testifying when I went out of the House this morning?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, it is Mr. Brooks.

Mr. WIER. I was looking for his presentation, but I do not find it here.

As I remember, you have been, in the past, a representative of the National Labor Relations Board; is that correct?

Mr. BROOKS. Was your question, Have I been?

Mr. WIER. As I see here now, you have been associated with the National Labor Relations Board as an attorney?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. When did you cease that?

Mr. BROOKS. October 15, 1948.

Mr. WIER. Last October?

Mr. BROOKS. That is right.

Mr. WIER. And previous to that you were associated with the National Labor Relations Board when it was operating under the Wagner Act?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. When did you go to work for the Board?

Mr. BROOKS. In 1937, on November 6.

Mr. WIER. Are you what they call a field man, or an attorney?

Mr. BROOKS. I have been a field trial attorney, I have been a litigation attorney, an appellate court attorney, special litigation attornel, regional attorney, acting regional director, associate field chief of the section in Washington, a member of the Clearance Section in Washington and finally, under the Taft-Hartley Act, during the last 14 months, I was associated general counsel in charge of all the field offices, the 28 regional and subregional offices.

Mr. WIER. That is quite a field you have covered.

What have you been doing since October?

Mr. BROOKS. As I stated in there, on October 18 I joined the legal staff of the Texas Co., specializing in labor law.

Mr. WIER. Are you here now representing management in that capacity as counsel for the Texas Co.?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. During the era of the Wagner Act did you feel at that time, previous to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act, that the Wagner Act was not functioning properly?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Did you ever testify to that effect?

Mr. BROOKS. I was never called upon to do so, and at the time there were hearings I was in a rather insignificant position, and as a result would not have been called upon, and was not called upon to testify publicly. I have stated privately that opinion.

Mr. WIER. You offered no testimony during the hearing held by this committee in the Eightieth Congress?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir.

Mr. WIER. Your work has been confined almost exclusively to Washington and New York, then?

Mr. BROOKS. I have served as regional attorney in the Seattle district, covering the States of Washington, Indiana, Oregon, and the Territory of Alaska.

I have served in the San Francisco district, covering northern California and Utah. I have served in Los Angeles, in the Los Angeles office, covering southern California and Arizona. I have served in the Fort Worth office, covering Texas, New Mexico, and Oklahoma.

Mr. WIER. You have been around the world, apparently.

That was my only interest, Mr. Chairman. I am not going to take up the time of the committee on this testimony, because it is vague in my memory right now, and I just wanted to know what brought him here to testify in this capacity as a former representative of the Board.

Mr. BROOKS. I would like to answer that question, Congressman, as to what brought me here.

Mr. WIER. That is what I am trying to get.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not here as a representative for management. I stated that I do not know whether or not my company agrees with this, or not. I did not show my statement to the company. The only thing that I have done is to call upon my experiences and put down here what I think, to try to help the Congress of my country, with my right to testify and petition, and hoping that it would be of some value to this committee, which I believe wants to write a good labor law. As I indicated, I have thought about this problem for a long time, and Mr. Lucas, who is a personal friend of mine, asked me in the very beginning, since I was no longer with the Government, if I would be willing to testify. I said that I would like to and arrangements were made whereby I could testify, and here I am, sir.

Mr. WIER. In your present capacity, are you located in Texas?

Mr. BROOKS. In New York City, in the home office.

Mr. WIER. How did Mr. Lucas locate you?

Mr. BROOKS. Because I was born and raised in Texas and went to school with Mr. Lucas in Texas, and have voted all my life in Texas, and am still a Texan.

Mr. WIER. I guess that answers my question.

That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. And in America, it is one of your rights to quit your job when you can get a better one?

Mr. BROOKS. I was very happy to have the pleasure of doing this, sir.

Mr. SMITH. You are just here expressing your rights as an American citizen?

Mr. BROOKS. Well, expressing my opinion, as I said, and believing that I have a right, plus the fact that I think that my Congress wants it for whatever it might be worth.

Mr. SMITH. I am sorry that I did not get here to hear all of your testimony.

I yield the balance of my time to Mr. Nixon.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Nixon, you have about 19 minutes.

Mr. NIXON. I have only one question, Mr. Chairman.

I may say that I heard Mr. Brooks' statement this morning, and I thought he made a real contribution to the thinking of the committee, regardless of where we may stand on the issues which he discussed. Also, in view of his long experience in labor relations, I wonder if he would have a comment on an event which just occurred. It has just been announced that Mr. John L. Lewis has called a 2-week coal strike.

Now, as you know, there is a difference between the administration version of the bill which the committee is considering, and the Taft-Hartley Act on the methods that are available to stop strikes which impair or threaten the national security and the national health and safety. And in behalf of the administration version of the bill, which does not provide for the use of an injunction to stop such a strike, the Secretary of Labor has testified that if we have a mandatory cooling-off period, public opinion will be sufficient to stop such strikes.

Do you feel that looking at this strike, public opinion will be sufficient to stop Mr. Lewis' present coal strike?

Mr. Brooks. Congressman Nixon, I wish I could answer that. I do not profess to be qualified to answer it. I have tried to limit what I say to something for which I can call upon experiences that I have had, and I have had very little dealing with the mine workers' union, and none in that regard.

Mr. Perkins. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. Kelley. Just a minute, please.

Mr. Brooks. I might say this, that that illustrates what I had in mind when I said that unions possess economic power equal to the employees with whom they deal, and that is the economic effect that will be felt as a result of that action.

As to whether public opinion will stop the strike, I do not think I could contribute very much to the committee as to what I think about it. I have a thought, but I cannot prove it, and cannot disprove it.

Mr. Perkins. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman from California yield?

Mr. Nixon. Yes.

Mr. Perkins. I want to ask the gentleman if he understands that there is more than 70,000,000 tons of coal at this time on top of the ground, and that this is no strike that Mr. Lewis has called. Do you understand that or not?

Mr. Nixon. Are you asking the witness a question?

Mr. Perkins. I am asking you, Mr. Nixon.

Mr. Nixon. I think the gentleman's comments are directed to the point as to whether or not, first, when Mr. Lewis calls out the men, it is a strike. I will not argue the technical matter. I think that probably the fact that the men leave the job and stay out for a length of time could be called a strike. If Mr. Lewis chooses to call it something else, that is all right with me. I will not argue the point.

The second point that you are interested in, apparently, is whether or not the fact that there are 70,000 tons of coal——

Mr. Perkins. Seventy million.

Mr. Nixon. Seventy million tons of coal on hand would in any way change the question which I raised.

In my question, I did not indicate that this was at the present time or would be held to be in the future a strike which imperiled the national health and safety.

My question was whether or not in a strike of this sort, public opinion would be sufficient to stop it.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you know whether or not Mr. Lewis is allowed to call out his men under his contract when he has ample tonnage of coal on the ground for use and when there is no emergency existing? Do you know whether or not under his contract he is permitted to do that?

Mr. NIXON. If the gentleman is questioning me as to what Mr. Lewis' contract is with the coal operators, I would say that the best evidence of that would be to have the contract before the committee. I do know this, that in the past on several occasions Mr. Lewis has called what I might call strikes——

Mr. PERKINS. Just answer the question.

Mr. NIXON. Let me continue. I will answer your question. I yielded the time, and you have no right to interrupt, as the chairman well knows.

Mr. KELLEY. Proceed.

Mr. NIXON. When Mr. Lewis calls what I might call a strike but which you might call something else, but on which the men do not work, there have been occasions in the past when strikes have been called in which the national health and safety have been considered by most people to have been imperiled.

My only question is as to whether or not in this case, if it does appear at some time in the future during the course of the walk-out that the national health and safety are imperiled, whether or not the law that the administration recommends would be adequate to protect the national health and safety.

Now, on that point I think we probably have the basis for disagreement. The gentleman apparently believes that the new law is adequate. I am of the opinion that it is not. As to the nature of the strike, as to the impact it will have on the economy, those matters will be determined as the strike proceeds.

That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Brooks, I was here for some of your remarks this morning. I am sorry that I had to leave. I am also sorry that I had to bring you back here this evening; but, as you have probably found out already, there are some members of our committee who work better at night than they do in the daytime.

I do not know whether in your remarks—I have not had the opportunity to read them—you made any statement about the right of free speech on the part of both parties.

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir; I did, and I omitted it in the interest of time this morning.

Mr. WERDEL. You did omit it?

Mr. BROOKS. I did not read it. There is a reference on page 11 to the free-speech section of the act, and I suppose that I should elaborate on the last sentence, in view of the fact that one or two people who have read this have indicated they did not understand what I meant.

Mr. WERDEL. I wish you would.

Mr. BROOKS. I used terminology there that was frequently used by members of the staff of the Labor Board, because it so frequently occurred in Labor Board decisions.

My statement there says that some kind of clarification as is contained in section 8 (c) of the Taft-Hartley Act prohibiting the Board from finding an unfair labor practice based upon a statement which was not coercive or did not contain a promise of benefit should be included in the law. The use by the Board of statements as background to support unfair labor practices should be used guardedly, if at all.

What I had in mind by the "background" is this: When I went with the Labor Board in 1937 under the Wagner Act, to my surprise, I was advised rather early in the day that when we prosecuted an employer we should go back and put into the record everything that the company had done and that any representative in managerial capacity had said, at least to 1933, which was 2 years prior to the enactment of the Wagner Act. And the reason given to me for doing that was, it was "background."

That practice continued all through my experience with the Wagner Act until it was repealed in 1947, being used gradually to a lesser degree. It worked like this: An employer would make a statement to his employees, or at a chamber of commerce meeting, or in a church yard or some place, to the effect that in his opinion unions were more detrimental than beneficial, or something to that effect. If we could prove that, though it had no relation directly to the charge which was being prosecuted, we put it into the record, and very frequently the attorneys on the review stand would make much of that in writing the Board's decision, to illustrate that this employer was antiunion and, therefore, since he was antiunion, the Board could infer and would and did infer that a discharge or some other allegation was in violation of the law, and that the allegation was true, because of this antiunion feeling.

Of course, the Board had gotten much better in that respect through its own efforts and through the efforts of the courts by 1947, as a result of the Tube Bending decision in the second circuit, and the Thomas v. Collins decision in the Supreme Court, the Board placed less reliance upon these background statements.

But I felt in writing that statement that the Board should use, very guardedly, as I say, very rarely if at all, this background information unless it is directly connected.

Now, if you could establish in the case of a discharge that the employer representative had said, "I expect to discharge that man who is a union leader if I get a chance," of course that statement in and of itself contains the coercion and the threat, and certainly applies. So my feeling was that some kind of protection or some kind of clarification as to the manner that the Board would use such statements should be contained in the law. It has nothing to do with whether or not it is admitted into the record. As a matter of fact, very early under the Taft-Hartley Act, I issued a statement to all of the field offices to the effect that—I might mention this, because it is in the labor-management relations report of the joint committee, and it illustrates something that has been discussed here in my presence yesterday by other witnesses with respect to the difference in disability of the evidence, and the application that the Board can give to it. Section 8 (b) restricts the use that the Board can make of it, and not whether it would be admitted into the record. And in the general counsel's name, I issued this statement very shortly after the Taft-Hartley Act became law:

In future hearings, Board attorneys should request the trial examiners to admit in evidence all utterances which might conceivably be found coercive, since the competency of such utterances cannot well be determined until the conclusion of the hearing, and the Board should have an opportunity to pass upon such evidence. No prejudice can, of course, result to any party from the admission of doubtful utterances which are later found by the Board to be privileged under the new law, there being neither a jury to be influenced thereby nor findings based thereon.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel, you have 1 minute left.

Mr. WERDEL. Very well.

Mr. BROOKS. I am sorry I took so much of your time, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. WERDEL. That is all right.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Chairman, I yield my time to Mr. Werdel.

Mr. KELLEY. All right.

Mr. WERDEL. Then it is your opinion, as I gather it, that there should be some reasonable ground on which the employer can state his position to his employees provided there is no coercion or threat?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes.

Mr. WERDEL. Do you think that we ought also to maintain the provision in the act with regard to strikes by Government employees?

Mr. BROOKS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. And there is one other question I wanted to ask you about the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act prohibiting a labor organization from exacting payments from employers for services which are not performed or not to be performed.

Mr. BROOKS. That is section 8 (b) (6), which is commonly called the featherbedding section.

Mr. WERDEL. There are three cases in New York City where labor leaders are under indictment now, I believe, for calling strikes without any desire on the part of the employees to strike. They have called the strikes, and then they have charged so much to take the picket line off. I believe they are being handled under that section, too.

Mr. BROOKS. I am not familiar with those cases you mentioned. We did have, while I was with the Board, a few section 8 (b) (6) cases, featherbedding cases. It so happened that in all but two of those cases the moment that an attorney was brought into the case by the union, the practice was stopped and the charge was settled, with the exception of two cases, and one of those was a case up in Connecticut where the musicians wanted what they would have received had they played, and all they would do was play what they called an overture and a chaser at the beginning and end, respectively, of the program. The other one was the Conway Express case in up-State New York where the Teamsters' Union required the employer to pay the wages that the truck drivers would receive between Albany and New York in order for the companies to be privileged to ship the trailers down by boat from Albany to New York. So the drivers spent the night at the hotel drawing their pay in the same manner that they would. And those are the two cases I know of wthat we prosecuted to a successful conclusion. The others were all settled, to my knowledge.

Mr. WERDEL. Based upon your experience, is it your opinion that we need that provision or something similar to it maintained in the new act?

Mr. BROOKS. It had a most wholesome effect. And the fact that there have been so few cases should not determine whether it is valuable. I certainly think it should be in the law; yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr Brooks, I personally want to thank you for your appearance here. I know that this committee will probably try to come out with something that is workable. I think you have helped us a great deal.

I waive the balance of my time to Mr. Velde.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Velde, you have 6 minutes.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Brooks, I, too, appreciate your coming here. I think you have demonstrated by your testimony that you have a very excellent background.

I would like to come back to this question of national-emergency strikes. I know that you did not prefer to answer Mr. Nixon's question. Maybe I can ask you a slightly different question about it.

Mr. BROOKS. I will be glad to give you my opinion. I cannot back it up with any facts or experiences. That is all I meant.

Mr. VELDE. I would like to have your opinion on it.

Mr. BROOKS. My opinion is that there should be a legal method similar, if not identical, to that contained in the present act dealing with such strikes. I think that the procedures that must be gone through before the injunction is sought can be clarified. I think that the exact termination date of the injunction and what must be done to terminate it can be clarified. But I feel—and this is my personal opinion—that the present proposed bill is woefully inadequate in a modern-day society where unions can cripple the economy of the Nation in a short time. I think it is woefully inadequate to deal with it and the threatened consolidated interest in the strike in New York City recently was something that illustrated that, to my mind, when the papers started telling what would happen if they did strike.

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Brooks, some have referred to inherent power in the President to stop such strikes. Do you know of any such power that is provided by our Constitution or laws which would allow the President to stop a strike in a national emergency?

Mr. BROOKS. Mr. Chairman, I do not profess to be a constitutional lawyer, but I have looked at it just a little bit. I have not found anything that anyone has said or anything that I have read to persuade me that the power exists. And I would say that as far as I personally am concerned, if it does exist, I think Congress should repeal it right away, or there should be a constitutional amendment.

Mr. VELDE. Have you testified before the Senate committee?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir. I filed a statement with the Senate committee, a very brief statement, dealing principally with the effect that the change in the law had had upon the personnel of the Board, illustrating that they felt that a two-way street was better than a one-way street and that the two-edged Taft-Hartley Act was better than the one-sided, to use a much overworked term, Wagner Act. I did not go into arguments regarding the different provisions. I filed that with the Senate committee.

Mr. VELDE. Thank you very much. That is all I have, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins, do you have any questions?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes, Mr. Chairman.

There has been injected into the record here this evening the action that the President of the United Mine Workers has taken calling out the coal miners protesting the appointment of Mr. Boyd as head of the Bureau of Mines. When you were testifying a few minutes ago in that connection, did you mean to imply that there was an emergency in existence in the coal fields at this time?

Mr. BROOKS. No, sir; because I have not even read the news account of that yet. This is the first I had heard of it: so I have no opinion whether it is an emergency, and I do not have facts at my disposal as to whether it would be an emergency if it occurs. So if I did imply that, Congressman, I did not intend to, because I do not know.

Mr. PERKINS. From your experience, if you were heading an organization and understood the management of your organization better than anyone else, and you felt that someone was being put in charge of the department that affected your employees, who was inexperienced in that field, would you have any reluctance about calling your men out from work for a couple of weeks, especially if your contract justified it?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Chairman, on a point of order: We are getting along late in the evening here, and our time is limited. I believe the gentleman is just making an effort here to use the committee as a sounding board to whitewash Mr. Lewis.

This man has no opinions relevant to any subject before this committee and the question stated. I make the point of order that we proceed with the next witness.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KELLEY. The Chair will say this, that the gentleman has had vast experience in the National Labor Relations Board, under the old act and under the new act. And I think the question that was directed is perfectly in order and germane to the subject which we are discussing.

Mr. WERDEL. Speaking to my motion, Mr. Chairman, if a member of the committee wants to state anything on behalf of Mr. Lewis, let us put it in quickly and get on with our business.

Mr. KELLEY. His question is in order. If the gentleman does not want to answer it, he does not need to.

Proceed.

Mr. PERKINS. Go ahead.

Mr. BROOKS. I will do my best to give you my personal opinion on that, and once again, I do not know how much it is worth.

I personally feel that the leader of the labor organization has no such right to exercise the power that this particular leader has, to call the men out on strike, tell them to cease working, cease drawing their pay, for any length of time, to protest the appointment of a Federal official, any more than I would feel that group of employers would be privileged, or would have the right, to close up their businesses to protest your election to Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. You have never known of any time that the welfare of this country has suffered by reason of any action of John L. Lewis, have you?

Mr. BROOKS. Congressman, I know that a lot of people have said that it has suffered. I know that they have painted dire pictures——

Mr. PERKINS. I am just asking you if you know?

Mr. BROOKS. Let me think. I am not sure. I think I will have to answer that that I cannot think of any right now that I can point to.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask you if there was ever a time when Mr. Lewis called out his men that he did not have more than 30,000,000 tons of coal on hand?

Mr. BROOKS. I do not know the answer to that.

Mr. PERKINS. To get back to the point——

Mr. NIXON. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. PERKINS. No.

Mr. NIXON. I yielded to you three times.

Mr. PERKINS. Let me get on to this point; then I will yield to you.

Mr. NIXON. All right.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, is it your contention that an emergency creates power—national emergencies? Or what is your opinion about that?

Mr. BROOKS. Your question is, is it my opinion that an emergency creates power?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. BROOKS. That is a tough one to answer. I do not know the import of your question.

Mr. PERKINS. Within the province of the President in the execution of the laws.

Mr. BROOKS. Well, I certainly know this. Mr. Congressman, that by law certain kinds of emergencies, if declared to be such by either Congress or the President, do create certain kinds of powers; yes. I know there is such a thing as emergency powers.

Mr. PERKINS. At this point, I want to make an observation that his opinion is contrary to the law as stated in the case of Home Owners Building & Loan Association v. Blaisdell (290 U. S. 398). That case held that an emergency does not create any power, but that an emergency may afford a reason for the exertion of a living power not already employed.

Mr. BROOKS. The only good thing I can say about myself is that I was right. That was a tough question. And you have now proved what I said a moment ago, that I am not a constitutional lawyer.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, you have stated that you were of the opinion that something should be in the law to handle national emergencies. I will ask you if you know what article II, section 3 of the Constitution provides?

Mr. BROOKS. I cannot quote it, sir.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you know that all the legal authorities hold that the National Government has an inherent power to deal with national emergencies within constitutional limits?

Mr. BROOKS. If all the legal authorities agree on that, that is the only thing I ever heard of that all legal authorities agree on.

Mr. PERKINS. All right. I will side-shoot the cases Wilson v. New, and Block v. Hirsh (256 U. S. 135) and any other cases cited therein.

Now, going back to the question of emergencies——

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute left, Mr. Perkins.

Mr. PERKINS. Article II, section 3, of the United States Constitution provides that "he shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed."

What do you construe that to mean in time of national emergency?

Mr. BROOKS. That means a lot. It means that he is to see that the laws are executed. That is about the most that I can say.

Mr. NIXON. Will the gentleman yield to me? Otherwise his time will be up.

Mr. PERKINS. Article II, section 1, of the United States Constitution, also provides for the grant of a general power to carry out his duties as the administrative head of the Government.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. All the time has expired.

Thank you very much, Mr. Brooks. We appreciate your coming here.

Mr. BROOKS. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. The next witness is Mr. Robert R. Grunsky, chairman of the California Metal Trades Association.

You may proceed when you are ready.

STATEMENT OF ROBERT R. GRUNSKY, CHAIRMAN, CALIFORNIA METAL TRADES ASSOCIATION

Mr. GRUNSKY. Mr. Chairman and members of the House Committee on Education and Labor, my name is Robert R. Grunsky. I am managing director of the California Metal Trades Association, and the following statement is presented on behalf of 300 employers, members of the California Metal Trades Association, who comprise the principal metal trades operations in the San Francisco Bay area.

The California Metal Trades Association is not a trade association but was organized in 1890 to represent its members in labor-relations matters. The association has been dealing with organized labor for the past 58 years, and at the present time negotiates with 12 unions for its 300 members. Many of our contracts are group or master contracts covering as high as a hundred and sixty-six employers under one contract.

I wish to emphasize that it is not an antiunion association, or a grouping of employers for the purpose of breaking labor. I would like to say originally in 1890 the association was set up for the purpose of preventing the organization of unions in the San Francisco Bay area. However, in the early twenties its policy abruptly changed, and it is not now and will not, as long as I have anything to do with it, have any policy along those lines. Its policy is to deal fairly with organized labor to the end that the employers may continue to operate their organizations at a profit while retaining those functions of management which rightfully belong to management.

Our association is made up of small employers. I would like to introduce for the record here the names and the number of employees involved in the association which I represent. I have copies here, Mr. Chairman, if you wish me to give them to you now.

Mr. KELLEY. Without objection, they will be received and filed for reference.

Mr. GRUNSKY. Over 86 percent of the members of the association employ less than 100 employees. The largest single member of the association employs less than 1,000 employees.

So it is on behalf of the small employer, the small jobbing shop, and the small manufacturer in the metal trades field that I submit this testimony.

It is my understanding that your committee is interested in specific cases, not generalities, concerning changes and improvements in labor-management relations due directly to the Taft-Hartley Act. I intend to be specific.

First, may I refer you to section 8 (a) (4) (D) of the Taft-Hartley Act, the provision pertaining to jurisdictional disputes and work stoppages.

Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act employers of the California Metal Trades Association were involved in an average of four to five jurisdictional disputes and work stoppages each year. These disputes mainly involved the 30-year-old dispute between the millwrights and the machinists for the jurisdiction of installing and erecting machinery. Since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act there has not been a single work stoppage involving any employer of the association over the question of work jurisdiction.

This is certainly a record of improved labor-management relations. Although the proposed administration bill does not make a jurisdictional strike an unfair labor practice, this bill does not have the teeth of responsibility and the penalty of possible suit for damages that are contained in the Taft-Hartley provisions, and it is our fear that it will not, for this reason, be effective in preventing jurisdictional strikes.

Take a case of jurisdictional strike. By the time an unfair-labor-practice charge is processed through the National Labor Relations Board and a cease-and-desist order is issued by the Board, such order would be in effect an obituary to the employer whose business was long since dead from the effects of the jurisdictional strike.

With reference to the non-Communist affidavit, section 9 (b) (H) of the Taft-Hartley Act, I wish to state that as a direct result of this requirement to file non-Communist affidavits, the membership of local 1304, CIO Machinists, an affiliate of the United Steelworkers of America, in an election held in June 1948 completely cleaned out all left-wing officers and business agents of the local and in this election over 30 officers and representatives who were known to be left-wing or Communists were swept out of office. This was merely part of a campaign on the Pacific coast by the United Steelworkers to clean up their locals.

Further, the Grand Lodge of the International Association of Machinists was encouraged and backed by the provisions of this law to remove from office all business agents and officers who were either left-wing or would not, or could not, take the non-Communist oath in lodge 68, the largest machinist local in the San Francisco Bay area, and in lodge 1176, Tool and Die Makers.

There certainly should be no doubt in the minds of your committee that this action resulted in improved labor-management relations and I know that there is no doubt in the minds of the employers whom I represent.

The administration bill contains no provisions requiring the filing of non-Communist affidavits and I wish to go on record as definitely recommending that this provision be retained in the interest of improved labor-management relations and also in the interest of our national security.

For example, although Harry Bridges has been given a clean bill of health as far as being a Communist is concerned, there is no question in San Francisco or on the Pacific coast as to the leanings of his union and many of the union officers. He has stated that if his union could get control of the water front on both sides of this country, he could effectively shut down the commerce and trade of the United States.

I ask your committee to consider what effect a Communist-controlled machinist union might have on our war effort in the event of a national emergency.

With further reference to the non-Communist affidavits, I wish to go on record as stating that the employers and staff members of the California Metal Trades Association are willing, and do recommend, that non-Communist affidavits be filed by employers and their agents as well as by union officers and agents handling labor-relations matters.

I now refer you to section 8(b) (4) (B) unfair labor practices on the part of the unions, and section 9(c) (1) (B) the right of an employer to petition the National Labor Relations Board for a representation election where employees or a union have presented him with a claim to be recognized for purposes of collective bargaining.

Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act some of the unions with which we deal refused to use the processes of the National Labor Relations Board for the purpose of determining questions of representation with small employers.

I emphasize again the "small" employers. We are little fellows.

The Machinists Union, lodge 68, under Hook and Dillon refused to recognize the Board or use any of its processes. An employer in San Francisco, when pressed with a demand for recognition, had a choice to make between accepting a strike and picketing of his plant, or recognizing the union as the collective-bargaining agent without the employees having the right to vote, or to determine for themselves their bargaining rights.

Since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act containing the provisions referred to we have had no cases in which any union with whom we deal has refused to use the processes of the National Labor Relations Board for the purpose of determining the collective-bargaining rights of the employees.

Can there be any question in the minds of your committee that this change of attitude on the part of the unions, from the use of economic force for the purpose of recognition to the use of the National Labor Relations Board, is not an improvement in labor relations for the small employers or for the employees of these employers?

Here again the proposed administration bill falls down from the standpoint of labor-management relations in that there are no provisions giving the employers the right to petition for an election or making a recognition strike by a union, without using the processes of the National Labor Relations Board, an unfair labor practice.

Section 8 (b) in its entirety and section 2 (5) deal with the union officers' responsibility for their acts and for unfair labor practices of the unions.

As a direct result of these provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, and the fact that the unions and their officers were given responsibility commensurate ith their position in the American industrial life, the employers of our association were able to negotiate fair and firm no-strike-no-lock-out clauses in all agreements.

What was the result of this union responsibility? Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act and throughout the war period, in the 60 foundries which are members of the association in northern California there was an average of one authorized or unauthorized work stoppage per month, notwithstanding a no-strike clause in the contract.

The record of Lodge 68 of the machinists' union under Business Agents Hook and Dillon has been well publicized for the number of work stoppages that occurred during the war period, and has even been read into the Congressional Record. Since the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act there has not been a single work stoppage during the life of a contract in any plant with any union with whom the association deals.

Although section 204 of the administration bill recites that it shall be the responsibility of employers and employees to make every effort to negotiate no-strike clauses, this section is apparently meaningless and unenforcible by reason of the fact that there are no teeth in the measure in that unions and their officers have been relieved of their responsibility for violation of contract, as well as our employers. We are now in receipt of demands from several metal trades unions for complete elimination of all no-strike clauses.

Based on the record there is no doubt that it is in the interest of the public, employers and employees that any legislation continue the responsibility of unions and employers to live up to their contracts.

The administration bill proposes the return of the Conciliation Service to the Department of Labor, whereas the Taft-Hartley Act set this service up as an independent agency.

Prior to the passage of the Taft-Hartley Act and the setting up of the Conciliation Service as an independent agency, our employers either refused to deal with the Conciliation Service or looked upon them as business agents of the union, and their effectiveness in aiding or settling disputes was about what you would expect with such an attitude on the part of the employers.

Since the Taft-Hartley Act has been in effect there has been a complete change of attitude on the part of the employers I represent. They feel that this is an independent agency and in 1948 the Conciliation Service did effective work in bringing to settlement the three major strikes which occurred between the Association and the unions.

The employers look on the Department of Labor as a department set up to aid and assist labor to the same extent that the Department of Commerce is set up to aid and assist business. If the Conciliation Service is returned to the Department of Labor, whether their feelings are based on fact or fiction, there is no doubt in my mind that the Conciliation Service would again return to the ineffective role it played prior to becoming an independent agency as far as the California Metal Trades Association is concerned.

The unions' claim of damage under the Taft-Hartley Act cannot be substantiated on the basis of the facts with the employer members of the California Metal Trades Association. Here are the facts: During the past year 22 contracts were negotiated.

Fourteen union authorization elections were held covering these contracts by the National Labor Relations Board. The Board procedure was conducted smoothly in adequate time for negotiations even though there were many serious problems involving multiple employer bargaining units covering from 60 to 88 firms in one authorization election.

Three major strikes occurred over purely economic differences of opinion. In not one instance was the Taft-Hartley Act or any of its provisions the cause of an issue or dispute which resulted in strike. All unions resorted to grievance procedure and arbitration rather than economic means in settling questions arising over the interpretation or the application of the agreements.

All this occurred in one of the strongest union and most highly organized areas in the United States. I don't believe this indicates damage to unions, in our experience, at any rate. Does it not again indicate improved labor-management relations?

In summary, and in behalf of these small employers, I wish to state:

(1) The antijurisdictional dispute legislation resulted in definite improvement in labor-management relations. These provisions should be retained, including the right to sue unions for violation.

(2) Non-Communist affidavits resulted in clean-up of troublesome and left-wing unions. These provisions should be retained and expanded to include employers and their agents.

(3) The right of employers to petition for representation elections and the requirement that the unions use the National Labor Relations Board processes rather than economic action extended the protection of the National Labor Relations Board's democratic processes to the small employer and his employees. Such provisions should be retained.

(4) The provisions of the act requiring union officers and agents to be responsible for living up to contracts resulted in the complete elimination of authorized or unauthorized work stoppages during the life of our agreements. Such responsibility on the part of the unions is in the interest of all and should be retained.

(5) The Conciliation Service was an effective aid in settling disputes for members of our association during the period of time which it has been an independent agency. It was not effective prior to this time. This service should be retained as an independent agency and should not be returned to the Department of Labor.

(6) Our record shows that the union authorization elections have not damaged or weakened the position of the unions, nor have they been prevented from using their economic strength for the purpose of attaining legitimate gains. These provisions should be retained.

In conclusion I wish to point out that labor today is the dominant force, both politically and economically, in the industrial life of the United States. The students of labor relations today realize that we are changing over, if we have not done so already, from a capital economy to a labor economy. From the record and the pressures being applied toward legislation it is apparent that labor is not willing to voluntarily assume the responsibility commensurate with its position in our country today. The Taft-Hartley Act gave them this responsibility by legislation and it appears necessary to continue this responsibility in any revision of labor legislation.

I wish to thank you for the opportunity of presenting this evidence to your committee for consideration.

Mr. KELLEY. I don't think there are any questions from any of the members. You are going to get off easy tonight.

Mr. GRUNSKY. I will enjoy that.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Grunsky.

Next we will hear from Mr. Donald A. Morgan.

TESTIMONY OF DONALD A. MORGAN, ON BEHALF OF ILLINOIS STATE CHAMBER OF COMMERCE

Mr. MORGAN. I am Donald A. Morgan, a lawyer, of Peoria, Ill. I appear, with your kind permission, on behalf of the Illinois State Chamber of Commerce. That chamber is composed of 8,600 Illinois businessmen from all types of enterprise, in 241 communities in Illinois. A few of the enterprises are, of course large, but the vast majority of the business furnishing its membership are small.

Since 1946, the chamber, through its Personnel and Labor Relations Committee, has given intensive study to the problems of labor-management relationship, and since the spring of 1948 has conducted an extensive survey among its membership in the course of its study.

The Illinois State Chamber of Commerce agrees wholeheartedly with a statement made by the President of the United States, in June of 1946, when he said:

> We accomplish nothing by striking at labor here, at management there. There should be no emphasis placed upon considerations of whether a bill is antilabor or prolabor. * * * Equality for both and vigilance for the public welfare—these should be the watchwords of future legislation.

It is fundamental that successful handling of the relationship between labor and management is of the gravest importance to all of us. The employee, the consumer and the employer, whether he be an individual owner, an investor, or a hired manager, constitute the public; each of us falls in one or more of these groups.

Among those classes, as they have come to be called, to be sure there is a sharp conflict of interest, but the paramount interest of all is that the relationship succeed. Our standard of living, our economic system, our democratic society and its government, even our ability to survive as a free and independent people in the world today and tomorrow, depends upon the maintenance and encouragement of our free economic system and its productive might, supported by the cooperative efforts of employers and employees developed through free and fair bargaining between them.

If these facts are true, and we have the entire history of the greatest nation in the world to prove them, and the lives and liberty of our sons to risk if we fail to heed them, then the only question we dare be guided by in connection with the enactment of labor laws is whether the proposed changes will benefit the public interest. The public is interested in collective bargaining not only to the extent that it function, and strikes and interruptions be avoided, but also, and to a much greater extent, in what the bargaining produces in the way of a sound and workable relationship consistent with the realities and necessities of a productive economy under a free and democratic society.

This is not, or should not be, a private fight between labor unions and management. Yet it would appear to be so. The only attempt to justify H. R. 2032 is that the legislation it would repeal is "anti-labor" and the repeal, therefore, is "prolabor." The public interest in the matter is not discussed or considered. We believe that that approach is no less absurd than it would be for business to demand, merely because it thought it could, that the Congress repeal the antitrust laws, the Securities Act, or the Corrupt Practices Act because they are "antibusiness" and without regard for the public interest in the matter.

Legislation enacted at the request and for the benefit of a special group will be repealed and reenacted with the vagaries of the political fortunes of pressure groups, and it will contribute only confusion. The only legislation that can become woven into the fabric of our system is that which is required by and designed for the benefit of all.

The Congress of the United States, by tremendous majorities and with little regard for party lines, has enacted labor-management legislation in the public interest. We believe, as President Truman has stated, that anyone seeking to change the existing laws should be required to prove to the Congress how the suggested changes will benefit the public interest, as against special or private interests.

We believe that the public interest requires a fair labor-management relations code, and that it should recognize the following fundamental principles:

(1) The public interest requires that the parties have equality of rights and obligations and be treated fairly by government.

The business manager is literally in the middle. He is required to divide the economic advantages of the business among the employee, who wants higher wages, the consumer, who wants lower prices, and the investor, who wants a return on his investment, and he is subject to intense pressure from each. If he fails to make the proper division, the business will inevitably fail, and jobs and wealth will be lost to the public. If the law gives the manager duties and obligations only and the labor organization all of the rights and remedies, the manager will be wholly unable to work out the division required of him, he will lose his customers and investors, or both, and his enterprise will fail. Obviously both parties, if either, must be required to bargain in good faith. If no such requirement is set, the union will have a perfect right not to bargain, or to bargain in bad faith, and a poor deal will inevitably result.

If collective bargaining agreements are to mean anything, there must be mutuality of obligation and adequate remedy available to each party for a breach of the agreement by the others. It is not the remedy itself that is important; it is the compulsion to responsibility by the presence of the remedy. In the summer and fall of 1947, many responsible union leaders advised their members that because of the remedy provided, they must abide by their agreements, and no one can deny that such advice is in the public interest. And if that responsibility is to be achieved as a practical matter, both unions and employers must be answerable for the acts of their representatives under the established law of agency.

Simple fairness requires that the tribunal established to administer the law should be impartial, that investigative, prosecutive and judicial functions should be completely separated, and that the hearings should be conducted under rules of evidence and procedure that would prevent decisions dictated by bias, whim or caprice, and give opportunity for adequate judicial review. It seems basic to us too that both employers and employees should have access to the tribunal for the remedy of wrongs and determination of representatives.

(2) The public interest requires that fundamental freedoms be preserved and protected.

The American system is based upon the inviolability of the individual and his rights. Those rights should not be infringed, except in absolute necessity in the public interest, and we should not overlook some, in the zeal to protect others.

Individual employees should have the free choice of their representative, subject only to the free will of the majority of their fellow employees, and they should be protected from interference, restraint or coercion in their choice, not only by employers but by the representatives involved. The right of an employee not to join a union and not to be represented by one is no less sacred and should not be overlooked.

Certainly the right of an individual to quit, and his right to strike, unless he has agreed not to, should be preserved. But the law should also protect his right to work and to keep his job, even though someone else thinks he should not. Mass picketing, coercion, intimidation and violence in derogation of his right to work should be prevented. The closed shop, at least in the case of closed unions, is an indefensible monopoly of the labor market and cannot be justified as a union security device.

The union shop, on the other hand, based upon the free will of a majority of the employees, is perhaps a legitimate union security demand, if it requires only that the individual employee pay his fair share of the cost of his representation. Both the closed shop and the unrestricted union shop permit the union representative to determine whether an individual may or may not be a member, and thus amount to a denial of the right to work.

The freedom of speech of employers, employees an dunion representatives should be preserved by all means, but that right should not be permitted, in this field any more than any other, to be exercised as an excuse for violence, force or intimidation under its guise.

(3) The public interest requires that the Government prevent artificial restraints on productivity and efficiency of operations.

Make-work, stand-by, work limitation, and other feather-bedding practices and opposition to the introduction of more efficient methods, equipment and materials, must be prevented by law. The inevitable result of any of these practices is to reduce the standard of living, by making goods more expensive or less available. Such practices are wholly inconsistent with the indisputable fact that our standard of living depends upon the greatest production of goods, material and service, with the least cost, time and effort.

Secondary, sympathetic and jurisdictional strikes and boycotts, those directed against an employer not involved in the dispute to force action by another person, are indefensible union activities. The employer is innocent and unable to do anything about it; the employees seldom know much about the issue they are striking for. Such strikes are an utter waste of manpower and facilities, to the detriment of the public, and should be unlawful and subject to prevention by proper remedy.

The administration bill does not outlaw any secondary boycott as such. It merely makes unlawful the attempt to attain either of two improper objectives by either a secondary boycott or a strike.

Another danger to productivity and efficiency of operations lies in the attempt to aline supervisory employees with the people they supervise, in organizations to deal with employers. The difficulty of this problem is clearly shown by the indecision of the National Labor Relations Board as to whether supervisors were covered by the Wagner Act. It presents a sharp conflict between the right of supervisors to bargain collectively and the public interest in maintaining efficiency in industry. We believe that the public interest should prevail, and that the individual employer should be free to decide whether he can or cannot bargain collectively with his supervisors.

(4) The public interest requires that Government prevent strikes which endanger the national health, security, or welfare.

In 1946, President Truman stated:

> It is inconceivable that in our democracy any two men should be placed in a position where they can completely stifle our economy and ultimately destroy our country. The Government is challenged as seldom before in our history.

And on January 6, 1947, the President said to the Congress:

> The paralyzing effects of a Nation-wide strike in such industries as transportation, coal, oil, steel, or communications, can result in national disaster. We have been able to avoid such disaster in recent years only by the use of extraordinary war powers. All those powers will soon be gone. In their place there must be created an adequate system and effective machinery in these vital fields. This problem will require careful study and a bold approach, but an approach consistent with the preservation of the rights of our people. The need is pressing.

We agree that machinery must be provided and suggest that the pressing need will be aparent whenever that kind of strike occurs. We believe that the use of injunctions in such national emergencies has proved to be effective and necessary and that it should be spelled out in the statute. We believe, moreover, that the danger is presented by the monopolization of entire industries by single unions, and if no other method can be devised to prevent it, then such combinations must be controlled or eliminated, just as combinations of business contrary to public interest are broken.

(5). The public interest requires that individuals pledged to destroy our free economy should be removed from union leadership.

It is a known fact that Communists have attempted systematically to gain control of unions, so that they could control our industrial might for their evil purposes, and that they have met with some success. This is not a labor-management problem; it is one of national security. Nor is it antiunion or a question of union regulation, because no Communist ever gained control of a union for the benefit of the union or its members.

The anti-Communist affidavit device, enacted in 1947, was soundly based on the power of communism in some unions, and it has proved peculiarly effective in restoring control of many unions to their members. Probably further security legislation is necessary, but the anti-Communist affidavit can continue to have a wholesome effect.

It has been suggested that employers be required to sign the same affidavit. There would appear to be no objection to that proposal, even though Communist infiltration of employers has not been demonstrated and it would be the substitution of shallow appearance for sound reason.

(6) The public interest requires that political activities of special-interest groups be controlled.

Many years ago, the Congress determined that political activities of banks and corporations should be restricted. That was because their wealth made their unrestricted political activity a matter of public concern. Large unions today are in the same position and no sound distinction can be made. Louis Waldman, one-time lawyer for Sidney Hillman, and a well-known union attorney, has said:

> As long as trade-union leaders confine themselves to the task of raising wages, shortening hours and improving the conditions of employment of their members, their political philosophy is of little concern to the public. But when these unions enter politics, they are seeking public power which may directly affect the life and well being of every American. In politics, therefore, the union leaders' philosophy of government must be weighed in the light, not of trade-unionism, but of the public welfare.

We do not suggest that unions should be prevented from editorializing in their papers on political matters. That is freedom of speech. We do believe, however, that unions should be prevented from making contributions to political parties or canditates, for the same reasons and to the same extent that business corporations are so prevented.

The Illinois State Chamber of Commerce has tried, for the past 3 years, to be completely objective in its study of this subject, and I have tried to be objective tonight. We believe that labor-management legislation, to be workable, helpful or, permanent, must be founded solely on the public interest and welfare, regardless of its name, or the public clamor of any special-interest group. We do not believe that H. R. 2032, or its counterpart in the United States Senate, is in the public interest because it fails to recognize the principles that I have discussed here.

We believe that a fair code for labor-management relations should contain the provisions which I have indicated today and which are set out and discussed more fully and more clearly in the printed report of our study which I have filed with this committee today.

Thank you very much.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. I just want to know about his qualifications and background.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. I just want to mention one fact. The act makes it mandatory upon the general counsel to apply for an injunction against a labor union where a charge of unfair labor practices has been filed and where the regional director states in his petition for an injunction that he has reasonable cause to believe the charge to be true.

By that provision the Government takes over the burden and expense of injunction suits against labor unions, and the employers do nothing but watch from the sidelines. The act does not provide that the general counsel shall seek an injunction against an employer against whom a charge of unfair labor practices is filed.

While it is a fact that such temporary injunction shall be in force only from the time it is issued by a United States court until the National Labor Relations Board shall rule upon the complaint of unfair labor practice against the union, there is no provision requiring the National Labor Relations Board to expedite its said ruling.

Such an injunction was issued against a certain union's district council on January 8, 1948, and the Board did not rule upon the complaint until February 1949. The consequence was that the labor union was enjoined during all that time from picketing the contractor who was engaged in the manufacture of certain products by strikebreakers.

It seems that, as has been mentioned here, it would be quite a long time before certain rulings were made, and it seems to me this exceptionally long time for the Board to take to act is totally unjust, if not premeditated.

Do you care to say anything on that?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't know exactly what the question is, Mr. Irving. I would make this observation: I don't think the present law makes it mandatory upon the general counsel to obtain an injunction in all unfair labor practice cases, only certain ones; and those are the ones involving strikes, and apparently the Congress thought it desirable in those instances to maintain the status quo.

I would be inclined to agree with you that a year is a long time.

Mr. IRVING. You don't think it is fair, then, that he should be required to issue an injunction against the employer in case of a charge of unfair labor practice by the union?

Mr. MORGAN. I don't think the necessity exists, Mr. Irving, because the employer doesn't strike. The employer does a certain act which the Board seeks to prevent or remedy. If it is a discharge or failure to promote or something like that, then damages run from that date, and the employee is compensated in back pay.

Mr. IRVING. I would think it would be just as fair that he be enjoined from employing strike-breakers and continuing the work as it would in the other case.

The act prohibits all boycotts by unions, including boycotts of goods manufactured by strikebreakers in the struck plant. That prohibition has been recently determined by the National Labor Relations Board to prohibit picketing, and also the we-do-not-patronize list in a case that I mentioned above.

The act provides that any person damaged by such boycotts may sue the union carrying on said boycott for damages. The words "any person" include not only the person being boycotted, but the person whose goods might not be delivered because a truck driver or any other person refused to cross a picket line or was damaged in any other way by reason of said picketing.

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct. I understand that. That is entirely consistent with our position, the position of the chamber, which I have expressed here tonight. We think all secondary boycotts should be prohibited by a fair labor-management relations code for two reasons principally:

The first is that the employer who is being damaged by that action has very little or nothing that he can do to prevent it. It is not some act on his part that they are objecting to.

The second reason is that very often in those cases the employees who are actually taking the action, the secondary boycott, probably know very little about the actual dispute. They know what someone has told them. Someone told them it is sufficient to take this action, and they follow their leader. Perhaps that is proper if the action itself is proper. But they don't know what they are striking about.

For example, this is not a secondary situation, but a sympathetic situation, which is much the same. I heard this question discussed a moment ago about this present coal situation. I hadn't read about it at all.

However, in that case I doubt if there is anything that the coal producers can do about the appointment of this individual by the Federal Government, and I also doubt that the employees themselves actually are as well informed about it as they would be if it were a strike for wages. When they strike for wages, they know about that.

Mr. IRVING. You are speaking mostly for small business. Do you think if 1, 8, 10, 15 men are working on a job, they don't know what a dispute is about if they are called to picket or strike the job?

Mr. MORGAN. No, I think if they are called to strike the job for some direct economic reason of their own, they know pretty well what they are trying to accomplish, but if they are told not to work on that job because there are some nails from a nonunion shop, they know nothing about that first-hand, usually. They know nothing but the hearsay from the man who told them, that this is made in a nonunion shop. Maybe he knows nothing about the facts. Maybe the employees want it to be a nonunion shop.

Mr. IRVING. He is relatively in the same position of a stockholder of a company when the company wants to lock out a union for any reason, in order to take unfair labor practices against their employees. The stockholder doesn't know a great deal about that either.

Mr. MORGAN. I assume that is right, yes.

Mr. IRVING. I think there are a great many unions which elect representatives whom they have confidence in and who conduct the business in much the same manner as executives of business do. I take it from your testimony that there are no oppressive features in this act at all.

Mr. MORGAN. What act?

Mr. IRVING. The Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. MORGAN. Oh, yes, I want to make myself clear on that. We don't undertake in this study to endorse specifically the Taft-Hartley Act, and I don't think my testimony can be characterized like that.

This study began in the spring of 1946 before there was any Taft-Hartley Act, and the things I have mentioned in my testimony and which are contained in this printed study consist of many things in the Wagner Act, many things in the Taft-Hartley Act, and perhaps one or two things in the administration bill.

We are talking generally about a fair labor-management code and what we consider the obligation of Congress to be to enact such a law in the public interest.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 1 minute left.

Mr. IRVING. You make some statements relative to the pressure of unions, and so forth, to repeal this act. If I remember correctly, there was a whole lot of pressure by management to repeal the Wagner Act. There wasn't too much disposition on the part of business to cooperate with the act for a great many years.

Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. How long have you been in Peoria?

Mr. MORGAN. I am a lawyer in Peoria. I practiced law there for about 11 years except for a period during the war.

Mr. WERDEL. It is my recollection that you were in the Federal Bureau of Investigation; is that right?

Mr. MORGAN. That is correct. I was in the FBI for 3 years.

Mr. WERDEL. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Velde?

Mr. VELDE. Since we are fellow-townsmen, Mr. Morgan, I would like to ask you a few questions about the labor conditions around Peoria generally and specifically refer to a strike that happened in the Caterpillar Tractor Co. about a year and a half ago. I didn't know too much about it, and I don't know whether you do or not, but I would appreciate your telling the committee what the strike was called for and how it was settled, and so forth.

Mr. MORGAN. I would be very glad to, Judge Velde.

I didn't represent either party in that matter, so any testimony I can give you is just as a private observer, what I read in the newspapers, et cetera.

However, my recollection of the matter is something like this: The Caterpillar plant employees were represented by the United Farm Equipment and Metal Workers of America, CIO. In the spring of 1948 they were engaged in negotiation of a new contract and the old contract had expired. During the course of those negotiations a couple of other unions filed petitions with the National Labor Relations Board claiming the right to represent these same employees, who were represented by the Farm Equipment Workers, or at least some of them.

At that point, as I recall, the company announced that it had to recess the negotiations because it would not be permitted to negotiate with the union, and for the additional fact that it would appear quite unlikely under the existing conditions that the incumbent union could remain, and it would be folly to negotiate and sign an agreement with the union which probably would not stay.

Their ground for saying that was that the Farm Equipment Workers Union had not filed their affidavits and, as the company understood the law, they would not be on the ballot and could not represent the employees.

Shortly after that recess, the plant was struck, I think it was down for 13 weeks—it may have been a little longer.

Near the end of the strike an election was held. The Farm Equipment Workers were not permitted on the ballot because they had not filed their anti-Communist affidavits at that date, and a new union was selected by the employees as a result of the original and a run-off election.

I think perhaps one of the most interesting features about that whole strike, and to me it casts some light on this labor problem, in this: That during the period of the strike, perhaps after it had run two-thirds of its course, one of the local newspapers set out to poll the employees in a kind of "last offer" set-up. They mailed to each employee at his home address, some 18,000 employees or so, an identifiable ballot with an identifiable return envelope and requested that they be sent back immediately.

Approximately 3 or 4 days later the dead line was reached, the ballots were counted, the question on the ballot was: Do you want to accept the company's last offer and terminate the strike with the understanding that when a contract is negotiated, any wage increase will be made retroactive? That was the offer made by the company. The vote was about 13 to 1 of the employees who returned the ballot to end the strike and return under those conditions.

I am sure the poll was fairly conducted, and I think somewhere over 60 percent of the employees actually returned their ballots. Yet the strike continued. I think it was an interesting commentary.

Mr. VELDE. What I was referring to in asking about that particular case was that it is a good example of communistic infiltration.

Do you recall whether or not a business agent admitted later that he was a Communist?

Mr. MORGAN. Yes; the charges were made locally there by disinterested organizations that there were some Communists in town, and they gained a lot of newspaper publicity from that fact, and three Communists were identified, two of whom were in the Farm Equipment Union. One of the men was the publicity and educational director for the local union, and the other man was international vice president of the Farm Equipment Workers Union. I understand one of the men admitted, or, at least, refused to deny they were Communists, and that was the reason they had not signed the non-Communist affidavit and, subsequent thereto, I am sure you will recall the Farm Equipment Union, by a resolution at its international convention instructed the officers to sign an affidavit, at which time a number of them resigned and were replaced, and I understand they now have signed the affidavits, but, apparently, a number of the officers had to remove themselves.

Mr. VELDE. I notice here in your statement you say:

> It has been suggested that employers be required to sign the same affidavit—

Referring to the Communist affidavit—

> There would appear to be no objection to that proposal, even though Communist infiltration of employers has not been demonstrated, and it would be the substitution of shallow appearance for sound reason.

You are a former member of the FBI, and so am I, and I happen to know that there are at least a hundred people in my personal acquaintance that I have come across during my experiences who are worth considerable money, and who are in the position of employers, and I think maybe you know something about that, too. Would you care to comment as to whether you do know whether there are some Communists in this country who are in the position of employers?

Mr. MORGAN. I would not deny that for a minute, Mr. Velde. On the other hand, I do not think there has been any effort on the part of the Communists to infiltrate the employer group, as such, while we know there has been such an effort in labor unions, and I think we all known why. Certainly there are some Communists in all walks of life today.

Mr. VELDE. Do you not agree, too, that if you require a union official to sign a non-Communist affidavit, the employer, or the person who represents the employer, should also sign the non-Communist affidavit?

Mr. MORGAN. I would agree with that, Mr. Velde, as the United States Chamber of Commerce has, and I make that suggestion.

Personally, I put some of my own views in the statement. Also, I think that is rather shallow appearance; however, on the face of it, it is certainly fair enough, but I would like to suggest on the face of it we should have our laws apply equally to men and women. Yet, all of us would agree that prostitution is a crime which can only be committed by a woman. But I suggest that it is fair that employers perhaps should be required to sign the affidavit for the purpose of appearance only, but I would not agree there is the same substantial reason they should do so that there is in the case of the union.

Mr. VELDE. I think that is all I have.

Mr. KELLEY. A question was raised by Mr. Velde about communism in management—do I understand it correctly?

Mr. VELDE. Mr. Chairman, of persons who are in a position of employers. I know of an example of a very wealthy woman from the west coast who happens to come from San Francisco. While she does not directly employ very many people, she does do so indirectly, because she is a stockholder in a large corporation, and I definitely know she is a Communist.

Mr. KELLEY. That brings up the question in my mind that before we got into the war in Europe, there were quite a few people in this country in important positions in management and business who were tainted conservatively with communism and fascism.

Mr. MORGAN. That may perhaps be true. I really do not know, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. I have no more questions. Thank you very much. We are glad you came. Mr. Morgan.

Mr. MORGAN. Thank you very much for letting me come. I have enjoyed it.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. French and Mr. Hazard.

As I understand it, you each have requested 15 minutes.

Mr. French, you may proceed.

TESTIMONY OF SEWARD H. FRENCH, JR., ASSISTANT TO THE PRESIDENT AND MANAGER OF INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, CRUCIBLE STEEL CO. OF AMERICA

Mr. FRENCH. My name is Seward H. French, Jr. I reside in Pittsburgh, Pa., where I am employed as assistant to the president, in charge of industrial relations of the Crucible Steel Co. of America.

Crucible Steel is a basic steel manufacturing company, having manufacturing plants in Pittsburgh, Pa., Midland, Pa., Syracuse, N. Y., Harrison, N. J., and warehouses and offices in many other cities and States. We employ a total of about 15,000 persons. Almost all of our production and maintenance employees are represented by a union and have been for some 10 years. A substantial number of our office employees are represented by unions. We have bargained collectively, and largely to the mutual satisfaction of all concerned, for many years.

I am not opposed to labor unions. They are here to stay—as much a part of the American scene as the corner drugstore. Nevertheless, the time has come when they must recognize their responsibilities and submit to government by law the same as any other citizen or organization. The Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, or Taft-Hartley Act, took a step in that direction, and as a result has been bitterly opposed by some persons and groups.

I am here today to testify that, if the act is not all good, it is just as certainly not all bad.

(1) Some regulation of labor unions is required:

From the beginning, the opponents of the Labor-Management Relations Act have attacked it with much heat but with little logic. Complaints have been general accusations that it is a union-busting, vicious, antilabor measure, designed to destroy and enslave the workingman.

These accusations are without foundation in fact.

I have seen something of industrial relations in a great industrial area. Under the act not one workingman has been enslaved or destroyed. Not one union has been broken.

The truth of the matter is that, although our labor unions have grown to be big business, under the act they have for the first time felt in some minor respect the restraints which have been imposed upon other big businesses. They have made themselves responsible for the welfare of some 15,000,000 workingmen and their families, yet they would be unrestrained by law in the exercise of the vast powers which have been granted them.

We in this country have, by statute, carefully safeguarded the handling of money in the hands of trustees. We have hedged our corporations about with a multitude of laws designed to protect persons investing money. We have many and strict laws and rules of conduct to govern the professional behavior of attorneys, insurance agents, stock brokers, and the like. It seems not unreasonable that some provision should be made by law to protect the 15,000,000 persons whose welfare is in the hands of the labor unions from the possible abuse of the powers given to unions by Federal legislation. A country which has been so zealous in guarding money in the hands of persons occupying positions of trust and confidence must be at least equally zealous in safeguarding the right to work and the welfare of working men and women which has been entrusted to the leaders of labor unions.

It is not surprising that the union leaders object to any restraint or regulation, for until the Labor-Management Relations Act they were free to do very much as they pleased. Nevertheless, even those persons most favorably disposed toward labor unions must admit that the possibility of abuse of their numerous powers exists, and as long as there is such a possibility some union leaders, who are, after all, only human, will abuse these powers. It should be obvious that the public interest requires reasonable regulation.

(2) The restrictions imposed by the Labor-Management Relations Act are reasonable regulations.

Putting aside the general criticism which is based upon the untenable theory that there should be no regulation whatsoever of unions, an examination of the individual provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act will show to any fair-minded person that those specific restrictions are but reasonable limitations upon possible abuses of the powers vested in labor unions and their leaders.

The requirement that unions as well as employers bargain in good faith is certainly a reasonable regulation. Collective bargaining can hardly be carried on entirely by one party, and if the processes are to be encouraged, as seems to be now an almost universally accepted objective, the statutory requirement that both parties bargain in good faith is essential.

Most of the abuses guarded against in the Labor-Management Relations Act have to do with the rights of the individual working man or the public and are not primarily beneficial to the interests of employers. They were not intended to benefit the employer, except in a most indirect way, and that is not the ground on which they have been attacked.

As Lee Pressman—at that time general counsel for the C. I. O.—complained at the time the act was under consideration:

> Perhaps the most predominant characteristic of the current attack upon labor's rights is the rediscovery of the individual. This rediscovery of the individal finds reflection in a host of bills now before the Congress to alter and amend our Federal labor code.

His remarks were intended to show the iniquity of recognizing rights of individual employees, not to compliment Congress on the new legislation. As an admission by a union representative however, it shows that somehow the rights of a workman were considered hostile to labor's rights, and at least some unions felt that workmen should have no individual rights, but should exist only as a particle in a homogeneous mass identified by Mr. Pressman as "labor." This theory, so frankly expressed, is contrary to the concept of democratic government.

Certainly if a union is permitted to have any form of union security by agreement with an employer, it must be required to admit to membership, and hence to employment, any person who accepts the obligation of paying proper and reasonable initiation fees and dues. Forcing the discharge or black-listing of an employee because of failure to maintain membership "in good standing" in a union, with no restriction upon the reasons for which the union or its leaders can deprive the employee of "good standing," is a deprivation of personal freedom and dignity not to be countenanced. The so-called "free rider" argument is the only really good argument that the union ever advanced for the union shop. It cannot be denied that the union, under our system obtains benefits and performs services for all persons in the unit represented. It is reasonable that all persons in the group which benefits should contribute to the expenses of maintaining the organization. This is permitted under the present act. The provisions of the act dealing with compulsory union membership are fair and should be continued.

The provisions of the act giving the Federal courts jurisdiction over suits for damages for breach of contract are reasonable and proper. The policy should be, and theoretically is, to encourage in making and observing of collective bargaining agreements. To provide by law that they must be made but cannot be enforced defeats the very purpose which is allegedly one of the aims of the legislation. The Federal courts are certainly not antilabor. They are in a position to do justice, their interpretations have precedent value, and their rulings are subject to review. This provision of the act has not resulted in any "raids" on the union treasuries, having been used very sparingly. It has, however, caused both parties to give considerably more thought to actions which might be construed as breaches of the collective bargaining agreement, and have resulted in more complete observance of the terms of such contracts. That is, of course, a very good result. These provisions should be continued.

It is hardly necessary to continue section by section to point out the reasonableness of the rather mild regulation of labor unions contained in the act. As we have previously stated, for the most part these provisions are for the protection of the public and the individual working man, and are not of prime importance to employers as such. Nevertheless the Congress must be conscious of its obligation to the public and the individual working man, and should not lightly strip away such protection.

(3) Exemption of supervisors from coverage of the National Labor Relations Act:

There are some provisions which are the primary importance to employers and to the public. Perhaps the foremost such provision is the section which makes it clear that supervisory personnel are not within the coverage of the National Labor Relations Act.

The organization of supervisory personnel into labor unions, subject to all the requirements of unions, poses an extremely difficult and dangerous problem to management. If the unions are given unrestricted power to deal with their members and other working men as they see fit in accordance with the proposed legislation, the problem may well be an insuperable one in many instances.

Even under the National Labor Relations Act there was for many years a serious question whether or not foremen and other supervisors should be included as employees under the act. The National Labor Relations Board in the ordinary determination of a unit for collective bargaining for production and maintenance workers has customarily excluded supervisory personnel. This was true under the National Labor Relations Act. Eventually, however, the Board was confronted with the problem of units consisting entirely or primarily of supervisory employees. It then became necessary to meet the problem squarely. In two early cases (Union Collieries Coal Co. (41 N. L. R. B. 961, 44 N. L. R. B. 165); Godchaux Sugars, Inc. (44 N. L. R. B. 874) the Board held that supervisors could organize and insist upon representation under the terms of the National Labor Relations Act. Sometimes thereafter, however, the Board found it necessary to reconsider the question, and in the case of the Maryland Dry Dock Company (49 N. L. R. B. 733), the previous determinations were rejected and it was held in a carefully considered opinion that supervisors were not and should not be subject to the provisions of the National Labor Relations Act. This decision was followed in several cases. About 2 years after the Maryland Dry Dock Co. decision, the Board reconsidered the problem, and in the case of Packard Motor Car Co. (61 N. L. R. B. 4), returned to the theory of the Union Collieries and Godchaux cases. The Packard case was followed in a number of later cases.

The Board's reversal of its previous position, as would appear from the opinion in the Packard case, was evidently not without some misgiving. Eventually the case reached the United States Supreme Court where, by a 5 to 4 decision, the court in Packard Motor Car Co. v. N. L. R. B. (330 U. S. 486) (1947) held that under the act as then written foremen and supervisors were covered employees and that the court could not change this situation, saying, through Mr. Justice Jackson:

> It is also urged upon us most seriously that unionization is from many points bad industrial policy, that it puts the union foreman in the position of serving two masters, divides his loyalty and makes generally for bad relations between management and labor. However we might appraise the force of these arguments as a policy matter, we are not authorized to base decision of a question of law upon them. They concern the wisdom of the legislation; they cannot alter the meaning of otherwise plain provisions.

Chief Justice Vinson and Justices Douglas, Burton, and Frankfurter dissented from the majority view, and Justice Douglas wrote a strong dissenting opinion.

The decision of the Board and the Court invited action by Congress on this matter. Title I, section 2 (3) of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 finally resolved this difficult question by providing that supervisors should no longer be considered as "employees" within the meaning of the National Labor Relations Act. It is essential that this provision be continued in any future legislation.

The reasons for the exemption of supervisors have been set forth many times. Nevertheless, they continue to be vital reasons and are as important, if not more important, today.

Management cannot operate a plant or any business effectively without representatives at the first level of supervision. This is even more important where the operations are extended and large numbers of persons are employed. It is true in our company.

The foremen and supervisors at the first level of supervision are the representatives of management in dealing with the rank and file employees. They are the ones who enforce the company rules, mete out or recommend discipline, recommend discharges or promotions, handle first step grievances with the union representatives, and are truly, as Justice Douglas said, "the arms and legs of management in executing labor policies." So far as many an employee is concerned, his foreman is management, for in a large enterprise it is unlikely that he will ever have any personal contact with the president or vice president of the organization, but he does have daily and constant contact with his supervisor.

The foreman's status as a part of management has been recognized by the Board and the courts in holding that the actions of a foreman or a supervisor are in effect the act of the employer. The dual status of unionized foremen is unfair to foreman and employee alike. As Justice Douglas observed in the dissenting opinion in the Packard

> If the foremen were to be included as employees under the act, special problems would be raised * * *. Foremen are also under the act as employers. That dual status creates serious problems. An act of a foreman, if attributed to the management, constitutes an unfair labor practice; the same act may be part of the foreman's activity as an employee. In that event the employer can only interfere at his peril.

Quite apart from the legal difficulties arising from the dual capacity, there is a vitally pressing and important problem created by the divided loyalty which results from including the foreman in collective bargaining organizations. The fact is that a foreman who is also a union member must constantly be torn between his duties as a representative of management and his obligations as a union member. Discipline in the plant must suffer, as indeed it has suffered in those organizations where foremen have been unionized. As the Board said in the Maryland Drydock case, supra:

> The very nature of a foreman's duties make him an instrumentality of management in dealing with labor. The duty of supervision with which he is principally charged implies a delegation of authority with respect to the selection, promotion, and discharge of the workers in his section. Although the delegation of authority is no longer plenary in modern factories which have a central personnel system, there is no doubt that even the function of advising or recommending action with regard to personnel is sufficient to command respect and instill fear in the minds of subordinates. To hold that the National Labor Relations Act contemplated the representation of supervisory employees by the same organizations which might represent the subordinates would be to view the statute as repudiating the historic prohibition of the common law against fiduciaries serving conflicting interests.

The dissenting statement of Mr. Reynolds in the Jones & Laughlin Steel case, supra, is significant:

> The decision of my colleagues in this case also runs rampant over the familiar and well-established rule of law which requires that one who undertakes to serve one employer must not also place himself under obligation to serve the conflicting interest of others. This is the rule of fidelity which since time beyond memory has rendered it impossible for an attorney to represent both the plaintiff and defendant in a legal action, prohibits a real estate agent from collecting a commission from both the vendee and the vendor, proscribes the purchase by the executor of an estate of the assets of such estate, disqualifies the witness to a will as a beneficiary thereto, etc., common sense principles familiar to all laymen.
> I believe the majority decision completely ignores this rule when it lends encouragement to a bargaining relationship which cannot help but place supervisory employees, in their role of managerial representatives, in a position where their obligations as fellow union members of rank and file employees come in direct conflict with their primary duty to management. It is not enough, in my opinion, to say, as the majority has, that managerial discipline can be exercised effectively to discourage indiscretions of supervisory employees which arise from any such conflict of interests. The granting of legal sanction to a relationship which creates even the temptation within a supervisory employee or agent to wander from the path of his primary duty to the employer or principal appears to me to be repugnant to the rule of fidelity. * * *
> * * * To assert that our action here does not divest the respondent of a substantial degree of control over its property, in my opinion, not only disregards the evidence, which the majority minimizes, but ignores everyday human experience in industrial relationship.

As a practical matter, I believe that foremen and supervisors neither want nor need coverage of the Wagner Act to govern their relations with their employers. The tendency and usual result of any collective bargaining agreement is to encourage the grouping of the workers covered into job classifications having specified duties and limitations and to discourage the performance of duties outside those specified. It is not intended to encourage the ambitious employee to improve his place except by attaining seniority. Whether this is a good or a bad result need not be debated here—the important point is that this characteristic of unionized employees is fatal to the concept of a supervisor who is expected and required to do whatever may be necessary to carry out his function as an arm of management regardless of any job specifications or seniority. The successful conduct of any business, including ours, depends to a large extent upon the ambition and initiative of those persons who have been selected to act on behalf of management.

To say that business can operate efficiently if the "arms and legs" of management be cut off but the policy making head retained is absurd. If we hope to continue to be efficient producers of the goods needed by this country and the world, we must have our foremen and supervisors undivided in their loyalty and an integral part of the management team.

I strongly urge that the provision of the Labor Management Relations Act exempting supervisory personnel from coverage of the N. L. R. A. be continued in any new legislation.

(4) The provision of the Labor-Management Relations Act requiring that plant guards, if organized, may only be represented by a labor organization which has no affiliation with any organization admitting to membership employees other than guards, is reasonable and should be continued.

If the provision of the act restricting representation of guards to labor organizations not representing or affiliated with organizations representing employees other than plant guards, and the other safeguards provided in the act, are removed as proposed, it would mean that the union would control and tenure of employment of every plant guard admitted to membership. The union and the union alone would have the power to make agreements with the company determining the conditions upon which any particular plant guard might continue to hold his job.

Under the circumstances the union would properly require that every plant guard become one of its members, and that the company discharge any guard who ceased to be a union member. The union ordinarily requires that as one of the obligations of membership the employee would never knowingly wrong a brother union member or see him wronged, and that the employee would cease work at any time the union might call upon him to do so. For failure to carry out this obligation, the employee might be summarily suspended or expelled from union membership and thus from his job.

Beyond any reasonable doubt, the existence of such obligations and duties and of the union's power to punish violations thereof by depriving the violator of his membership and so of his employment will often place the plant guard in a hopelessly false position. Neither the National Labor Relations Act nor the Labor-Management Relations Act has ended labor strife, and perhaps no statute can ever accomplish that purpose. In any event, the persons responsible for the safety and operation of industrial establishments must always have available some agency capable of keeping the peace from day to day, and during strikes and similar disturbances of protecting against all hazards the building and machinery necessary to the continued production of goods.

Municipal police and constables are inadequate for this purpose, and the municipalities cannot be expected to provide at their expense the type or quantity or protection needed. The executive officers, foremen, and other classes of people recognized as management are not trained or competent to do this essential work if the need for it arises. If it is to be done as it must be done, only a competent responsible force of trained guards can do it. They can do it only if their regard for the property rights of the owners of the establishment is wholly disentangled from any loyalty or obligation to a union of production workers.

This is no reflection on the honesty of union members. It is simply to recognize the fact that the plant guard's duty is to protect the company and its property, as no group of union members can be expected to protect them in the course of any modern labor dispute. It simply recognizes a fact which was recognized by the CIO union in Southern California Gas, 10 N. L. R. B. 1123 (1939) that—* * * in the event of a strike the interest of watchmen would be alined against the remainder of the employees.

It is true that plant guards are not part of management to the same extent as foremen and supervisors. Nevertheless, it is a fact that as a part of their day to day duties they are required constantly to check up on the reported violations of rules or safety conditions by the production and maintenance workers. If they are admitted to union membership in the same union, they cannot properly perform these duties. Perhaps the better remedy would be to remove them entirely from coverage of N. L. R. A., but the limitation contained in the present act has to some extent at least relieved the situation. It should be continued.

I have pointed out a few provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act which I strongly urge be continued in any future legislation. The name of the act which incorporates them is of no importance, nor is the language in which they are couched if it truly contains the substance, but the provisions themselves are absolutely essential to good labor relations.

Mr. IRVING (presiding). Is there something else you would like to touch on?

Mr. FRENCH. This matter of supervisory employees was the thing we wanted to emphasize. I will rest the situation with the observation that in coming here tonight and representing our company, rather than speaking in a representative capacity for other organizations, I am speaking only for our company, and the most important single thing in your deliberations, from an operating point of view—which is the point of view we want to take—we would urge very strongly the continuance of the prohibition against organization of supervisory employees. It is difficult enough to do business under all existing laws, rules, and regulations, but if the management group is divided against itself by compulsory recognition of supervisory unions, the day of efficient and effective management may very well disappear. That is the part of the Act which is the heart and soul, so far as we are concerned.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I have no questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Yes. About this supervisory thing—you have addressed yourself specifically and particularly to that as being what you are most interested in. Could you give me some idea of where you feel the break-off should be as to the level of supervision? What I am getting at, you know in an ordinary production plant there are varying levels, from the plant superintendent, the division superintendent, the general foreman, the line foreman and group leaders and straw bosses, generally, and so on, you know?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Would you recommend any specific place in that line of organization where a break-off might be?

Mr. FRENCH. Yes. Under our contract with the steel workers' union there is a general clause which excludes foremen who are in charge of any class of labor, which is, perhaps, not the best definition in the world, and yet in the ordinary process of collective bargaining we have worked out a dividing line between the union and the company on that. Working supervisors who are not exempt under the Wages and Hours Act on the payment of overtime are included in the bargaining unit, and that includes working supervisors. For example, he may spend about 75 percent of his time doing work with his hands, and he is in a bargaining unit covered by the steel workers' contract, and we have found no difficulty with that particular classification.

Mr. BURKE. There has been a great deal of difficulty, generally, in the working foremen and working supervisory type of job?

Mr. FRENCH. I think, in other industries, there has been difficulty; but in our industry, by and large, there has been a great effort made to come to a point right there at the working supervisory level, and make salaried supervisors on a level at that point.

Mr. BURKE. You feel that that is proper, that the working supervisor, as long as he does some of the work with his hands, some of the regular production work or maintenance work, as the case might be, should be a part of the bargaining unit?

Mr. FRENCH. We think the rules established under the Wages and Hours Act, the 20-percent rule, if a foreman does not work at the same kind of duties as the men under him for more than 20 percent of the workweek, we think that is a pretty good rule. People whose work is predominantly supervisory, that is, 80 percent is supervisory and only 20 percent is manual, then they should be considered as supervisors.

Mr. BURKE. Then, there was another question I wanted to ask on a different type of separation. I do not know how your contract reads, but many contracts in industry read that when a worker is advanced to the position of foreman, or to a supervisory position, he may, or may not—but he usually may not—still be a part of the bargaining unit, but in many cases if his record is right with both the union and management, his seniority is held intact for him until the termination of his job either by demotion or by lack of work, by the company, as a supervisor.

Do you believe that that type of thing is valid in contracts?

Mr. FRENCH. That is very desirable. We have a very interesting clause in that regard which we worked out with the steelworkers, and have had it for I believe about 6 years. Where a man has come out of the bargaining unit, for example, the top man in the crew, and is promoted to the foreman's job, and then because of a recession in operations he goes back, because of accumulated seniority he gets all the original seniority he had, plus what he had as a supervisory employee. However, if he becomes a foreman from outside he has no such seniority, and we do not believe it is fair to ask the bargaining unit to take such a foreman back into the ranks, when he did not come out of the ranks.

Mr. BURKE. That is the usual type of contract, although some firms have kicked about it, in taking an individual back that they may have felt was undesirable as a foreman. They felt that the union was really stepping over the line in insisting that he come back as a worker.

Mr. FRENCH. Of course, it is to the benefit of the foreman to be able to go back, particularly, in an industry like ours, where you have continuous operations, and where your shift may change. You may be on three shifts or two shifts, and the foreman who was on the third shift, if he is an old employee, he will want to protect himself by going back into the unit, and the company will be benefited because they maintain the services, and when operations go up again, you have him on the pay roll.

Mr. BURKE. You feel your objections to the organization of foremen generally would not apply to the case we have been discussing?

Mr. FRENCH. That is right. He goes back into the unit. When he goes back up to the foreman's job, he would step out of the bargaining unit, and it is up to him to be a good supervisor, and it is up to him not to create difficulties so they will not want him back.

Mr. BURKE. Many companies, I know, have objected to that kind of a clause in the contract, because they feel the same objections apply to organization, generally.

Mr. FRENCH. We treat it quite to the contrary. We feel we could not ask a foreman to step out of a seniority unit and take a supervisory job at the risk of declining operations a year or two later, and then he would not have a job. It is advantageous to both sides.

Mr. BURKE. That is all.

Mr. IRVING. Do you object to the foremen organizing themselves into a union separate from other unions in the plant?

Mr. FRENCH. That is our primary objection.

Mr. IRVING. I was under the impression the firm objected to a foreman being a member of the same union as employees. I was not aware they objected to them having their own collective bargaining unit.

Mr. FRENCH. It would be almost impossible to have your management group divided by that kind of a proposition. In other words, you have foremen meetings on every Friday, and you show them your order book, and the work they have to do the following week, and they have to be part of the same team as the general superintendent of the plant. Some day those very foremen are going to work up to the ranks, and if they are divided into a separate bargaining unit, and come in with demands, that divides the management team, and makes it substantially impossible to operate.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. I have no questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Velde?

Mr. VELDE. No questions.

Mr. IRVING. I want to thank you, Mr. French, for coming before us, and to say we appreciate your presentation.

Mr. FRENCH. Thank you very much for the opportunity. It was a pleasure to be here.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you.

Mr. Hazard.

TESTIMONY OF LELAND HAZARD, VICE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL COUNSEL, PITTSBURGH PLATE GLASS CO.

Mr. HAZARD. My name is Leland Hazard. I am vice president and general counsel for Pittsburgh Plate Glass Co.

Our company produces plate glass, window glass, automobile safety glass, industrial paints, house paints, paint brushes, heavy chemicals, and cement.

These products are made in 30 plants in various States and distributed through over 200 sales branches, sales offices, and warehouses located in substantially every State in the Union.

Our company employs approximately 27,000 workers, and we negotiate each year about 180 labor agreements with affiliates of CIO, A. F. of L., and district 50, United Mine Workers.

We are all agreed that labor is necessary—skilled, semiskilled, and unskilled labor.

Are we also agreed that management is necessary, that decisions about investments, plants, equipment, machines, products, research, production are necessary?

To those who deny that management is a necessary function, my remarks will not prove helpful.

To those who are concerned about the need for management, as well as about the interests of labor, I offer these observations upon the proposed legislation.

Too much has been said about prerogatives of management and rights of labor. Around these phrases are clustered ideas and emotions which tend to obscure the fact that labor is as dependent upon management as management is dependent upon labor, and that the public is dependent upon both for the products which make our American standard of living the highest in the world.

Collective bargaining has proved to be the best method for reconciling the interests of workers with the necessities of management.

Some managements were slow to recognize this fact, and the Wagner Act was the result. Under that act some unions forgot that management is necessary to production and that production is necessary to the national welfare, including the welfare of workers, and the Taft-Hartley Act was the result.

It is too late to deplore either act. It behooves us now to seek that minimum of legislation which will leave the interests of workers and the necessities of management to be reconciled under laws which do not throw the weight of power either way.

Assuming the necessity for management, I would like to make a few observations about the proposed legislation in the light of that assumption.

I want to speak mostly, gentlemen, about the closed shop, and I will omit some of the latter portions of this presentation that have to do with other features. I am principally concerned in my presentation with the closed shop. Under the closed shop, management cannot select employees; it may not be able to train employees; it cannot be assured of retaining the same employees; it must discharge employees at the direction of the union for reasons deemed sufficient by the union and possibly unrelated to the efficiency or continuity of the enterprise.

Let me give the committee an illustration from our own experience. We have a sales and warehouse branch—typical of many others—which would provide permanent employment for about 50 glaziers. Under the closed shop, we were compelled to accept intermittent services from some 150 different individuals—three men rotating on each job. The union would send us a glazier for a week, then take him away and send us another glazier for the same job. Perhaps 3 weeks later we would get back the first glazier. And so it went.

It is apparent that under such conditions it would be impossible to develop group skills, employee morale, or the continuing relationships which benefit employer, employee, and the public.

If the relief from the closed shop which the law now provides is continued, we should be able to increase services and lower the cost of services substantially. We should be able under our programs already started under the 1947 act to supply more of our products to more people at lower prices.

And all this could be done without impairment of union security. I can say this in good faith, because as early as 1940 we voluntarily adopted a cooperative attitude and policy toward union security. We took the position that whenever a union had the representation rights in a plant, then we would cooperate with that union in obtaining a 100 percent dues-paying membership. We wrote this policy into our labor agreements and carried it to the extent of lay-offs and discharges in the few cases where those measures were necessary in order to obtain the 100 percent regular dues payments.

Under these labor agreements we retained the right to select and hire new employees but agreed that after 30 to 60 days each employee was obligated to pay a specified union initiation fee and to maintain the payment of regular union dues. This did not include the payment of fines or assessments or subject the employee to discharge for bad standing in the union—except for failure to pay regular union dues.

You will readily see that this form of union security is substantially that authorized in the present law. Congress did not take this provision for union security out of thin air. Our plan had been passed upon and approved by the National Labor Relations Board. It was a matter of public record. In our case, at least, it had been practiced to the satisfaction of our unions of production workers and our management for a period of 7 years prior to the Labor-Management Act, 1947.

I have been talking about union security in our plants.

In the sales branches and warehouses, where we engage in glazing contract work, the situation is different. These service establishments for supply and installation of glass and the servicing of painting contractors' requirements are closely related to the construction industries. There the power of the unions was sufficient to impose the closed shop upon us. By the secondary boycott and other coercive measures we were saddled with the closed shop and all of its adverse consequences. The impairment of management efficiency which I have previously mentioned, resulted. The public has paid the bill.

Now I am sure the committee will be interested in our success in eliminating the closed shop after enactment of the 1947 law. In our service establishments we negotiated over a hundred labor agreements without the closed shop.

We did not concede any of the various bootleg provisions which some unions, and I may say some employers, acceded to, to circumvent the law. We had no strikes or work stoppages as the result of the elimination of the closed shop.

I think this is cogent evidence that neither the workers nor the unions considered the closed shop essential to union security. The unions continued to receive dues from 100 percent of our workers in the establishments where they had representation rights.

Now the committee may be thinking that the proposed legislation does not require the closed shop—that it would merely permit the closed shop: that we would be free to refuse a resumption of union demands for the closed shop and then fight it out on the basis of economic strength.

It must be remembered, however, that in the construction trades no single employer is operating alone on a given construction job. It takes many employers to construct an office building or even a private residence. If a single employer elects to oppose the closed shop and his union decides to strike to impose the closed shop, not only that employer's operations must stop but also in many cases the entire construction job.

Provisions in the present law restricting the use of the secondary boycott are of great help in avoiding this consequence but, important as it is to retain those provisions, they are not enough on the closed-shop issue. In most construction operations, as a matter of physical fact, the job cannot go on when one subcontractor is forced off the job. For example, if a glazing contractor is forced off the job, the plastering and substantially all the other interior finish work must be suspended.

This, gentlemen, I believe to be an important point. I wish to pause now to emphasize it before making this point.

It must be remembered that the Wagner Act compelled, and the law continues to compel, collective bargaining without regard to the relative economic strength of the union and the employer. Doubtless, except for the law, there would still be some die-hard employers able to refuse to bargain with unions. Since the Government intervened to throw the weight of its power in support of bargaining rights for unions—the Wagner Act—it must assume the correlative obligation to protect the necessities of management. The die-hard union, clinging to what was originally an organizational technique, the closed shop, must be as much an object of governmental restrictions as was the die-hard employer. Having given unions bargaining rights regardless of their ability to get them on their own, the Government must give management protection against those excessive demands of unions, such as the closed shop, which jeopardize the necessities of management. I would like to skip the next paragraph which refers to the fact that the closed shop restrictions in 20 States have been sustained by the Supreme Court.

In my opinion, based upon the experience of our company and my studies and observations of other industries, the closed shop is a curtailment of the individual's rights to work and a usurpation of the management function of selection of employees. The closed shop deprives the employer of the right to hire the best qualified workers; it deprives workers of the opportunity of obtaining permanent employment on the basis of individual merit; it places upon the consumer the extra cost of inefficiency and featherbedding; it prevents ingenuity, better services and lower prices.

And these benefits which the public rightfully demands can be had without harm to unions or workers. The closed shop is not necessary to a union's right to bargain for wages, hours and working conditions. It is not necessary to the right to strike. It is not necessary to the union's financial security. It is an outmoded, antiquated and unsuited to modern industrial relations and personnel management as the yellow-dog contract.

I would like to add what Mr. French said about supervisors just this observation. The Government has already assumed a very difficult role in its intervention into labor-management relationships in the field of organization of production workers. There is about as much problem there as can be solved for some time to come.

Why would it not be well to let us work with that, and leave this segment of management, known as foremen, outside of Government regulation for awhile?

In closing I want to say just a word about the anti-Communist affidavit. This provision of the law has had practical results in our company. One of our largest unions obtained resignations from certain officers of an important local because of the Communist affidavit requirement. This union did a fine job of clearing itself of those who refused to sign the affidavit.

I am not one who regards any legislation as perfect or beyond all criticism. I did not so regard the Wagner Act, nor do I so regard the present law. It has been proposed that the latter act should be amended to make the anti-Communist affidavit a requirement for the employers' agents as well as for union officers. This seems to me a reasonable suggestion. Unless maangement and labor work together to make our American democracy and our free enterprise outshine communism, all our thought and talk about labor legislation will be largely useless. It seems to me that the anti-Communist affidavit is certainly one point upon which management and labor could readily agree and be mutually proud to be cosigners of the affidavit.

Now, just let me add this. The times call for great restraint—restraint on the part of management, restraint on the part of labor. The American people are plainly telling us that. I think we know in our hearts, both management and labor, that neither of us had a mandate from the American people. Rather we both have the duty to respect and improve our separate functions—labor to labor, management to manage. If we forget our functions and quest only for power, the American people will turn away from both of us. And if that day comes—the day when the state takes over because either management or labor has gained too much power—we shall not like it, either of us.

My belief is that if we can forget the hard words, the thoughtless, inflammatory, irresponsible talk and get down to substance, not many changes in the law as it now stands are needed. Alexander Pope had a line for it: "He governs best who governs least."

I thank you gentlemen for the privilege of appearing here.

Mr. IRVING. Are there any questions?

Mr. PERKINS. No questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Yes.

Mr. Hazard, I think your testimony will be particularly valuable to the committee because you are rather singularly placed as an employer in that type of establishment in which you employ labor in both phases that well illustrates the difference between the closed shop and the union shop; is that not correct?

Mr. HAZARD. That is quite true, I think; yes sir.

Mr. BURKE. In other words, in one phase of your business you have the skilled craftsman who has taken advantage of and has been a part of the closed-shop type of union for many years, in fact, some centuries.

Mr. HAZARD. That is right.

Mr. BURKE. You also have the mass-production industry, and I believe I am familiar with at least a part of it, because I believe you have an industry-wide agreement in part of your operation, at least, do you not?

Mr. HAZARD. That is correct.

Mr. BURKE. In mass production, the closed shop would not work, would it? That is, we both found early in the game that a closed shop was just not workable so far as mass production was concerned, because turn-over was too great, and there were other elements and factors that went into it. Then a device, so far as union security was concerned, was brought about, and the name "union shop" was given to it. And the difference between a closed shop and a union shop is that the requirement for a worker to be a member of a union before employment is not present in the case of a union shop.

Mr. HAZARD. I think, Mr. Congressman, if I may say this, that there is another distinction between the closed shop and the union shop which frequently is overlooked. It is considered only a matter of timing, whether the employee becomes a member before he is employed or 30 days after he is employed. But it really is not the difference in time; it is the fact that in the latter case, the employer may select his employee. In the former case, in the closed shop, the employer may not select his employee. That, in my opinion, is the great difference between the two forms of shop.

Mr. BURKE. I am glad you brought that out, because I would have come to that. The reason for that, going way back, is that in apprenticeable trades, the journeyman committee decided when the apprentice became a journeyman; is that no true?

Mr. HAZARD. That is a reason that is probably lost in antiquity. It is very old.

Mr. BURKE. On that, we may agree or we may disagree. But the evolution of our industry really comes about this way, that the hand tool is an extension of a man's hand, and the machine tool, of course, is an extension of the hand tool. And in the days of the hand tool, the craft was highly important. It still is in many cases, particularly in the type of thing in which you are required to hire skilled tradesmen; is that not right? The handcraft is very important to your business?

Mr. HAZARD. I would not say that the skills of the hand tool are any greater or more important than the skills with the machine. They certainly were important sometimes and at other times were not so important. And that is true with the machine, also. The requirement of skill is very great at times and lesser at other times.

Mr. BURKE. I am speaking of those phases of your stand entirely upon the handcrafts. You talked of glaziers, and people of that sort.

Mr. HAZARD. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. I was not speaking so much of the maintenance forces as the semiskilled and skilled men in the plants, and particularly the glass plant that you operate. But the handcraft union was established for two purposes, first, to protect the interests of the worker himself, and next, to protect the interests of the public; is that not right? And they were given the responsibility of furnishing to employers the people that were sufficiently skilled to operate the handcrafts for which they were trained.

Mr. HAZARD. Mr. Congressman, you are asking me a series of intermittent questions, or intermediate questions. Coming right to our distribution units where we engage in subcontracting, glazing subcontracting, if we could select and retain and train and groom these skills that you mention into permanent employment, we could have a very much higher efficiency than we have under the closed shop, and our costs could be lower and the installation of glass reduced in price to property owners.

Mr. BURKE. Do you lay that to the closed shop itself or to the operation of it?

Mr. HAZARD. Yes; we do, because it deprives us of the opportunity to select employees or to retain them for a continuous period of service; so we do not get the accumulation of skill and know-how built up that we would if we had the right to select the employees and retain them, or keep them permanently.

I cannot do any better than the illustration that I gave you. We worked 50 men, and we had to take 150 around the annual clock.

Mr. IRVING. Has not that inability to have the same employees right along been due somewhat to a shortage of glaziers during the war period?

Mr. HAZARD. I have watched it for about 10 years. That is the length of time I have been with the company. It seems to be about the same whether there is a high level or a low level of activity; in other words, whether there is a shortage or a surplus of glaziers, it operates the same way. We get a man for a week and then lose him and get him back 3 or 4 weeks later.

Mr. IRVING. Of course, there has been a shortage of skilled mechanics in construction trades, for 8 years at least—anyway since the preparation of the war effort started—and I thought that was true of glaziers. In fact, I am sure it is. My recollection in the few places that I have had experience with is that your glaziers were pretty much the same people in the same plants. I happen to know of a few plants, and I did not know there was any shifting from one plant to another or from one job to another except where there might be an emergency, or when they were needed for a certain job. They then might take them out of the job, or the plant for that job.

Mr. HAZARD. You understand, Mr. Chairman, I am not speaking of production plant. I am speaking of distribution establishments. For example, in Kansas City, Mo., we have a warehouse and sales branch, and that establishment acts as subcontractor on the installation of glass. It is there that we get this rotating and shifting, not in our plants, but in these local establishments.

Mr. IRVING. I understand thoroughly what you are talking about. There was a number of large defense plants built in that area with just hundreds and hundreds of panes of glass.

Mr. HAZARD. Yes.

Mr. IRVING. And there were not adequate glaziers there to take care of them and take care of the other work. I presume that that had something to do with the shifting of the glaziers.

Mr. HAZARD. We would like to be able, by having the right to select and train our own glaziers to make sure that we, at least, had an adequate supply and had opportunities to work on plans giving them annual employment on a steady basis.

Mr. IRVING. I do not think there is anybody opposed to annual employment. They have had pretty nearly that the last 8 years, and I think they enjoyed it very much. It is probably the first time in history that they have had such steady employment over such a long period, although I think maybe there is a lack of that at this time, or partial lack of it. I will not say there is too much of a lack of it. It is causing a little unrest because their security is not as great as it was.

I am familiar with your plant in Kansas City and several others there, and it is my opinion that your firm and the other firms and their own employees pretty steadily, that there was no shifting around that you spoke of.

One thing that I would like to bring out is this. Are you opposed to the right of contract? I mean, if the employer and employees want to make a closed-shop contract, are you opposed to that? It seems to me that is a fundamental right guaranteed in the Constitution, that if I want to make a contract with you and you want to make a contract with me, that is a fundamental right.

Mr. HAZARD. Well, that is what employers used to say about the yellow-dog contract.

Mr. IRVING. So far as I know, that was a little different type of contract. Would you deny those that do want that prilivege the right to have it?

Mr. HAZARD. That is a good question, Mr. Chairman, and I have thought about it a great deal.

Mr. IRVING. I mean to say that some did and some did not. This present labor-management act denies everybody the right of entering into that kind of contract.

Mr. HAZARD. That is right.

Mr. IRVING. And I would say that the law should say for those that want to, they should have that right, which I believe they still have under the Constitution.

Mr. HAZARD. I would like to answer your question, because it is an extremely important question. I think if it is established that the closed shop interferes with necessary management functions, then you would have to prohibit it outright.

Mr. IRVING. Wait a minute. My question was predicated on the fact that management wanted it. They would not want anything that interfered with them, that I could see.

Mr. HAZARD. Let me say if management should come before your committee and establish there are situations in which management cannot function without a closed shop, then you would have reason to raise this question. What I am laying before you is that a necessary management function cannot be performed under the closed shop. The selection, training, and building of employees into an affidavit unit cannot be done. You must either let management do that, or it does not get done. And the meaning of that is higher prices and higher costs and less production.

Mr. IRVING. Of course, Mr. Hazard, that is contrary and contradictory to the historical facts in the case of trade unions in the construction industry. They have had closed-shop contracts for decades.

Mr. HAZARD. And we have had high costs for decades, too.

Mr. IRVING. No; I would not say that necessarily, and I would not lay the high cost to labor either. That can be proven. While there have been great increases in the cost of materials, there is too much being said about the cost of labor bringing up the costs. I think that we should have an investigation of that, because I think sometimes is to blame because of agreements between employers which enter into the fact that costs are higher.

Say the employee's rate is $1.50. He is billed out at $3. Then there is a 10 or 20 or 35 percent cost added for overhead, and so forth. The employee does not get that extra $1.50.

I am speaking about plumbing, steamfitting, electrical work, and perhaps your own work. I am not too positive that you do not use the same formula in billing the public for your work.

Mr. HAZARD. I should think that labor might be well advised not to insist upon a closed shop, and then management would have all the responsibility for the costs and would not be able to duck the question any longer. As it is, I agree with you now that I do not know how much of the high cost is due to the closed shop in construction and how much is due to other things. You cannot tell.

Mr. IRVING. Personally, I cannot agree that has anything to do with it, particularly. I think it is being used as an excuse or an alibi, in my opinion.

Now, I am familiar with the construction industry. I am speaking in such a positive manner because I have actually worked in the industry. There are many of these people here who have not done any manual labor or any work and they have had no experience in collective bargaining. They have had no experience in trying to negotiate contracts or wage scales, so it is very easy for them to say, "Why, just go ahead and do these things." But I would like to see them do them once or twice. I would like to see them organize a plant once and see how easy it is under the Taft-Hartley law.

The law, in my opinion, was made so that people could not organize, and so that, finally, the strength of the unions would be dissipated.

I think I have used about all of my time. I thank you. And we will let the gentlemen on our left ask some questions.

Mr. Smith, have you some questions?

Mr. SMITH. I would like to make a speech in direct opposition to what you have just said.

Mr. IRVING. That is your privilege, of course.

Mr. SMITH. But I am not going to.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you.

Mr. SMITH. But this idea that materials just grow some place without any cost to it is ridiculous. Every time you cut down a tree you pay an increased cost to the saw, the truck, the tractor, and everything in it. They have all been jacked up. And I am also not unmindful of the fact that bricklayers are only laying 400 bricks a day where they used to lay 1,000.

Now, then, I have that off my chest.

Mr. IRVING. And I can agree with almost everything you said, Mr. Smith.

Do you have any further questions?

Mr. SMITH. Yes; I want to ask the witness a question.

On page 4 of your statement, I notice there you said you had 100 percent union dues-paying members in your shop. And in order to get that, you had to deny to the employee the right to join the union if he did not want to; in other words, when he did not want to join the union, you fired him.

Mr. HAZARD. That is right.

Mr. SMITH. Then you come in and say that the closed shop is necessary for your business. If it is good today, why was it not good then?

Mr. HAZARD. I did not say the closed shop is necessary; I said just the reverse. I think, Mr. Congressman, I should make——

Mr. SMITH. But you were making a closed shop in those days.

Mr. HAZARD. No; that is not a closed shop.

Mr. SMITH. I know the difference between a closed shop and a union shop.

Mr. HAZARD. It is not even a union shop. What we did——

Mr. SMITH. Why is it not a union shop if you fire a man if he does not belong to a union?

Mr. HAZARD. I will be glad to tell you, sir. A union shop is one in which if the employee gets in bad standing with the union for any cause, then the employer must discharge the employee. What we did in 1940, and what the Taft-Hartley Act provides today, is that the employer is not required to discharge except for failure to pay dues. The employee can be in bad standing for any one of 100 reasons. But so long as his dues are paid, the union cannot require the employer to discharge him. And that is a tremendous difference, one which I think many employers overlook. So we not only never had a closed shop under this plan; we did not even have the union shop. What the union had by contract with us was financial security only. We think that is all it is entitled to, and when it goes beyond that, it impinges upon management's function.

Mr. SMITH. Of course, I agree with that statement, but I could not understand why you were firing people back there because they did not belong to the union.

Mr. HAZARD. Only for failure to pay dues.

Mr. SMITH. That is all.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Kearns.

Mr. KEARNS. I would like to ask this: What is the initiation fee for the glaziers around the Pittsburgh area? Do you happen to know?

Mr. HAZARD. No, I don't happen to know.

Mr. KEARNS. How many apprentices do they allow in the union? So many per member in good standing, or do you have difficulty getting apprentices in the union?

Mr. HAZARD. We have had some difficulty; yes, sir.

Mr. KEARNS. Why?

Mr. HAZARD. We don't know.

Mr. KEARNS. The work was there to be done?

Mr. HAZARD. Yes.

Mr. KEARNS. You needed more men. That is the big thing, Mr. Chairman, about the closed shop, which I have been thinking about. It thwarts the possibility of earning a livelihood where men are kept out of the union. That is what I cannot understand about the closed-shop element in some of our trades, especially A. F. of L. unions where they keep them out.

Mr. IRVING. If I might take a minute, I might try to answer you. I think the security of the past has had a great deal to do with that. A bricklayer normally works 2 or 3 months out of the year, the carpenter about 6, and the laborer works 7 or 8 and, like everybody else, he wanted to project as much work as he can.

Mr. BURKE. Would the gentleman yield?

Mr. IRVING. Yes.

Mr. BURKE. Aren't you talking about the closed union rather than the closed shop?

Mr. IRVING. I?

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Kearns.

Mr. KEARNS. I think both of us are, as far as the closed union is relative to the closed shop. Do you think the public thinks of them both in the same way? They can't get in the union.

Mr. IRVING. However, I will say to my knowledge that the apprenticeship matter has been liberalized a great deal and there are committees set up, particularly in my area, for apprenticeships, and they include management and, I believe, the public and the unions, and they have regular meetings of these apprenticeship councils, as they are called, and committees, and they finally discovered there was a need for more of that type of skilled worker, not particularly glaziers, but any type of skilled mechanic.

They have liberalized that some. I suppose it is something like the bar association when they only pass a certain number of the eligible lawyers. I understand quite a few can't pass the bar association and, of course, they can't practice law, either. Maybe that is the same with the medical society; I don't know. They have pretty stiff examinations and regulations.

I have been told only about half or two-thirds of the law students finally pass the bar and become lawyers. I don't know what the rest of them do.

I think it is an excellent foundation for business and politics and for Congressmen and different people. We have lots of lawyers on our committee and lots of them in the Congress.

Mr. HAZARD. I wonder if I may be permitted to suggest——

Mr. IRVING. I think I am taking all my time and I believe you have taken all of yours.

Mr. HAZARD. The analogy is not quite complete, because anyone can go to law school and the function of giving a law examination is not a private function but a function of the State itself giving an examination to protect the public against unqualified practitioners, whether in law, medicine, or what not, but anyone can go to school and try to get ready to pass the examination.

Anyone cannot get employment as a bricklayer, as a plasterer, or as a glazier. He must first funnel himself through a private institution—the union.

Mr. KEARNS. I want to make a comment there. He did make a very fine contribution, where he said that management and labor both had a real obligation to the people. In other words, the legislation we write here isn't merely to serve management or labor, but the thing involved is service to the public.

I think that is the thing this committee and our whole committee writing legislation should be considering.

Mr. IRVING. I have very much to separate union people, working people, or any of them from the public. They are part of the country. So is management.

They do have an obligation and a responsibility definitely. I cannot disagree with that. I have not taken all of my time here today.

I would say in regard to your thought—you state that you put people out and I notice a little contradiction about firing people because they don't pay their dues. That is like a closed shop.

But supposing the unions found they had people in their unions that were perhaps placed there because of their antiunion feeling—they were in there just to wreck the union—and they couldn't take them off the pay roll. They couldn't do anything about them.

True enough, they might expel them, but under this law they could still work among the union members and get their work done. The same thing goes for a Communist.

Now, you force the Communist out of the officership of a union, but the union can't take him off of the job under this present law, and he can still circulate among the union members and practice his evil ways.

I want to say from experience that a whole lot of influence and a whole lot of things that are agitated in a union are agitated on the job. There is more conversation and there are more things carried on on the job than there is in the union meetings and by the officers. I think that we should go one step further. If the union finds Communists in the union, then let them take them off the job. Do you have any objection to that?

Mr. HAZARD. I have these observations to make: I think it is a serious responsibility that the union assumes to determine who can work and who can't work.

Now, it is true that you may have found it hard living in the union with a Communist or a person of a certain color or of a certain religion or certain ideas.

We find it hard in management. There are people in management with whom I don't agree. I don't like their ideas and I think they are dangerous, not in the public interest, but I can't exercise and wouldn't undertake to exercise the right to say they can't manage because I don't like their ideas. I have got to find a way to live with them.

I think that is your problem in unionism. Otherwise, you assume a very serious responsibility to say that some people can work and other people can't work. That is more power than you ought to wish to possess.

Mr. IRVING. I can see that they would have a great influence, particularly if they were allowed to work on the same job. You could do nothing about it. I think it would be a good thing if you could find some reason for taking them off the job. Then they would leave the union.

Otherwise, they can stay in that union and they can multiply greatly and propagate or whatever you want to call it.

However, I think we have taken too much time. We have two more witnesses, and I want to thank you on behalf of myself and the committee for your very fine cooperation and the presentation you have made here. We are glad you came.

Mr. HAZARD. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IRVING. Next is Mr. Elbert M. Cushing, of the United States Rubber Co.

Mr. Cushing, will you come forward, please? The chairman will refrain from now on, from questioning witnesses.

Mr. Cushing, you will have 15 minutes to read or summarize your statement, either way. It will be made part of the record if there are no objections, and I hear none.

TESTIMONY OF ELBERT M. CUSHING, DIRECTOR, INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS, UNITED STATES RUBBER CO.

Mr. CUSHING. Mr. Chairman, I think I can read the entire statement in probably 20 minutes, if you could give me that much time.

Mr. IRVING. Go ahead. We will take a little time off the rest of them.

Mr. CUSHING. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, my name is Elbert M. Cushing. I am director of industrial relations for the United States Rubber Co. I am grateful for the opportunity to appear before this committee since I believe that it is considering one of the most important problems facing the present Congress.

Much has been said both for and against the present law governing labor relations. At the outset let me say that generally speaking we have found the law to be beneficial to both employees and employers. It follows that if this be true then the public has also benefited. Unfortunately, the history of labor legislation in this country has been characterized by violent swings of the pendulum which have proven to be unhealthy for the parties affected by it. I would like to feel that any labor legislation coming out of this Congress would be with us for a long time and not be the subject of debate 2 or 4 years hence. Good or bad, the Labor-Management Relations Act was made a strong issue and remains one at this time, so that I fear that the political aspects of the problem may result in legislation which will set labor-management relations back 15 years. Obviously this would be tragic and would only have the effect of throwing the industrial welfare of the country back into the arena at next election time. If the legislation is sound, having a basis which is fair and equitable to all parties, there need be no fear that it will play an important role in the next election. Labor-management relations must eventually be removed from the atmosphere which now surrounds it, and placed in the hands of parties who experience the relationship, if we are to obtain good employer-employee attitudes.

A good unbiased law, which favors neither management nor labor, which places responsibilities on the shoulders of each can, and will, accomplish that end.

I feel that personally I can appraise the problem with my thinking unhampered by any great amount of unfavorable experience with labor. In my 20 years in this field nothing has happened that has made me believe that labor unions are made up of anything but people. The United States Rubber Co. is considered a company which enjoys a good relationship with labor and we believe that much is due to what we like to think is a reasonable attitude. Now with these two things in mind let us look at the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947.

I believe certain changes could and should be made in the law. However, much of the law should remain as is, since the little experience we have had with it indicates that it forms a good basis for industrial peace. You, gentlemen, are undoubtedly acquainted with figures on work stoppages in the period prior to the act and those subsequent to its enactment. Also, you are aware of the gains realized by employees under the act and the increase in union membership.

My company has followed what appears to be the general pattern. Here is United States Rubber Co.'s experience regarding hours lost through work stoppages. Those were all illegal, unauthorized work stoppages for which the union claimed no responsibility.

(1) 1946—1,269,000 lost hours.

(2) 1947—724,550 lost hours (98 percent first 8 months, prior to the effective date of the present law).

(3) 1948—324,342 lost hours.

The unions, while saving employees money by decreasing work stoppages, have been able to negotiate increased benefits for their members, some of which are (a) 11 cents per hour increase in wages; (b) 6 paid holidays, when no work was performed; and (c) increased vacation payments.

Over and above the foregoing a greater desire to work problems out across the table has manifested itself. Since the enactment of the law my company and the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum, and Plastic Workers of America have held labor-management meetings on a divisional basis, i. e., a footwear division meeting, tire division meetings, and mechanical goods division meeting. There are no negotiations of issues at these meetings. Each party advises the other of the problems facing it, renders constructive criticism, and solicits the aid of the other in the solution of the problems. The results have been favorable.

You may say, "Your company may have held the same meetings regardless of the law." That may be true, but the actual fact is that the law did not prevent the parties from getting together; and by this we believe that in part it was responsible for such meetings. In some respects it has forced irresponsible elements in unions to conform to what the great mass of union people believe is the honest, proper way to conduct themselves. The law has been a tremendous aid to labor leaders, most of whom are trying to do a businesslike job in the control of irresponsible elements within their organizations. Many labor leaders privately admit that the law has been helpful in some respects. Of course, they can't openly admit this in view of the position labor generally has taken on the act.

I would like to scan the law quickly and point out our thinking on its provisions.

National Labor Relations Board: Regarding the National Labor Relations Board we see very little wrong with it in its present form, although we have had no occasion to use it. Generally the size of an administrative board has little bearing on how well it administers the law creating it.

Rights of employees: The rights of employees to engage in, or refrain from engaging in, union activity should be continued.

Unfair labor practices: These should be included in any legislation. This section of the present law has placed the responsibility on both parties, as it should be. The relationship between employer and employee is close, and in any such relationship burdens must be borne by each. It is my belief that the lack of equal distribution of responsibility and the failure to impose sanctions on unions by the Wagner Act led to many of the abuses which gave rise to the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. It is probably also true that the lack of a law imposing sanctions on the employer gave rise to the Wagner Act. However, let us not consider legislation which will force us to run through either cycle again.

In addition to the present unfair labor practises enumerated in the present law, I would respectfully suggest the inclusion of a clause making it an unfair labor practice for either party to fail to follow procedures established by their agreement for the handling of grievances.

The right of free speech in union matters should be preserved. This has created a healthy condition which is good for labor despite the fact that they may complain about it. It causes them to conduct their organizing campaigns on a higher, sounder level; it has not hurt their membership, and the figures bear this out.

The definition of what constitutes collective bargaining is reasonable as now construed, and should be retained. The construction which has been placed on the definition under the Wagner Act, placed the employer in a position where despite the factors surrounding a demand, a negative answer was not considered a counterproposal and thus he could be guilty of an unfair labor practice. This undoubtedly creates a one-sided situation which should be avoided. History proves that a good resounding "No" sometimes reacts to the advantage of all, whereas a concession injures all.

Representatives and elections: Considerable argument has been had on section 9 (a) of the act, which deals with collective-bargaining representatives. All I can observe regarding this section is that in my experience whenever a union has been chosen by a majority of the employees as the sole collective bargaining agent, then the best relationship with that union can be achieved by dealing solely with the properly designated officials of the union. This thought was carried into our present agreement with the United Rubber, Cork, Linoleum, and Plastic Workers of America. If section 9 (a) of the act tends to hamper the parties in this respect, then it is contrary to the best principles of labor-management relations.

I can say that we have not found it so in my company nor in any company I have observed.

If this portion of the law should be changed, care should be taken that the right of management to talk with its employees, to gather information, to reprimand or give commendation where necessary, and to give orders and instructions must not be abridged.

The right to request elections should be retained in its present form.

The provision regarding elections to determine whether a union may bargain for a union shop should be deleted. It is a waste of time and taxpayers' money. It is misleading and has been a source of discontent.

Section 9 (f) and (g) regarding the filing of reports and non-Communist affidavits should be continued and in all fairness could be extended to apply to employers. I think we are all aware that this requirement in the law has forced communistic elements in certain unions out into the open where they can be counted. It has helped the better element in certain unions to clean house and rid themselves of adherents to foreign philosophies.

Limitations: It is my personal belief that States' rights on matter of union security should be preserved. Curtailment by State legislatures of union-security problems does not assault the general principle of collective bargaining, and use of the interstate commerce clause by the Congress to overcome the exercise of the State power will lead to unnecessary criticism and opposition to any new legislation without obtaining benefit for the group which alleges it will be benefited.

I wish to refer now specifically to section 14 (a) of the present act which exempts supervisors from the definition of the word "employee" for the purposes of the law.

This section is by far the one which my company and I feel is most important to preserve.

All the reasons which caused my company to be among the first to recognize labor unions in the rubber industry have prompted us to most strenuously resist the organization of foremen and supervisors.

The foreman is a part of management and as such is charged with the responsibility of administering the principles and policies of management in supervising and directing the working force. By becoming a part of a labor organization he subscribes to a set of principles and policies which, unfortunately, are sometimes opposed to those of management.

When a foreman becomes a part of a labor organization it hampers the control which his superior has over his activities. It follows that if management is not able to control those within its own group, then it loses effective control of the business and the result is chaotic and injurious to the successful operation of the business, which in turn reacts against the best interests of labor, management, the stockholder, and the public.

Obviously, any business must have an effective management group. If foremen are to be removed from this sphere, then it will be necessary to superimpose another layer of management personnel above the foremen in order to assume the duties and responsibilities which the foreman cannot perform because of his adherence to principles which at times do not coincide with those of management. This would be costly and certainly not in the best interests of the foreman himself.

It should also be remembered that experience with the organization of supervisors prior to the present law demonstrated that various levels of supervision were included in a bargaining unit. Since, in manufacturing plants, it is usually the case that lower supervisors outnumber the upper level of the group it is quite conceivable that officers, et cetera, will be chosen from the group having the greater number.

The result well could be that a man might be bargaining with an employer for his own boss. Such a situation is not pleasant to contemplate but could and probably would happen if supervisors are grouped in the same category with wage employees under the law.

You will recall that at the time the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 was debated on the floor of Congress, many predictions were made that exclusion of supervisors from the protection of the law would encourage strife. Work stoppages were predicted on the theory that supervisors and foremen would strike for recognition. This failed to materialize and in fact many companies established plans and programs which benefited the supervisory personnel. It was also urged and argued that industry would remove the protection granted many people under the law by designating them as supervisory personnel. This has not materialized in fact—could not so long as the National Labor Relations Board continues to function as it has been in the past.

There have been in the past, and probably will be in the future, many protestations that a labor organization made up of supervisory personnel can be independent, but I and many, many others with experience in the field of labor relations are convinced that as a practical matter such an organization could never operate in a truly independent manner. To believe otherwise is to ignore some of the most important aspects of unionism.

Conciliation Service: While my company has had very little occasion to use the Conciliation Service, we believe that the Service in order to receive acceptance must remain an independent agency. The reasons are obvious and need no further exploration.

National emergencies: While, generally speaking, labor relations should be left in the hands of the parties, it is also true that interests of the entire country must be protected even at the cost of restricting the rights of a few. Therefore, I believe it is absolutely essential that the President have the means of effectively handling problems which threaten the national welfare. To hold otherwise is to admit the possibility of the economy of the country being brought to its knees in the interests of a few people.

Suits by and against labor organizations: It is a true premise that good labor relations are not made in court. My company has never exercised its right to sue a labor union, although we have felt that we had that right, prior to the enactment of the Labor Management Relations Act. The record indicates that most employers believe in he premise stated since only 37 suits were instituted by employers, 19 by unions, and no judgments rendered which indicates that most suits have been withdrawn. However, we believe that the inclusion of the provision has had an influence on certain employers who in the past treated their obligations of contract too lightly. Further, it has been used by responsible union people to control members bent on violation of contract. We recommend on this basis that it be retained.

Restriction of payments: This section should be broadened to permit the deduction of initiation fees and rejoining fees, as well as dues, under a voluntary pay-roll deduction arrangement. The hue and cry raised against the provision as it is has not been borne out by the facts, and in the case of United States Rubber Co. on June 1, 1947, only 72 percent of the people eligible for union membership were having dues checked off, whereas today 89 percent of those eligible are having dues checked off. This despite the fact that in some locations there was in effect on June 1, 1947, an involuntary type of check-off, which had been ordered by the National War Labor Board and which we were unable to bargain out in contract negotiation.

Secondary boycotts: I believe that most people looking at the secondary boycott in an unbiased manner will agree that it should, and must be controlled. Too many innocent victims are made to feel economic pressure for a cause in which they personally have little or no interest. The secondary boycottt provision should remain.

Summary: To summarize, we feel that most of the law should remain as it is but that it could be strengthened by—

First, applying the requirement of reports and non-Communist affidavits to employers as well as unions.

Second, eliminating the necessity for elections to permit unions to bargain for union shops.

Third, permitting the deduction of initiation and rejoining fees on a voluntary basis.

Fourth, eliminating the requirement of a vote on the employer's last offer in national emergency cases, and Fifth, adding a provision to the unfair labor practice section requiring both parties to an agreement to follow procedures set forth in the agreement for the settlement of grievances.

Finally, I wish to state that I believe it would do no credit to this Congress to completely destroy a piece of legislation which the facts show to be beneficial to labor, industry, and the public. What little experience we have had with the law indicates that with very little change it will serve well everyone for many years to come.

Again I wish to stress the importance of maintaining the status of supervisory personnel in its present position. Employers have proven that they can satisfactorily manage their business under most conditions, but I feel certain that the organization of supervisory personnel will lead to lowering the efficiency of management, higher costs, decreased productivity, and these in turn will result in a lower standard of living.

Let us also remember that a law governing labor relations which is not fair and equitable in its distribution of responsibility will certainly come up for change at some future date, and what industry and labor in this country need least is a constantly changing set of rules on which to base their relationships. The closeness of the relationship between employee and employer is such that it cannot prosper except in an atmosphere of stability and permanence.

Thank you.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. No questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. No questions.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. I would like to have you explain paragraph 4 on page 10, eliminating the requirement of vote on the employer's last offer in national emergency strikes.

Mr. CUSHING. As I understand it, the present law provides that in a national emergency situation where an employer has made an offer, that the employees be given an opportunity to vote upon that last offer. I understand that there has never been a case where a vote of that kind has been held that they voted other than based upon the recommendations of their union leadership, which was to turn down the last offer.

It seems to me it is a waste of time and a waste of the taxpayers' money. That is the only point I make.

Mr. SMITH. Do you think the union officials should be the ones to decide the matter?

Mr. CUSHING. No, sir; I didn't say they should decide it. I said the union official makes a recommendation to the membership, and the membership follows the recommendations. Therefore, you are holding a vote for something to which you know the answer before you hold the vote.

Mr. SMITH. That is all.

Mr. IRVING. I think we will let you off easy. We thank you for coming before us. We thank you for your fine statement and your fine attitude.

Mr. CUSHING. Thank you, sir.

Mr. IRVING. We have one more witness, Mr. William J. During, vice president and general manager of Precision Castings Co., Inc.

TESTIMONY OF WILLIAM J. DURING, VICE PRESIDENT AND GENERAL MANAGER, PRECISION CASTINGS CO., INC., SYRACUSE, N. Y., ACCOMPANIED BY COUNSEL, HARRY A. SMOYER

Mr. IRVING. Do you have copies of your statement to be made part of the record?

Mr. DURING. I do, sir.

Mr. IRVING. Without objection, it will be made part of the record following your testimony.

Mr. IRVING. I hope you will limit your testimony to about 15 or 20 minutes. The hour is getting late.

Mr. DURING. In addition to that, I have also brought copies of the outline of my statement, if you would like them.

Mr. IRVING. Is that different from what we have here?

Mr. DURING. It is a condensed copy; yes. It may be helpful to you.

Mr. IRVING. To the members of the committee?

Mr. DURING. That is correct. I would like to read the outline.

Mr. Chairman, I would like to introduce Mr. Harry H. Smoyer of Cleveland, Ohio.

Gentleman, my name is William J. During. I am vice president and general manager of Precision Castings Co., Inc. Only for the purpose of showing that I understand the problems of employees I want to state that I started in industry a long time ago as an apprentice tool and die maker at 6 cents per hour. I have been connected with Precision for 25 years, first as chief engineer, and in my present capacity since 1942.

One year ago, and before lay-offs became necessary, the number of employees engaged at our 4 plants was about 1,900.

I am here to show you how certain sections of the amended National Labor Relations Act have worked in actual practice and why, in my opinion, they should not be repealed.

At the end of the old Wagner Act our Fayetteville, Cleveland, and Kalamazoo plants were each under contract with the International Union of Mine, Mill, and Smelter Workers, Casting Division (CIO).

In 1944 negotiations with this international was represented by a former candidate for the Cleveland City Council who ran openly as a Communist.

In the 1945 and 1946 negotiations this international was represented by a member of the 1946 New York City Provisional May Day Committee for the Communists' May Day parade.

I don't believe our employees knew this.

By the summer of 1947 this international union had a well-established reputation, that it was Communist-dominated or controlled.

At that time the average Precision employee was powerless to clean up such a situation. His employer was required by law to deal with that union. If his employer were to tell him the facts and urge him to get another union, the employer was then chargeable with an unfair labor practice.

In time of war, with Russia on the other side, the position of every Precision worker would have been very precarious.

The old Wagner Act needed at least four things to meet this situation:

(1) The employer and everybody else must have the unqualified right to tell the facts.

(2) The individual employee's job must be protected if he undertook to oppose the union by reason of the facts.

(3) The law must contain a procedure whereby employees could procure an election to vote a union out and compel its decertification, as well as a procedure whereby they might vote for another union; and

(4) The United States Government must take a position against Communist-dominated unions and give the advantage to those unions which are neither so dominated nor controlled.

The new Labor-Management Relations Act supplied these rights and remedies.

The employees of Precision and their company used these rights during the first 6 months of 1948. The result is that our Fayetteville employees are now represented by UAW-CIO and our Cleveland employees by A. F. of L. Our Kalamazoo employees had a choice between these unions but elected to have no union. The Syracuse plant employees have never had a union.

The full statement which I have filed tells in some detail how these rights were used and this result obtained. The outline is as follows:

The new act was first applied when this international union demanded recognition for the Syracuse plant in November 1947.

It was invited to petition NLRB for an election. Having determined to boycott the NLRB, it refused.

The company urged it to comply with the law. It refused.

The company petitioned for an election. The Board gave the union 10 days to comply. It again refused. The Board then dismissed the petition.

Under these circumstances the company refused that union recognition.

The new act was next applied after the union on December 24, 1947, sent its 60-day notices to modify the existing agreements which had March 1, as their expiration date.

The company's notices, dated December 29, offered to meet and confer if and whenever the international union complied with the law.

In the alternative, the company notices provided for the termination of the contracts March 1, 1948.

On January 2, 1948, the company advised its employees by letter as to what is had done and why.

On January 8, the international union replied to the company's notices stating "No contract, no work" as its policy. Next day it characterized the requirements of section 9 (h) as "yellow-dog affidavits."

The company next announced to its employees that come March 1 there would be no changes in wages and working conditions until proper bargaining relationships were again established.

The union next procured votes favoring a strike March 1 at Kalamazoo and Cleveland.

So that its employees might act on facts, the company next procured and displaced to its Fayetteville and Syracuse employees documentary evidence concerning the Communist and "fellow traveler" records of certain representatives of the international union.

The result was that when the Fayetteville employees voted, there was a heavy majority against a strike. This was late in February 1948.

The company attempted to show the same evidence to its Cleveland employees. Under instructions from the international union, the Cleveland shop committee let most of the employees out of these meetings. The result was that their previous strike vote stood.

At Kalamazoo the union tried the same thing. The employees, however, refused to follow them. They saw the evidence and decided to disregard their strike vote.

On March 1, 1948, the international union threw picket lines around all four plants.

At Fayetteville the great majority of the employees kept on working. The picket lines lasted only 2 or 3 days. At the Syracuse plant the story was the same.

At Kalamazoo a majority of the employees kept on working despite statements by their union leaders that all other plants were closed down tight; so the union maintained quite a picket line until four of the employees came to the Fayettevile plant to investigate for themselves.

When they saw with their own eyes that they had been lied to, they telephoned the facts to the other workers, which ended the strike at Kalamazoo except for a few die-hards.

At Cleveland, where the employees had been kept ignorant of the facts, the plant remained closed until about April 7, because the workers were led out of our meetings by the union before they could see and read the facts. These same facts were transmitted to our employees through the mails, with the further result that the plant was soon reopened and the strike was called off by the old union about April 21.

We were then in this position, namely, the available jobs in our plants were manned by old employees who had repudiated the international union. But that union was still the certified bargaining agent.

The olw Wagner Act provided no procedure whereby that certification could be avoided intelligently and expeditiously.

The bill now before you provides no such procedure.

Under the amended act they were free to take effective action. It contained the thoroughly American and efficient procedure whereby the employees could vote themselves out of that situation if no other union claimed their bargaining rights.

Our employees and our company used the machinery of the new Labor-Management Relations Act. New NLRB elections were held promptly with the results stated before.

The facts I have outlined show that section 9 (c), the free-speech provision, should be retained. It was absolutely necessary in handling this kind of a situation.

These same facts show why those portions of section 8 (a) (3) and 8 (b) (2) which protect an employee from discharge for other than nonpayment of dues should also be retained. Our employees were all working under union-shop contracts. Without this protection the leaders among our employees who stood out against communism would have lost their jobs.

These same facts show that the right given in section 9 (b) to employees and employers to file petitions for elections should also be retained.

The company's petition settled the situation at the Syracuse plant.

The employees' petition for decertification was highly instrumental in settling the situation at the Kalamazoo plant.

These same facts show how completely followers of the "party line" can obtain control of the operations of a single company, and likewise of an industry; a situation which we could not possibly live with in wartime.

The old union's noncompliance with the non-Communist affidavit under section 9 (h) made it practically an illegitimate one.

The old Wagner Act saddled many American employees with Communists and "fellow travelers" as their union leaders. The bill before you, H. R. 2032, would do the same thing.

I firmly believe that the great majority of the American workmen want no Communists or "fellow travelers" in such positions of leadership. Section 9 (h) helps to keep them out. In my opinion you will be rendering a very valuable service to the Communist Party if you recommend its repeal. It will be the "shot in the arm" that the Communist Party in this country is looking and waiting for.

If you bring about the removal of this provision from the law, the average workman would say something like this: "In 1947 my Government took a position against communism in labor organizations and agreed to back me up if I took that same position. Now my Government has backed off from that position. Whose side is my Government on, my side or the Communists' side?"

Should you ask, I want you to know that I would gladly sign such an affidavit as is required by section 9 (h).

That is the outline of my story as to how these provisions of the amended act have worked. In the short space of 6 to 7 months under these provisions our whole situation was transformed into one of complete satisfaction to both our employees and our company.

In my opinion you cannt afford to destroy the machinery that made this transformation possible.

Thank you.

Mr. IRVING. Do you have any questions, Mr. Burke?

Mr. BURKE. Yes; just one question.

On this non-Communist affidavit, do you feel that that was solely responsible for the control of Communists in the labor movement?

Mr. DURING. The non-Communist affidavit section was responsible for the suspicion that we had that the international officers were either Communists or were Communist-dominated.

Mr. BURKE. You didn't know that before?

Mr. DURING. Not definitely. It was through their refusal that we decided to investigate on our own, and then we exposed the results of that investigation and it was then that the employees took it upon themselves to change their tactics.

Mr. BURKE. Then you feel that any labor-union official who refused to sign was of necessity a Communist?

Mr. DURING. No; not by any means. We in this situation only checked their records by their own utterances in the newspapers, their positions in Communist organizations, and the claims of the Daily Worker on them as members. We showed just those facts to our employees. We made no statements of accusation ourselves whatsoever.

Mr. BURKE. Suppose there were no non-Communist affidavits, and suppose there were no labor unions, and suppose there were no such things as problems in labor relations.

Mr. DURING. You are speaking of Heaven, now?

Mr. BURKE. Yes. But, as an officer of a corporation, if the Government came along and said to you, "An officer of a corporation over here in another part of the country, and over here in another part of the country, and over here in another part of the country, have been found to be Communists or Fascists, or 'what have you,' and, therefore, in order to carry on your business we must know, and you must prove, that you are not a Communist, or are not a Nazi or a Fascist"; how do you feel about that?

Mr. DURING. That is perfectly all right with me.

Mr. BURKE. You would not feel that you were being accused of guilt, and had to prove your innocence?

Mr. DURING. Not at all. I do not look at it that way. I like to stand up and be counted as a loyal American.

Mr. BURKE. What do you think your background would amount to, your reputation for patriotism as a good community citizen, and so on; does that not mean something?

Mr. DURING. It certainly does, and I do not consider the signing of a non-Communist affidavit would be any reflection on my background.

Mr. BURKE. Well, I did.

Mr. DURING. We are of a different opinion.

Mr. BURKE. I signed one.

Mr. DURING. Oh, I see; I beg your pardon.

Mr. BURKE. I signed it because I felt that my feelings as an individual had to be sacrificed for the good of the people that I represented. In other words, I felt that they had to be given full opportunity to use every bit of bargaining procedure that was their command to use, and it could not be done if I did not sign it, but I felt that it was a reflection upon my Americanism and patriotism in order to be required to do it to carry on my daily business.

Mr. During. That, of course, is your individual prerogative.

Mr. Burke. That is true, but there are many people who feel the same way, and it is not with those people so much a matter of propaganda throughout the country. I know your attorney, and I have known him for several years. In fact, we have met across the bargaining table, and we had pretty fair relationships.

Mr. During. That was one of my reasons for inviting Mr. Smoyer because he has had many years of fine experience both under the Wagner Act and the National Labor Relations Act, in adjusting labor differences, and if there are any questions you would care to put to him I am sure he would be happy to answer them.

Mr. Burke. It is getting rather late in the evening, so I will not ask any more questions.

Mr. Irving. Mr. Smith, have you any questions?

Mr. Smith. I only want to say the Precision Castings Co. has certainly been precise in their statement, and it is one of the most precise statements that has come before the committee. I want to congratulate you on the way you have prepared your statement.

Mr. During. Thank you, sir.

Mr. Irving. I want to add the same words. They are very easy to follow, and have been well gotten up, and I want to say the full committee appreciates your coming here, and we thank you.

Mr. During. We feel you fellows have a tough job ahead, and anything we can do to help you, we are more than happy to do, and thank you.

(Mr. During's prepared statement is as follows:)

Statement by William J. During, Vice President and General Manager, Precision Castings Co., Inc., Syracuse, N. Y., Concerning H. R. 2032, With Particular Reference to Section 8 (a) (3), Section 8 (b) (2), Section 8 (c), Section 9 (c) (1), and Section 9 (h) of the National Labor Relations Act as Amended in 1947

I'm here to show you how sections 8 (a) (3), 8 (b) (2), 8 (c), 9 (c) (1), and 9 (h) of the amended National Labor Relations Act, as it appears in Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, have worked in actual practice and why they should not be repealed.

Sections 8 (a) (3) and 8 (b) (2) protect an employee from loss of his job because of his expulsion from his union by reason of his criticism of its leaders or their policies, for example, with respect to communism, or by reason of his trying to get a new union.

Section 8 (c) is the free-speech section of the act.

Section 9 (c) (1) is the section which gives employees the right to file petitions for decertification. The same section gives employers the right to file petitions for elections.

Section 9 (h) is the section which requires the filing of non-Communist affidavits as a condition precedent to using the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board.

THE COMPANY AND ITS BUSINESS

Precision Castings Co., Inc., is a New York corporation. Its principal office is at Fayetteville, a suburb of Syracuse, N. Y.

The company is engaged in the business of manufacturing and machining zinc, aluminum, and magnesium alloy die castings. These operations are carried on in its Fayetteville, N. Y., and Cleveland, Ohio, plants.

At its Syracuse, N. Y., die and tool shop, it is engaged in the construction of casting dies and trimming tools and in experimental die-casting.

The company owns Precision Castings Co., a Michigan corporation. This subsidiary operates a plant at Kalamazoo, Mich., where it is engaged in buffing, polishing, and plating the products of the Fayetteville, N. Y., and Cleveland, Ohio, plants.

Ours is not a large company when it is compared with General Motors and other similarly large companies. But ours is an important industry, both during peace and wartimes, because we engage in large volume production at low costs per item. Our competitors in our industry and the unions with which we deal usually rank us as the second largest in the industry.

During the latter part of 1948 a decline in our business necessitated many layoffs from our working force. We hope this is a temporary condition. It was caused largely by the amount of time other members of my organization and I had to devote to labor matters during the first 6 months of last year when we might otherwise have been out after new business. You see, it is from the dies which we secure in the spring of the year that we manufacture during the next fall and winter. However, 1 year ago, and before lay-offs became necessary, the number of employees engaged at the various plants and their offices were as follows:

	Fayetteville	Cleveland	Syracuse	Kalamazoo	Total
Factory	740	520	103	257	1,620
Office	139	47	20	40	246
Total	879	567	123	297	1,866

SOME OF OUR BASIC BELIEFS

Our company is not opposed to collective bargaining. It is not opposed to unions. It is not opposed to contracting with strong unions. It believes they should be responsible for their contracts and equally responsible to their membership and to the public for any attempted excessive and arbitrary use of power, just as we are. We oppose communism and we don't believe that Communists should be assisted by our Government in their positions of leadership in American labor unions.

We believe that the American workman is first of all an American and that when he has the facts, if he has the machinery for a choice, he will prefer to give custody of his bargaining rights to labor unions which are dominated neither by Communists nor by so-called fellow-travelers.

THE OLD WAGNER ACT PROVIDED EMPLOYEES NO MACHINERY TO COMBAT COMMUNISM

The old Wagner Act did not give him that choice. It provided the procedure whereby an employee could give exclusive control over his bargaining rights to a particular union. But it contained no procedure whereby he could get those bargaining rights back unless he could induce another union to put on a campaign for his bargaining rights. He could only do this at the risk of expulsion from his union on charges of dual unionism if the new union were unsuccessful. Unions for the most part refused to try to unseat established organizations. The employees were practically helpless.

Under the old Wagner Act it made no difference how much force, violence, coercion and intimidation the union organizers employed in their organizing campaign. Once the union was certified the individual employee was required to be bound by the acts of the union and subject to the domination of the particular group which controlled it. In many cases these were Communists or fellow-travelers.

Under the old Wagner Act, if an employee suddenly awakened to the fact that he was being represented by Communists and fellow travelers, there was little he could do about it. He had to go on paying his dues to a group whose policies were dependent upon whether the wind was blowing from or to Moscow.

THE 1947 LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS ACT PROVIDED THE MACHINERY

The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, changed all this. Under the provisions I have referred to the employees became masters of their own destinies in such situations. Under these provisions they have had the right to determine whether the character and performance of their representatives was satisfactory to them and to take effective action in accordance with their conclusions. That should be the inherent right of every American workman. I don't believe it is debatable.

H. R. 2032 WOULD ABOLISH THESE RIGHTS

It is because the bill that is before you (H. R. 2032) would take away these rights that I desire to place before you the facts as to the status in which Precision employees found themselves, (a) when the old Wagner Act was amended, (b) their present status, and (c) how they reached that status under these particular provisions of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947.

In that connection I will show you that the privileges they exercised under the present law were privileges that are thoroughly American and which should not be again taken from them now that they are a part of the American law of labor relations.

I am sure that when you hear the facts you would want the right to continue to exercise those privileges were you American workmen. I believe that the allegiance to his country of the average American workman is second only to his allegiance to Almighty God.

AT THE END OF THE OLD WAGNER ACT—WRITTEN CONTRACTS IN EFFECT AT THREE PLANTS WITH THE INTERNATIONAL UNION OF MINE, MILL AND SMELTER WORKERS

At the end of the old Wagner Act, August 23, 1947, the Fayetteville, N. Y., the Cleveland, Ohio, and the Kalamazoo, Mich., plants had all been organized by the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers, casting division, an affiliate of the Congress of Industrial Organizations.

At that time there were in effect at each of said three plants collective bargaining agreements. Each of these contracts provided for the union shop. The Fayetteville and Cleveland contracts provided for the check-off of union dues, fines, and assessments without individual authorizations from the employees. The Kalamazoo contract provided for the check-off of dues and initiation fees on individual authorizations.

The Fayetteville agreement was between the company, said international union and its local union No. 704. It was made October 30, 1946, supplemented in July 1947, with respect to wages, and its expiration date was March 1, 1948. The Fayetteville plant was organized by this union in 1943.

The Cleveland agreement was between the company, said international union and its local union No. 705. This agreement was made October 31, 1946, supplemented in July 1947, with respect to wages, and its expiration date was also March 1, 1948. It was also organized in 1943.

The Kalamazoo agreement was between the subsidiary company, said international union and its local union No. 736. This agreement was made October 29, 1946, supplemented in July 1947, with respect to wages, and its expiration date was also March 1, 1948. It was organized in 1946.

THE CONTRACTS WERE NEGOTIATED WITH INTERNATIONAL REPRESENTATIVES WHO HAD COMMUNIST RECORDS

It may be of interest for you to know that in the 1944 negotiations of the Cleveland and Fayetteville agreements the employees and the international union were represented by an individual who was a candidate for the City Council of Cleveland, Ohio, in the 1935 primaries and that at that time he ran openly as a Communist. According to the Cleveland Press of December 11, 1941, this same individual was demoted from his position as assistant director for Ohio district 50 of the United Mine Workers under circumstances stated by that newspaper, as follows:

"C. I. O. sources here said replacement of District 50 officials with picked followers of John L. Lewis had been quietly under way since August, the principal victim being followers of the Communist Party line who have clashed head-on with Lewis' isolationist policies."

In 1945 and 1946 Fayetteville and Cleveland contracts were also negotiated by the company with an individual of Communist reputation. He was a member of the 1946 New York City provisional May Day committee for the May Day parade sponsored each year by the Communist Party.

We feel certain that neither the Fayetteville nor the Cleveland employees knew of the Communist reputations of these representatives supplied to them by this international union.

We feel equally certain that had they known of their Communist reputations, the old Wagner Act provided no remedy to them—no way by which they could certainly avoid being represented by them.

I imagine that the members of this committee are very jealous of their right to decide who shall represent you as committee counsel. The American workman, under the old Wagner Act, could not even avoid being represented by avowed Communists.

THE REPUTATION OF THIS INTERNATIONAL UNION

By the summer of 1947 the House Committee on Un-American Propaganda Activities had dug up and published the Communist or "fellow traveler" reputations of several of the officials of this international union. The daily newspapers had branded it as Communist dominated or controlled. The Daily Worker had claimed some of its officials as its own.

THE STATUS OF OUR EMPLOYEES UNDER THE OLD WAGNER ACT

This then was the situation of the average Precision employee under the last days of the old Wagner Act. He was powerless to clean up the situation in the conventions of his union. His employer was required by law to deal with his union whether Communist dominated and controlled or not. If his employer were to tell him the facts and urge him to get another union, the employer was chargeable with the unfair labor practice of interfering, restraining, and coercing its employees in the exercise of their rights to organize and to bargain collectively.

In time of war, with Russia on the other side against the United States, the position of the average Precision worker would have been no less than precarious under the old Wagner Act.

You might say that under the old Wagner Act the employer could not have been successfully prosecuted for telling the employees that their union was Communist dominated or controlled. Possibly that's true, but he would have had to go to the United States Supreme Court in order to get the charge dismissed finally.

But, that is no answer. It would have been impractical and inadvisable for our company to declare to its employees the Communist and "fellow traveler" reputations of the officers and leaders of this union. Their answer based upon the old Wagner Act, would simply have been "What can we do about it? We are not going to try to lick the whole Communist Party. If the United States Government doesn't care enough about it to back us up, we'll just have to endure it."

Thus, employees and employers were practically powerless in the face of situations similar to that which prevailed in the plants of our company.

If there ever was a mandate from the people to do something about such a situation, Congress received that mandate in the 1946 election.

WHAT THE OLD WAGNER ACT NEEDED TO CORRECT SUCH SITUATIONS

What was wrong with the old Wagner Act when it was applied to the Precision and many other similar situations? There were several things which the old act did not provide which must be supplied to take care of them. These were:

1. The employer and everybody else must have an unqualified right to tell the facts.

2. The individual employee's job must be protected if he undertook to oppose the union by reasons of the facts.

3. The law must contain a procedure whereby an employee could file a petition for an election and thereby vote a union out and compel its decertification, as well as a procedure whereby they might get an opportunity to vote for another union.

4. The United States Government must take a position against Communist dominated or Communist controlled unions and give the advantage to those unions which were neither Communist dominated nor controlled.

Given these rights and remedies, the employees and their employers who found themselves in such situations might be expected to correct them.

THE ACT AS AMENDED IN 1947 SUPPLIED THE NECESSARY RIGHTS AND MACHINERY

The Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, became law June 23 of that year. That law supplied the rights and remedies which were needed.

Section 8 (c) of the amended National Labor Relations Act guaranteed the unqualified right to tell the facts.

Section 8 (a) (3) and 8 (b) (2) of that act protected the individual employee's job, even under a union shop agreement.

Section 9 (c) (1) of that act provided the thoroughly American procedure of election for the decertification of a Communist dominated or controlled union.

Section 9 (h) of that act, by requiring the filing of non-Communist affidavits as a condition precedent to the use of the facilities of the National Labor Relations Board, definitely put the United States Government into a position against Communist dominated or controlled unions and gave the advantage to unions whose officers were willing to make and file affidavits against Communist Party membership or affiliation and against being anti-American in their beliefs and purposes.

USING THEIR RIGHTS THE EMPLOYEES VOTED THE OLD UNION OUT AND NEW UNION IN

The employees of Precision and their company used these rights. Without these rights they would have been powerless. Having exercised these rights, the employees of our Fayetteville plant are now represented by the UAW-CIO. The employees of the Cleveland plant are represented by the American Federation of Labor. The employees of the Kalamazoo plant had a chance to vote for either of said unions but elected to have no union. The employees of the Syracuse Die and Tool Plant have never had a union.

HOW THE NEW RIGHTS WERE USED AND HOW THE NEW MACHINERY WORKED

Here are the facts as to how the Communist dominated or controlled International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers was voted out of three plants and unions of good reputation voted into two of them. And, mark you this, what our employees and our company did could not have been done under the old Wagner Act. Nor could it be done under the bill H. R. 2032 which is before you for your consideration.

THE UNION DEMANDS RECOGNITION FOR A FOURTH PLANT—THE SYRACUSE DIE AND TOOL SHOP

The rights created by the act as amended in 1947 were first exercised in connection with our Syracuse Die and Tool Shop.

On November 24, 1947, the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers requested recognition as bargaining agent for the employees of that plant. On that date a meeting was held between representatives of the company and of the union with respect to the union's request for recognition.

At that meeting the company proposed that an election be conducted by the National Labor Relations Board and promised recognition in the event the union received a majority vote. This had been the procedure employed at the other three plants for effecting recognition.

THE UNION DETERMINES TO BOYCOTT THE NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS BOARD

In that same meeting the union answered that it could not petition for an election because its international union had determined to boycott the National Labor Relations Board and that it had not complied with sections 9 (f), (g), and (h) of he National Labor Relations Act. The union requested that the company consent to an election under supervision by an agency other than the NLRB or that other means be devised to take the place of an election.

THE COMPANY STANDS BY THE AMENDED ACT

The company refused to agree to any other procedure than that provided by the National Labor Relations Act, but requested the union to put its suggestions in writing for the purpose of further consideration. This was done, and upon further consideration the company decided to stand by the law.

THE COMPANY FILES A PETITION FOR AN ELECTION

Meantime the company filed a petition with the regional office of the NLRB at Buffalo, N. Y., for an election to be conducted at the Syracuse plant. Under the old Wagner Act it could not have done this. Section 9 (c) of the amended act gave it that right. The NLRB gave the union ten (10) days to comply with the law. It refused. The NLRB then dismissed the petition.

THE COMPANY URGES THE OLD UNION TO COMPLY WITH THE LAW

While all of this was going on, two representatives of the international union called upon our representative in Cleveland on two different occasions. They again requested that we avoid the NLRB and avoid NLRB certification. They were urged to bring their union into compliance with the law. Their answer, in substance, was "You run your own business and we will run our union." In short, they refused to comply with the law as to the filing of non-Communist affidavits. These conversations were on December 5 and 15, 1947.

THE UNION SENDS NOTICES OF ITS DESIRE TO MODIFY THE AGREEMENTS

Because of the March 1, 1948, termination date, it was incumbent under the new law upon the union and the company before January 1, 1948, to send notices to each other of their desire to modify or terminate the agreements.

The union's notices to the company were dated December 24, 1947. The text was the same for all three plants. They expressed a desire to modify the agreement at each plant and offered to meet and confer for that purpose.

THE COMPANY SENDS NOTICES TO MODIFY, CONDITIONED ON COMPLIANCE, OR, IN THE ALTERNATIVE, TO TERMINATE

The company's notices to the union were dated December 29, 1947, and their text was the same for all three plants. The notices were friendly in tone. They expressed a desire to continue the bargaining relationships. They contained offers to meet and negotiate new contracts if and whenever the international union complied with sections 9 (f), (g), and (h) of the amended National Labor Relations Act. There never was any doubt but that the officers of the local unions would have been glad to sign the affidavits. In the alternative the notices provided for the termination of the agreements as of their expiration date, March 1, 1948.

THE COMPANY NEXT FULLY ADVISED ITS EMPLOYEES AS TO WHAT IT HAD DONE

On January 2, 1948, the company mailed to the homes of each of its employees a letter explanatory of the company's notices. The text of the letters was the same for all four plants. The letters epitomized the notices, stated the reasons behind the notices, quoted the applicable provisions of the law, and closed with the following paragraphs:

"Precision has no quarrel with its employees or with their representatives. It sees no necessity for any quarrel. It hopes that by merely stating its position, the international can be induced to abandon its policy of noncompliance so that both it and the local union can comply with the law. It wants its employees to have all the rights under the law. It wants these rights for itself.

"Meantime, let all of us carry on our daily tasks in the usual spirit of friendliness and cooperation, and in accordance with the existing contract."

THE INTERNATIONAL UNION ANNOUNCES A "NO CONTRACT, NO WORK" POLICY

Under date of January 8, 1948, the international union, by the director of its die-casting division, replied by letter to the company's notices of December 29, 1947. He stated the union's policy to be "No contract no work."

There was no evidence that our employees were ever called to any union meetings before this policy was determined and thus stated. Notices of such meetings would have appeared on the bulletin boards had such meetings been held.

THE INTERNATIONAL UNION DESCRIBES NON-COMMUNIST AS "YELLOW DOG" AFFIDAVITS

On January 9, 1948, there was distributed by the union to the employees of the Kalamazoo and of the Cleveland plants a circular over the signature of the director of the casting division of the international union. The circular characterized the non-Communist affidavits required by the law as "yellow-dog affidavits."

THE COMPANY ANSWERS THE EMPLOYEES' QUESTIONS AS TO WHAT WILL HAPPEN COME MARCH 1ST

Having decided that if the union persisted in its refusal to comply with the law the contracts between the company and the union would be terminated March 1, 1948, and having informed its employees to that effect, the company was beset with questions from the employees as to what would happen to their wages, hours, working conditions, vacations, etc., come March 1, 1948, and no union contract.

In order to answer these questions the company prepared and distributed to its employees on January 14 a letter of reassurance as to what would happen March 1, and thereafter. The following two paragraphs from that letter show the spirit and intention of the company:

"We hope that the international union will comply with the law before March 1, and that a new contract will be negotiated by that time.

"But if it doesn't, Precision isn't going to change the wages, policies, and procedures that are set up in the present contract. Precision is going to go right on working. Because we can't have a union shop without an NLRB election, we will not be able to maintain that, and we will not be able to maintain the check-off without a contract. But every other working condition will be the same and will continue that way until proper bargaining relationships are again established."

THE UNION TAKES STRIKE VOTES AT CLEVELAND AND KALAMAZOO

In its communications to our employees the union avoided the real issue. It raised false issues with our employees and upon the basis of false issues the union conducted strike votes at the Cleveland and Kalamazoo plants early in February. At both of these places it reported that a majority of the employees voted in favor of a strike come March 1.

The employees of the Fayetteville plant delayed their strike vote as long as possible.

THE COMPANY PROCURES AND PRESENTS TO ITS EMPLOYEES THE FACTS AS TO THE COMMUNIST AND FELLOW TRAVELER RECORDS OF CERTAIN OFFICERS AND REPRESENTATIVES OF THE INTERNATIONAL UNION

The sole issue between the company and the international union was communism. The newspapers and trade papers had branded the international union as Communist-dominated or controlled. The employees would need the facts before they could be sure of their situation and before they would do anything about it.

The company, therefore, carried on an intensive search for documentary evidence of the Communist and fellow traveler reputations or records of the officers and representatives of the international union. There was a lot of it.

The company decided to show this to the employees so that this evidence could speak for itself. By the photostatic process it had this documentary evidence "blown up" so that when posted on a large board the employees in the room could see and read it for themselves.

The company then held meetings with its Fayetteville employees in its conference room. By packing the room to its capacity about 125 employees could be seated.

The company then displayed the evidence. It woudld take a lot of time for me to tell you what the evidence showed. Each of those sessions lasted about 2 hours and there were 10 of them, including 1 at the Syracuse plant. It is sufficient to state that after those sessions there were few employees who had any doubts about the fact that certain officers and representatives of their international union had well-established reputations or records as Communists or fellow travelers.

Our employees reached this conclusion not from anything we said. Rather they arrived at that conclusion from the published data concerning them which they saw with their own eyes.

FAYETTEVILLE EMPLOYEES VOTE AGAINST A STRIKE

The result was that when the Fayetteville employees voted there was a heavy majority against a strike. This was late in February.

THE COMPANY MAKES THE SAME EVIDENCE AVAILABLE TO THE CLEVELAND AND KALAMAZOO EMPLOYEES

The company decided to make the same information available to its Cleveland employees. It scheduled and held the same sort of meetings. But, it appeared that the representatives of the international union had instructed the local shop committees to lead the employees out of the meetings. No one was compelled to attend any of the meetings. The Cleveland shop committee led most of the Cleveland employees out of the meetings. The result was that most of the Cleveland employees never heard the facts and as a result their previous strike vote stood.

At Kalamazoo the union tried the same thing; that is, to lead the employees out of the meeting. The employees refused to follow. They saw the documents. They decided to disregard their strike vote.

THE STRIKES OF MARCH 1, 1948

On March 1, 1948, the international union threw picket lines around all four plants.

AT FAYETTEVILLE AND SYRACUSE

At Fayetteville the great majority of the employees paid no attention to the picket lines. There was ample police protection. They kept right on working. The picket lines lasted only 2 or 3 days. At the Syracuse die and tool shop the story was the same.

AT KALAMAZOO

At Kalamazoo a majority of the employees kept on working. However, the union falsely advised the employees that all plants of the company were closed. It maintained a picket line which provoked considerable violence until a delegation of Kalamazoo employees, half workers and half pickets, visited the Fayetteville plant and saw with their own eyes that the Fayetteville plant was working full. They telephoned that information back to Kalamazoo and only token picketing was carried on after that.

AT CLEVELAND

At Cleveland, where the employees had been led out of the meeting by their shop committee upon instructions of the representatives of the international union who thereby kept them ignorant of the facts, the plant was closed. It remained closed until about April 7, 1948, when it was reopened with a small number of employees which increased from time to time until about April 21, when the old union called the strike off and withdrew its pickets.

THE CLEVELAND STRIKE LOSS WAS LARGE AND WOULD NOT HAVE OCCURRED IF THE EMPLOYEES HAD BEEN PERMITTED TO SEE THE EVIDENCE

There were 520 factory employees before that strike. Their average hourly earnings at straight time were about $1.40. They were working an average of 45 hours per week. That means 47½ hours pay per week.

During the almost 6 weeks that the plant was closed, the employees lost over $200,000 in wages and the plant lost so much business that more than 100 employees never did get back to their jobs.

The only reason the Cleveland employees and our Cleveland plant sustained these staggering losses while the other plants did not, was the fact that the Cleveland employees were prevented bp their union leaders from hearing the facts before they were led out on strike.

ESTABLISHING NEW BARGAINING RELATIONSHIP

We were then in this position, namely, our plants were running and the available jobs were manned by our old employees who had repudiated the International Union of Mine, Mill and Smelter Workers. But that union was still the certified bargaining agent for all three plants.

THE OLD WAGNER ACT WOULD NOT HAVE WORKED

Under the old Wagner Act there was no procedure whereby that certification could be voided intelligently and expeditiously except through the process of the company subjecting itself to an unfair labor practice charge for refusing to bargain and that kind of case might consume 2 years before a definite and conclusive decision could be obtained.

THE PRESENT BILL WOULD NOT HAVE WORKED

The bill now before you would return employees in situations like ours to that same condition where they had no remedy. Under the old Wagner Act they were really slaves of the union in such a situation. Under the present bill they would return to slavery in such a situation. Under the amended act they were free to take effective action.

In my humble opinion it would be a grave mistake for this committee to recommend that in such a situation they be returned to that kind of slavery.

It would be a grave mistake because the amended National Labor Relations Act contained thoroughly American and efficient procedure whereby the employees could vote themselves out of that situation if no other union came around and claimed the bargaining rights.

Here is how that law was applied in our situation and how it worked:

THE NLRB PROCEDURE WAS EFFICIENT AND EXPEDITIOUS AT ALL THREE PLANTS AT KALAMAZOO

At Kalamazoo a large group of employees got up a petition which they proceeded to file with the NLRB to decertify the old union. That started the American Federation of Labor and the UAW-CIO on a campaign for votes. This was in February. Both the AFL and UAW-CIO filed petitions. Then the petition for decertification was withdrawn by the employees.

On June 24, 1948, the NLRB conducted an election. The contending unions were UAW-CIO and UAW-AFL. The vote was: UAW-CIO, 48; UAW-AFL, 20; no union, 64.

Because there was no clear majority, a run-off election was held July 26, 1948, when the vote was: UAW-CIO, 44; no union, 81.

Thus, at Kalamazoo, despite the difficulty of removing all the "monkey wrenches" which the old union threw into the machinery, the NLRB completely handled the situation in 5 months, including two elections.

AT FAYETTEVILLE

At Fayetteville the matter was handled even more expeditiously. There the election was held May 4, 1948. The contending unions were the American Federation of Labor and UAW-CIO. The results were: UAW-CIO, 368; AFL, 269; neither, 22.

The "neither" vote is very significant because of the fact that the old union having been barred from the ballot by the NLRB under the law, put on a very strenuous campaign for "neither" votes.

Thus, at Fayetteville, despite all sorts of objections from the old union, the NLRB handled the matter in just about 2 months.

AT CLEVELAND

At Cleveland the story was about the same. There the contending unions were the American Federation of Labor and UAW-CIO. The election was held June 22, 1948. The results were: AFL, 168; UAW-CIO, 130; neither, 8.

Here again the "neither" vote is signficant because of the campaign put on by the old union which was barred from the ballot by the NLRB for "neither" votes. But the Cleveland employees had been given the facts by mail as to the Communist reputations of certain officers and representatives of the old International Union and when they had the facts they reacted just as the typical American employees at the Fayetteville and Kalamazoo plants. They took back their bargaining rights from those who were followers of the party line.

OUR PRESENT SITUATION

Our employees and our company used the machinery provided by the amended act and this is where we landed.

At Fayetteville, in July 1948, we made a 2-year contract with UAW-CIO. Our employees and our company have been happy under that contract, except that we wish we had more business.

At Cleveland, in July 1948, we made a 2-year contract with AFL. Our employees and our company have been happy under that contract. There, too, we wish we had more business.

At Kalamazoo the employees each have a printed complete statement of all working conditions covering wages, paid holidays, vacations, etc., which is in every sense a contract between them and the Company.

At the Syracuse plant there is still no union. There never has been.

CONCLUSION—SECTION 9 (c), THE FREE-SPEECH PROVISION, SHOULD BE RETAINED

The facts I have presented show that section 9 (c) of the amended act, the free-speech provision, should be retained in the law. It proved absolutely necessary to handling the Communist and fellow-traveler situation in our plants. There can be no reasonable objection to the manner in which it was used.

THOSE PORTIONS OF SECTIONS 8 (a) (3) AND 8 (b) (2) WHICH PROTECT AN EMPLOYEE IN HIS JOB SHOULD BE RETAINED

These same facts show why that portion of section 8 (a) (3) and of section 8 (b) (2) of the amended act which protects an employee from discharge from his job by reason of his expulsion from his union for other than nonpayment of dues should be retained.

Our employees were all working under union shop contracts. Without the protection of those provisions the leaders among our employees who stood out against communism and the followers of the party line would have been expelled from the union and their discharges would have been compelled.

THE RIGHT OF EMPLOYERS AND EMPLOYEES TO FILE PETITIONS AS PROVIDED IN SECTION 9 (c) FOR ELECTION SHOULD BE RETAINED

These same facts show that the right given to employees and employers to file petitions for elections with the NLRB in section 9 (c) of the amended act should be retained.

The company's petition to the NLRB settled the situation at the Syracuse plant.

The employees' petition for decertification was highly instrumental in settling the situation at the Kalamazoo plant. The NLRB was efficient.

THE NON-COMMUNIST AFFIDAVIT REQUIREMENT OF SECTION 9 (h) SHOULD BE RETAINED

These same facts show how completely followers of the party line can obtain control of the operations of a single company. In the same manner they can control an entire industry. In wartime the production of that industry is dependent upon the Kremlin's instructions. This is indisputable.

No one can doubt that neither the UAW-CIO nor the AFL would have touched our situation were it not for section 9 (h) of the amended act which for all practical purposes made the old union an illegitimate one.

The old Wagner Act saddled many American employees with Communists and followers of the party line for their union leaders. The bill before you (H. R. 2032) would do the same thing.

No one can possibly doubt that a great majority of the American workmen want no Communists or fellow travelers in their labor organizations or in positions of leadership in those organizations. Section 9 (h) helps to keep them out of those positions. In my opinion you will be rendering a valuable service to the Communist Party if you recommend that the Congress take that provision out of the law. Should that be done I believe we will all live to regret it. It will be the shot in the arm that the Communist Party is looking for. It will negate our Marshall plan for Europe.

The average American workman would say something like this if you bring about the removal of this provision from the law: "In 1947 my Government took a position against communism in labor organizations and agreed to back me up if I took that same position. Now my Government has backed off from that position. Whose side is my Government on, my side or the Communist's side?"

Should you ask, I want you to know that I would gladly sign such an affidavit as is required by section 9 (h) and that I would consider it a privilege to thus stand up and be counted on the side of my country.

That is my story about how these provisions of the amended act have worked. In the space of 6 or 7 months under these provisions our whole situation was transformed to the mutual satisfaction of our employees and of our company.

In my opinion you cannot afford to destroy the machinery that made this transformation possible.

Mr. IRVING. I want to make this announcement: This committee will now adjourn until 10 o'clock in the morning, when we will take up where we have left off tonight. Tomorrow is Saturday, but we will begin working again tomorrow at 10 o'clock.

(Whereupon, at 10:35 p. m., an adjournment was taken until the following day, Saturday, March 12, 1949, at 10 a. m.)

NATIONAL LABOR RELATIONS ACT OF 1949

SATURDAY, MARCH 12, 1949

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
SPECIAL SUBCOMMITTEE OF THE
COMMITTEE ON EDUCATION AND LABOR,
Washington, D. C.

The subcommittee met, pursuant to adjournment, at 10 a. m., Hon. Augustine B. Kelley (chairman) presiding.

Mr. KELLEY. The subcommittee will please be in order.

I have here a letter from Mr. Paul A. Strachan, president of the American Federation of the Physically Handicapped. He was unable to appear in person, and they directed this letter to the committee. They are very much interested in this legislation because they feel they have not been dealt with fairly by management and, without objection, I would like to have this placed in the record.

(The letter referred to is as follows:)

AMERICAN FEDERATION OF THE PHYSICALLY HANDICAPPED, INC.,
Washington, D. C., March 10, 1949.

Hon. AUGUSTINE B. KELLEY,
Chairman, Subcommittee, House Committee on Education and Labor,
United States House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR Mr. CHAIRMAN: As I am informed your subcommittee is holding hearings upon H. R. 237, a bill to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act, I desire to submit this statement, for the record.

In order to make plain my reason for approving H. R. 237, it is necessary for me to cite some history. As you know, for many years my concern has been, to advance the welfare of physically handicapped people. However, unfortunately, except for isolated instances, prior to World War II, industry stands convicted of callously ignoring the handicapped, and until the wartime stringencies for manpower forced industry and business to employ handicapped, they had been completely left out the economic scheme.

Gradually, handicapped began to be absorbed into various jobs, and more than 1,350,000 of them were employed during the war years. Yet, today, the trend is, again, insofar as the handicapped are concerned, "First to be fired, and last to be hired!"

With this in mind, it is my conviction that since industry and business failed, signally, to take any steps beneficial to handicapped, but to the contrary, jacked up physical demands higher and higher, on the pretext of saving insurance money, I say, on the evidence, the only friend the handicapped have, is organized labor, which has in many instances, written into union contracts requirements that give handicapped equal opportunity, if otherwise qualified, with the non-handicapped.

Anything, then, that is detrimental to the best interest of laboring people is, likewise, detrimental to the interest of the handicapped, and the weight of testimony on H. R. 237, coming from working people and their representatives, indubitably points out the dangers and difficulties engendered by the Taft-Hartley Act, and the necessity for its repeal.

Therefore, I am convinced that continuance of the Taft-Hartley Act would endanger the economic advancement of our millions of handicapped citizens, by denying them the full privileges and benefits of collective bargaining through the unions of their choice, and I hope your committee will unanimously approve H. R. 237.

Respectfully,

PAUL A. STRACHAN, President.

Mr. KELLEY. Also I would like to ask unanimous consent of the committee to place in the record an excerpt from the report of the regulatory commission or task force working for the Hoover Commission. The substance of the article is regarding the general counsel, as set up under the National Labor Relations Act of 1947.

Without objection I would like to have that placed in the record.

(The excerpt referred to is as follows:)

D. THE GENERAL COUNSEL

Another problem that has caused us considerable concern is the position of the general counsel. As indicated above, he is a prosecutor, an administrator, a policy maker. The incumbent, Mr. Robert Denham, has noted that his powers "are broad and absolute and his authority final to an outstanding degree seldom accorded a single officer in a peacetime agency."

The existence of such an office, independent both of the Federal departmental structure and of the Board, marks a departure from previous administrative practice. If permitted to set a pattern for future Government organization, it may lead to a diffusion of responsibility.

Such an official is in a peculiarly exposed position. In view of the wide powers of the office, it is inevitably subject to heavy pressure from all sides, and lacks the protection of either a multiheaded agency or an executive department in resisting such pressures. Experience during the first year indicated a tendency to develop close working relations with the joint congressional committee established by the act. To the extent that this has involved advice and suggestions with respect to interpretation of the act and its application to specific situations, the practice seems doubtful and likely to blur the desirable separation between the legislature and administration.

But the administrative position of the general counsel is also anomalous. Thus the field offices under his supervision are engaged partly in representation work which is the direct responsibility of the Board, and partly in investigating, issuing, and prosecuting complaints, on which the general counsel has final authority to appoint the regional directors and other employees. In part, as has been seen, the work of the general counsel is essentially prosecution of violations of specific offenses under the act. But insofar as his actions establish policy, they are of the kind frequently assigned to an independent commission.

The unusual position of the general counsel has given rise to several internal administrative problems. One is significant enough to be noted here: In unfair labor practice cases, regional directors issue complaints, though only with the approval of the general counsel in some types of cases. The finality of refusal to issue a complaint has led to demands for an appeal; and it has been further urged that an appeal to the same unit in the counsel's office whose advice was followed in the original refusal is illusory, and that the appeal should be to an independent body. This problem highlights the nature of the authority the general counsel is exercising.

Our conclusion is that the present position of the general counsel is an unstable one. Various proposals have been made for integrating the position more securely into the Government structure. Some have suggested assigning him to the Department of Labor or of Justice, but each has serious draw-backs as the preceding discussion of his functions should indicate.

Our staff recommends the creation, by Executive order, of a council of labor under the chairmanship of the Secretary of Labor, and including the General Counsel and other Federal officials concerned with labor problems. The function of the Council would be to coordinate Federal labor policy and to advise the President on appropriate action. This represents a compromise between the present independent status of the general counsel and his subordination to a department head.

Others have strongly urged that the office should again be placed under the Board. To this the objection is made that the prosecuting functions should be separate from the hearing of complaints. But as has already been indicated, only in part are his present duties genuinely prosecution: some parts are administrative and parts are a species of rule or policy making. It may be that the administrative and policy-making functions could be subordinated more clearly to the Board's control while still maintaining an adequate separation of the truly prosecuting activities.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Turner, do you have any copies of your statement?
Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.
Mr. KELLEY. Would you distribute them to the members?
Mr. TURNER. At this time?
Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

TESTIMONY OF PHILIP C. TURNER, PRESIDENT, FOOD PRODUCERS COUNCIL, INC., BALTIMORE, MD.

Mr. TURNER. Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Labor Committee of the House, my name is Philip C. Turner, Equitable Building, 10 North Calvert Street, Baltimore, Md. I am past president of the Maryland Farm Bureau Federation and am president of the Food Producers Council, Inc., an organization made up of 150 farmer-owned and farmer-controlled member organizations operating in 8 States. Our membership includes fruit and vegetable producers and their organizations, State farm bureaus, State granges, purchasing co-ops, and milk-marketing co-ops. Our organization represents many thousands of individual farmers.

Our council was formed in 1945 at the instigation of farm leaders.

I have appeared before both the Senate and House Labor Committees in the past, pleading for the passage of a fair labor relations act. I presented at that time a bill of particulars appealing to Congress to pass remedial laws that would stop high-handed practices of racketeering by some labor leaders, particularly those in the trucking industry who handled perishable food products.

At that time, I presented as evidence signed affidavits from truckers, which are available to you in the Congressional Record of the last Congress, setting forth the racketeering which prevails in a lot of markets. The rackets complained of were forced unionization of truck drivers, the forcing of exhorbitant payments for unloading produce in the wholesale fruit and vegetable markets, and refusing to allow truck drivers to unload their own trucks.

A recent letter from Vilas W. Shook, secretary-treasurer of local 401, affiliated with the International Brotherhood of Teamsters and addressed to all unemployed members of local 401, reads as follows:

WILKES-BARRE, PA., December 9, 1948.

Attention: All Unemployed Members of Local No. 401:

It has been brought to my attention that some of you are on the streets and around certain receiving platforms of houses that are under contract with our union doing what is commonly termed "jockeying trucks."

Let me advise you that it is strictly a violation of the Hobbs Act, also the Taft-Hartley law to pressure, force, compel or coerce anyone to employ your services to unload these trucks as they dock at platforms.

You may or may not know of the congressional investigation against the Goldberg and Turk Daniels of local No. 929 of Philadelphia, Pa., for those of you who don't, let me inform you that they have been indicted and I mean the entire local union when I use the term "they" for merely asking the driver pulling in to load as follows: "Do you have a teamsters' book?"

I want to say, since that was written by this gentleman, they have been convicted. However, if it had only been for that one violation they probably would not have been convicted, but they were guilty of pretty nearly everything under the name of Heaven, and they were tried and convicted, with eight women on the jury and four men.

I might add it looks very black for that local at the present moment, so please carry in your minds, effective as of this date, your local union will at no time tolerate anything that is a violation of any law.

If you are fortunate enough to have these drivers as mentioned employ your services, there is nothing wrong in that.

If you have difficulty, do not contact your local officers because we will have to ignore any and all requests concerning this matter.

If you get into any trouble regarding trucks, you are strictly on your own. These laws are very vicious. Be careful.

Gentlemen, I will leave it to you as to whether those things enumerated above are vicious, and a law is needed to control them. It is just in reverse to what he stated.

You will note that this labor union official speaks of the Taft-Hartley and Hobbs laws as being vicious. It is our contention that it is vicious to oppose a law simply because it does not give license for the vicious practices enumerated in this letter.

We have had the Taft-Hartley Act for practically 2 years. It has accomplished much in bringing about better understanding and more equitable settlement of labor problems which would be fair to labor, industry, agriculture, and to the consuming public.

At a public New York hearing, held some months ago, astounding evidence was given by the president of local No. 202, A. F. of L., truck drivers' union testifying under oath. He said:

Anyone picking up this contract between the union and the produce merchant would say, "This union is worse than Jesse James or Dillinger; worse than Stalin," and nobody could be worse than he is. But there are reasons for it all. And there is an honorable intent. That is important.

He further said that he wrote the contracts himself and that they were "rough," "harsh," and "terrific." He admitted that he possessed the power arbitrarily to destroy the business of any commission merchant in the city of New York. With the kind of organization we have, and the commodity over which we have jurisdiction, you know a strike wouldn't last very long, would it? He contended, however, that he exercised his dictatorial power benevolently in the interest of the members of his union, the merchants, and the public. He said that he loved free enterprise systems—

You see I have been fortunate * * * and I practice it.

He further said, if he were defeated for office and someone took over in whom he did not have faith, like the Communists—

I would destroy all these contracts. * * * I would go on the side of these employers, and work for them.

The facts developed through other witnesses established conclusively that despite the noble professions, employers were forced to surrender their constitutional rights in order to do business in New York City. Only one employer testified that he closed his doors rather than to sign these contracts; many commission merchants testified that they signed the contracts without reading them and were required to go to union headquarters to execute the agreements. Farmers and their drivers testified that they were required to pay tribute to local

No. 202 to unload their produce in New York City. The union denied this. The farmers produced receipts. One man had $200,000 worth, to my knowledge.

Local No. 202 enforced a 5-day week in the New York markets. In Philadelphia, Teamsters Local No. 929 has done the same thing. The movement is growing and may well result in the loss of millions of dollars to farmers and fruit growers through the depreciation and spoilage of high perishable crops. This means less food at higher prices to the consuming public.

The attitude of some witnesses and the reluctant and evasive testimony of other witnesses who appeared, created a very strong suspicion that there was collusion between the leaders of local No. 202 and the bargaining committee of the market associations, and that by virtue of this collusion local No. 202 has grown into a Frankenstein, the mention of which arouses such fear of retribution in the minds of the commission merchants of New York City that they have surrendered many of their rights as employers. The handling charge which some of these merchants have established for unloading farmers' produce, which the drivers are paid to do, appears to merely be a subterfuge to cover a union racket.

Farmers thought that when the Hobbs Act became law, their troubles would be over, as it supposedly would stop the practices enumerated above. To date we only know of two convictions under the Hobbs Act, namely, Philadelphia and New Orleans. There have been hundreds of charges that have been ruled out because there has been no violence in connection with extortion and robbery being practiced.

The author of this bill, Judge Hobbs, has stated that the Department of Justice is not carrying out the intent of Congress in its interpretation of the Hobbs bill. Surely legislation can be enacted that would correct all the evils we have tried to cover in this report.

We contend that a man with a truck who travels the highways of this Nation pays taxes on that truck to the Federal Government, the State, the county and the towns and cities. After being properly taxed by these agencies, it is a reflection on the intelligence of our American people that we stand idly by and allow an ageney, such as the teamsters union to usurp taxing power that is only the prerogative of the State.

We hope you gentlemen will agree on legislation that will be fair to labor and at the same time put labor, industry, and agriculture on an even footing, all equal under the law. We beg of you that any bill enacted into law shall put an end to practices that injure both the producers and the consumers of food, while only selfish labor leaders benefit.

Gentlemen, we feel under the Taft-Hartley Act that we have had a period of peace, and there has been a lessening of the evils we complain of here, with that law in effect. We feel that if you change the Taft-Hartley Act by taking out some of the more drastic things that we will have a great upsurge of this trouble that is being gradually whittled down, and we hope that you will keep the best portions of the Taft-Hartley Act.

I was here yesterday listening to some of the witnesses who were picking the law to pieces, part by part, and I want to say labor, to my knowledge, has not been injured by any provision of the Taft-Hartley Act. I am not going to argue to not make some modifications, but taking it as a whole, I want to say the members of the teamsters' union over in Baltimore have been behaving themselves, and, I think, if all the other unions would do the same everything would be all right. I will say for the Baltimore teamsters' local that they have not caused us any trouble and, I think, it is only fair that I say that.

Mr. KELLEY. Do I understand you to say that labor organizations have not been injured by the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. TURNER. I cannot see that it has. There have been less strikes and we still have the highest wage rate that was ever held in this country, and I have made a close study of all strikes, and I know we have had less strikes, and labor is being well paid.

Mr. KELLEY. Do you think that is an argument in favor of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. TURNER. I would generally suppose so.

Mr. KELLEY. That does not seem logical to me, because if you can compel labor not to strike or, at least, make it so difficult to strike, that is not saying they are satisfied or happy about it.

Mr. TURNER. I have never been able to find where that is true, where labor unions have been injured, and have been kept from striking to their detriment where they had a just cause. I think the Labor Relations Board, when you have these hearings before them, it has been my observation—take the man I just read about here, who named all of those things up there and said that they were vicious legislation and vicious law——

Mr. KELLEY. I am not offering any defense for outright racketeering, but when you say labor organizations have not been injured, how about the typographical union, which is a closed shop, if you please—that industry or organization has been in a turmoil ever since the Taft-Hartley Act went into effect.

Mr. TURNER. I understand you are saying you are not protecting racketeering, and I want to say we have no fear of the God-fearing men in labor, but what we are trying to do is break up some of the leaders, and what they are trying to do. I believe in collective bargaining, and I believe in giving them all the rights that are fair, but whittle them down to everybody's size, and make laws——

Mr. KELLEY. Of course I agree with you that you cannot treat one group of people different from another, but if you want to take care of the labor leaders who are racketeers then you should take care of the business racketeers.

Mr. TURNER. Yes, and treat everybody alike. The consuming public has not been given enough attention in all of this controversy, either, and they are the ones who have the biggest stake in this.

Mr. KELLEY. Of course, when you say the consuming public that goes back again to the workers and their families, because that is the great majority of the consuming public, and then you get right back to labor again.

Mr. TURNER. Have wages fallen because of the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. KELLEY. No; they have not because you have contracts which are effective.

Mr. TURNER. The contracts have run out, and have been renewed, have they not?

Mr. KELLEY. Most of them were made before the Taft-Hartley Act went into effect.

Mr. TURNER. We want to stop things like the thing John L. Lewis is doing this morning.

Mr. KELLEY. That is not a strike, but it is a stoppage of work that was permitted under the contract. It is no strike. What did the coal operators sign the contract for if they did not agree to it? And now there is screaming and yelling from many sources that there is a coal strike on.

Mr. TURNER. Is there a filibuster going on in the Senate.

Mr. KELLEY. I think so.

Mr. TURNER. Is that a filibuster or not a filibuster? A strike is a strike and a filibuster is a filibuster, as I understand.

Mr. KELLEY. That has no connection with what we are discussing. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Turner, you understand the committee is conducting hearings on H. R. 2032?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. In listening to your presentation you seem to be discussing not the proposed legislation but the existing Taft-Hartley legislation. Have you ever read H. R. 2032?

Mr. TURNER. Yes sir, I read all of the definitions, all of the issues that are brought up in that bill, yes, sir. I read it over, and we are all familiar with it.

Mr. BAILEY. You stress particularly in your presentation the fair boycotts in jurisdictional strikes.

Mr. TURNER. That is right.

Mr. BAILEY. Are you aware of the fact that H. R. 2032 has inhibitions against boycotts and jurisdictional strikes?

Mr. TURNER. It has, yes.

Mr. BAILEY. In subsection 12.

Mr. TURNER. I do not think there are enough curbs in that bill to to answer the purpose.

Mr. BAILEY. They curbed the matter complained about.

Mr. TURNER. No. I am sorry to say I do not think there is anything in that bill, or that there is enough to stop any of the practices that we complain of.

Mr. BAILEY. You mean, then, you must have the power of injunction, the power to break strikes, is that what you mean by being strong enough to handle it?

Mr. TURNER. Only in the case of where the national welfare is at stake, and then, I believe, the President should have the power of injunction. If he had not had it during the last coal strike this country would have been in chaos.

Mr. BAILEY. And, you believe, sincerely, in the mandatory provisions of the injunction under the present Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. TURNER. When the welfare of the country is in danger——

Mr. BAILEY. Do you believe in the Constitution?

Mr. TURNER. Absolutely.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you believe in the right of a trial by jury?

Mr. TURNER. I do.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you believe that they get it under the mandatory provisions of the existing act?

Mr. TURNER. I think so.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think that any strike is so serious that the trial judge could not sit 48 or 72 hours and hear both parties to the dispute, and consider the matter on its merits? It is un-American and it cannot be justified.

Mr. TURNER. I think it is American. When somebody strikes and endangers the public welfare of this Nation, the health, and so forth, I think the President should have power to get out an injunction to stop a strike, and the President did do it.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think this Congress or any legislative body should pass legislation to contravene our constitutional guarantees to a trial by jury? I say again it is un-American, and it cannot be justified.

Mr. TURNER. There is a difference of opinion on that question by different people. I say the power of protecting the people of the United States is paramount in here, and the President should have the power to only use it when the things are jeapordized in this country.

Mr. BAILEY. Why, then, should you have the mandatory procedures in your injunction process?

Mr. TURNER. Because, as a rule, John L. Lewis does not listen——

Mr. BAILEY. And why should the mandatory procedure apply to labor and not apply to industry?

Mr. TURNER. I say to put everybody in the same boat.

Mr. BAILEY. The Labor Board must issue a mandatory injunction in the case of labor, but the mandatory power does not apply to the employer; why the discrimination?

Mr. TURNER. I do not think there is a discrimination, and I think if there are some things that should be corrected in the Taft-Hartley bill, I would say let us correct them, but I think they are only minor things that need correcting. I sincerely think so. I am 70 years old, and I have tried to be fair, and I think I have been a good citizen, and I would not do anything to hurt any group in society knowingly, but after looking at the way the Taft-Hartley bill has worked over the last 2 years I think it has been a big improvement. The Wagner Act was passed at a time when labor unions were weak and needed to be boosted, but all powers were in the labor hands at that time, and nothing in industry, and now I think they are whittled down.

Mr. BAILEY. I do not agree with you that the objections to the present law are minor. You cannot use the phrase "minor" as to anything that contravenes your constitutional rights. It is not minor; it is a major proposition.

Mr. TURNER. I do not believe it is a slave law, as has been claimed.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. I have no questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. IRVING. No questions.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs?

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Turner, you said last, I believe, that you do not consider the Taft-Hartley law a slave-labor law. Do you consider it to be what the proponents have called it, a bill of rights for labor?

Mr. TURNER. I will tell you, there would not have to be many changes in it to make it just that.

Mr. JACOBS. I wonder if you would mind enumerating for me the provisions of the Taft-Hartley law which you think afford any superior rights to labor.

Mr. TURNER. I do not think the Taft-Hartley Act gives them superior rights. I think it would take care of both industry and labor, and I hope the farmer.

Mr. JACOBS. I agree with you as far as industry is concerned, but particularly what is there in the Taft-Hartley law that you think helps labor?

Mr. TURNER. Helps labor?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. TURNER. I will say this, that I think the fact that the provisions are there by which strikes are settled, and they do not have these tremendous work stoppages, that takes money out of their pockets when the children need it, by the long period of strikes and, I think, it has a tendency to stop the strikes, and they do not have the hardship of going for months without a pay check.

Mr. JACOBS. That is very specific, but they had that same system under slavery; they did not have any strikes under slavery, did they?

Mr. TURNER. Even labor unions have stopped trying to enslave labor. All of them came out of the slave law that existed, because it was so ridiculous, and there is nothing that can show they are going to be enslaved.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not care what the labor union said or the proponents said, but the union said it was a slave-labor law, and the proponents said it was a bill of rights for labor. Specifically what provision in the Taft-Hartley law do you think creates any rights for labor, or protects any rights for labor?

Mr. TURNER. I am just a little deaf, sir. You will have to raise your voice a little.

Mr. JACOBS. I say, particularly what provision in the Taft-Hartley law do you think protects labor?

Mr. TURNER. I would say more expeditious settling of strikes.

Mr. JACOBS. No. What provision? Are you familiar with the Taft-Hartley law?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir, I have read it a good many times since it was passed.

Mr. JACOBS. Then I am asking you what specific provision—I am not asking you what effect—but what specific provision?

Mr. TURNER. That helps labor?

Mr. JACOBS. Yes.

Mr. TURNER. I would say—well, I am not a lawyer. I am just a country boy, and I cannot carry things in my head right along. But I do think that the expeditious way in which all strikes are handled, the labor disputes are handled, has proved a great benefit to everybody, including labor. And I would say that that is one of the big gains in labor.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, you are not able to name a specific provision which you think protects labor's lot?

Mr. TURNER. I think that secondary boycotts are bad. I would say an open shop instead of a union shop helps labor. Jurisdictional strikes are bad. They are very bad for the union. A jurisdictional strike is terrible for the union employees, as well as it is for the public. And you go on down the line of 15 or 20 points in the Taft-Hartley bill, and they have mutual benefits for everybody concerned. That is my honest opinion, and I think that can be substantiated.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you say secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes are provisions that you have in mind; is that correct?

Mr. TURNER. I think they are.

Mr. JACOBS. Now, are you not a member of the Fresh Vegetable and Fruit Growers Association?

Mr. TURNER. I am employed by them. I am a farmer, and I am employed by these organizations that I list in my statement. We are made up of farm organizations.

Mr. JACOBS. Have you not got a questionnaire that you have been circulating?

Mr. TURNER. I cut it out of the paper and sent it out for information to our men.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you have a copy with you?

Mr. TURNER. I do not believe I have. It was questions without answers. It was raised in here and I mailed it out because some of our people said, "We would like to know some of the provisions of this Taft-Hartley Act," and I thought that gave it very clearly.

Mr. JACOBS. I see. What paper did you cut it out of?

Mr. TURNER. The Baltimore Sun.

Mr. JACOBS. The Baltimore Sun?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir. I believe the Baltimore Sun. At least, I think I am right on that.

Mr. JACOBS. I expect you are. I believe the Baltimore Sun is the newspaper over in Baltimore that has referred to the Taft-Hartley law as a bill of rights for labor, or words to that effect; is that correct?

Mr. TURNER. I would say "Yes." Most of the best presses of the country have.

Mr. JACOBS. Yes. And the Baltimore Sun takes a great deal of advertising from industry, does it not?

Mr. TURNER. Well, now, I would not say it takes any more than the run of papers.

Mr. JACOBS. About like other papers; is that correct?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; about like other papers.

Mr. JACOBS. All right. Now, then, on this question of a bill of rights for labor, do you remember some difficulty the carpenters' local in Baltimore had a few years ago?

Mr. TURNER. You heard me say a few minutes ago——

Mr. JACOBS. Do you remember it? That is what I want to know.

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; I remember all the labor trouble we have had around in these various cities along the coast here.

Mr. JACOBS. I do not mean all of it. I mean that specific case. Do you remember the difficulty that the carpenters' union had?

Mr. TURNER. Yes. There is one thing I would like to say in connection with that. I have just——

Mr. JACOBS. No. I want you to answer my question.

Mr. TURNER. Labor has behaved itself very well in Baltimore. I want to give a tribute to them where they do, and I say they have, and they are satisfied, or seem to be, and have no troubles. As a matter of fact, I know some of them personally. They do not have any trouble, except that they are carrying on like their national organization by opposing this legislation. They are like all other union men, almost all other union men, in opposing the legislation.

Mr. JACOBS. You have said that once before. What I am trying to get at is, do you recall about 3 years ago when one of your judges on the supreme court of Baltimore issued an injunction and seized the carpenters' local, upon the placing of $700,000, and threw all of their local officers out of office. Do you recall that, or do you know anything about that?

Mr. TURNER. I have an indistinct recollection. I want to say that Judge Goldsborough was from Maryland, and maybe we have some more judges.

Mr. JACOBS. I am not talking about Judge Goldsborough.

Mr. TURNER. And we have some judges over there that may be as strong as he is, and whenever there is racketeering, they break it up.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you recall the case? That is what I am asking.

Mr. TURNER. I have a faint recollection of that case.

Mr. JACOBS. You do.

Mr. TURNER. How many years ago was it?

Mr. JACOBS. In 1946; almost 3 years ago.

Mr. TURNER. Yes, that strike was settled——

Mr. JACOBS. There is no strike in the case I am talking about. I am talking about an injunction that was issued by a judge of the supreme court of Baltimore.

Mr. TURNER. Maybe his injunction would not have been upheld by the Supreme Court of the United States, or was not. I do not know.

Mr. JACOBS. I am not talking about that. I am asking you a simple question. Do you remember the case?

Mr. TURNER. Indistinctly. I will say that.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you not recall that that was the case where the president of the international carpenters' union put up a $700,000 bond and the court seized the local and had all the officers thrown out of office? Do you not recall that?

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. TURNER. I will have to say that I do not remember enough about that to know just what happened in regard to that.

Mr. JACOBS. Then you are not too familiar even with the labor matters in Baltimore, are you?

Mr. TURNER. Well, yes; I do know we do not have very much trouble there, and they get just as big a wage as they do in any other city that I know of.

Mr. JACOBS. Are you aware of the fact that the Baltimore carpenters work for 34 cents an hour less than the carpenters in Washington?

Mr. TURNER. Well, that might be a more just price than they have over here. I do not know.

Mr. JACOBS. What I am trying to get at is this, Mr. Turner: If you do not recall anything about the case, I am not querying about it further. But you have come here as a witness to testify about labor relations, and I am calling your attention to a very notorious case that was litigated in your own city less than 3 years ago. Now, you do not remember anything about it at all; is that right?

Mr. TURNER. About throwing people out of office? I do not remember that; no, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. You do not remember anything about it?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Wier.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Turner, let me ask you a couple of questions here with regard to the problems that you can handle, as a business agent. I assume that you are a business agent; are you not?

Mr. TURNER. I am employed by the Fruit Producers Council, an eight-State organization in the Northeast here, and the organization of that was brought about by the former organizations, and they did it because of these racketeering practices in the fruit and vegetable matters. They have gone on since 1945, and they passed the Taft-Hartley bill, and with the Taft-Hartley bill we all thought everything was cleared up and we were about to go out of business, until the election came along and things were changed, and after the election we had a little upsurge of these acts by labor unions, and we have gone back into action, such as coming here today to testify here to try to get some of the salient features of the Taft-Hartley Act left in the bill.

Mr. WIER. Of course, the question I asked you is whether your capacity is representing these fruit growers and vegetable growers as a business agent.

Mr. TURNER. Yes; I suppose.

Mr. WIER. You made some reference here as to the difficulty in the operation of the delivery, and I assume that all of your complaints have been lodged with the courts.

Mr. TURNER. That is whom you refer it to all the time, the courts.

Mr. WIER. You make reference here particularly in your presentation that your complaints are based mostly upon extortion.

Mr. TURNER. That, and robbery; yes, sir.

Mr. WIER. Did you say robbery?

Mr. TURNER. Extortion and robbery are the words used in the Hobbs Act. Unfortunately, Judge Hobbs claims that the Congress has not carried out the intention of the law. There have been only two convictions that I know of under the Taft-Hartley bill, and that was because there was not somebody knocked in the head in regard to the complaint. Extortion and robbery can be economic. We know of cases where they refused to let a man unload, refused to let him join the union, and refused to let him do anything, and he could not unload the fruit up there at Wilkes-Barre, Pa., and it spoiled, and the man lost $700 on the load. Now, extortion and robbery, I think you will find, are mentioned in the Taft-Hartley Act, and still we put these 50 cases up, and the Department of Justice says you have to knock somebody in the head to convict him. That is why I am pleading with you to give us something to correct this wrong.

Mr. WIER. I am interested in that explanation, particularly in view of the fact that you make these two charges against a certain union, or unions, in your locality, and I am going to ask you if you are aware of the fact that both of those types of cases that you referred to have for years and years been covered under the civil law?

Mr. TURNER. Have been what?

Mr. WIER. Are not extortion and robbery violations of our civil laws?

Mr. TURNER. They may be. Now, most of our troubles are in New York and Philadelphia, and they convicted a man under the Hobbs Act because they did use physical violence. Three men have been convicted because of high-handed racketeering in the Philadelphia market. Up in Philadelphia, there was a hearing held by a subcommittee from this honorable body, the Eightieth Congress, and in New York they uncovered the worst set of racketeering, and I read some of the excerpts from that hearing there. The head of the union acknowledged it was a terrible state of affairs.

Mr. WIER. In those cases that you are trying to explain here, what in the Taft-Hartley law promotes machinery that the civil laws of your State do not cover?

Mr. TURNER. I think I can answer that. You have a union in a wholesale house or a commission house, and this farmer drives up, or, any trucker drives up, with a load of produce and asks him whether he has a union card, and if he has not, they may ask him to join the union, or not. But they will ask him to pay anywhere from $14 to $20 to unload the load. Now, if by any chance he could get busy and unload that onto that commission man's platform and pile it up, those people would not touch it, and that is a secondary boycott, I contend.

Mr. WIER. Would you agree——

Mr. TURNER. And that would come under the Taft-Hartley bill.

Mr. WIER. Will you agree, Mr. Turner, that even without the Taft-Hartley Act, you have a law in your State and in the Government to do the very job that you ask the Taft-Hartley Act to do?

Mr. TURNER. I think it is a well-known fact that there are local laws. Around a lot of the cities we have a right to considerable politics, and the labor unions are so powerful that it is pretty hard to get anybody to move.

Mr. WIER. There is not any politics in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. TURNER. What did you say?

Mr. WIER. There is not any politics in the Taft-Hartley Act?

Mr. TURNER. I would not be able to answer that. I think there has been right much politics in it during the campaign. I hope it has died down a little bit by now.

Mr. WIER. Again, I am going to ask, Do you not feel that you have all the protection that is necessary for the violations that you cite here this morning under civil law and under the Hobbs Act, to do the very things, with perhaps more severe penalties than the Taft-Hartley Act? What does this Taft-Hartley Act provide as penalties for the people who violate it?

Mr. TURNER. All I have to say is that before the Taft-Hartley Act was passed, the situations were a lot worse than they have been since we got it. And this letter that I wrote you from a union man to his own employers——

Mr. KELLEY. Pardon me. The gentleman has 1 minute remaining.

Mr. WIER. Now, let me ask you the last question. There would not be any suspicion in your mind on these complaints that you sent up here, that the commission houses were not a party to them, would there?

Mr. TURNER. You mean, the owners of the commission houses?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. TURNER. No, sir; they would not live in such abject terror of the heads of the unions if they were a party to them. But they are just terrorized. They do not like to talk to you. They look around furtively all the time. I have seen it so intense that they are afraid to talk to anybody.

Mr. WIER. Are these commission houses organized in an association?

Mr. TURNER. In New York, I am glad to say, since the Taft-Hartley bill, they are having the first collective bargaining they have ever had. This labor union plan up there brought this out. Mr. Papa, of local 202, called the trade in and said, "Sign on the dotted line," without letting them read it, and they took it home and read it that night and the next day. That was exposed by the committee that went up there and got their sworn testimony. Mr. Wint Smith was chairman of the committee, with a Mr. Fisher and a Mr. Schwab, and they make a trip up there, and what they uncovered in the way of racketeering in the city of New York, really would make you ashamed of your country that it allowed things like that to go on. And it was the same way in Philadelphia.

Now, with the Taft-Hartley bill, we have had a lessening of those things. And I feel, and I feel sincerely, that we will have new growth, new life, like pouring water on a flowering plant and seeing it grow.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. SMITH. Wait a minute, Mr. Turner.

Mr. KELLEY. You are not through yet, Mr. Turner.

Mr. SMITH. You represent primarily the farm interests in the northeastern part of the United States; is that right?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. And you represent farmers?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. And you are here testifying on behalf of those people engaged in agriculture?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. And it is your considered opinion in your organization that under the Taft-Hartley Act, business conditions with the marketing of fruits and vegetables and milk are better than they were prior to it; is that right?

Mr. TURNER. I say so without fear of contradiction.

Mr. SMITH. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Turner, you say you are 70 years old, or 80?

Mr. TURNER. Eighty. Maybe I look like I am 100. I do not know.

Mr. WERDEL. Have you lived all your life in Baltimore?

Mr. TURNER. Yes. I have a farm up there in Maryland that has been in my family since the days of the Revolution, when the country was first settled. It is a hill farm up in the northern part of Maryland. We have been there all that time.

Mr. WERDEL. So your father and all your family have lived in Baltimore; is that correct?

Mr. TURNER. Not in Baltimore. Out on the farm.

Mr. WERDEL. In Maryland?

Mr. TURNER. In Maryland; yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. So you feel you are rather well qualified, then, to know what is American and what is un-American, do you not?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir; I think I do. I try to keep abreast of the times, and I would say that I am a little fearful of where our country is heading. Whether, of course, it is American. I do not know. I hope so. We all do.

Mr. WERDEL. Now, Mr. Turner, you have acquitted yourself very well this morning on the other side of this committee. For your information, you have been questioned by one man who has been a labor attorney, by two men who were labor officials when they were elected, and another man, Mr. Bailey, I believe, has held some union capacity.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman will proceed in order. They are Members of Congress, regardless of what previous connections they might have had.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, may I correct the record?

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WERDEL. No: I do not yield.

Mr. Turner, the chairman, in his questions to you, implied that because there was no trouble under the Taft-Hartley law, we should conclude from that that the people who represent organized labor were injured by the law. Would you agree with that?

Mr. TURNER. No, sir; I do not think they were. I think the rank and file of labor has been helped. I do not think it has helped the heads of a lot of unions who constantly sue for more favors, more favors, every time they get one thing settled. I do not think they would be justifying their salary if they did not go after something else, regardless of the consequences to the economy of this country.

Mr. WERDEL. In other words, as I understand you, the law was passed to create, if it was in the power of Congress to do it, peace among employers and employees?

Mr. TURNER. Absolutely.

Mr. WERDEL. And it was thought at the time of its passage that it not only granted a means of controlling employers, but also labor leaders, and it considered the rights of employers, individual workers in labor unions, and the public; is that not right?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. So far as it has failed in that desired purpose, you are willing to see us consider amendments of it?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Now, I believe you and I will agree that murderers do not like laws prohibiting murder; is that right?

Mr. TURNER. That is right.

Mr. WERDEL. And so far as it might stop a man from committing a murder who wants to commit one, he might object to it; is that correct?

Mr. TURNER. Yes.

Mr. WERDEL. We can say that of robbery, can we not, and arson? We can say the same thing of arson, can we not?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. People who want to cause disturbances, break the peace, do a public injustice, do not like the law, do they?

Now, under the Taft-Hartley Act, a closed shop is prohibited. Do you think that that has any benefits to the individual workingman?

Mr. TURNER. In a way I would favor the union shop over the closed shop.

Mr. WERDEL. Why?

Mr. TURNER. That is the one that allows the employer to hire a man and take him in, and he has to join the union in 30 days? Is that not the provision in that law of the union shop?

Mr. KELLEY. Thirty days; yes.

Mr. TURNER. And I do think that gives the employer a chance to have a little turn-over in employees. I would say this, though. I would not consider myself competent to pass on a closed shop or an open shop or those things. I do not think I should. I mean, not being familiar with it, I think it is something for you Congressmen to get from industry and labor, the merits of the closed shop, the union shop, and the like.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Turner, do you agree wih me in my belief that if an employer has a bargaining agent, a union, in his plant, the average employer is desirous of seeing that agent represent all of his people rather than a part of them?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. You do agree with that?

Mr. TURNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. In other words, if the employees have held an election and they want a union, then it is the usual employer's desire that he can deal through that union with all those people. Now, do you believe that the rule of the closed shop in industry as we know it today would have a deterring effect upon veterans getting jobs?

Mr. TURNER. I think the answer to that is obvious. It would.

Mr. WERDEL. We have some 15,000,000 veterans who may not be members of unions; is that the answer?

Mr. TURNER. Nobody can go in and get a job unless he is a union man.

Mr. WERDEL. There is some discussion before the Congress——

Mr. KELLEY (interposing). Pardon me. Will the gentleman yield there?

Mr. WERDEL. Yes, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Did I understand you to say that there were 15,000,000 veterans that did not belong to unions?

Mr. WERDEL. That may not belong to unions.

Mr. KELLEY. A great many of them do.

Mr. WERDEL. I will not get into an argument with the chairman. But there was some discussion before the Congress at the present time that we may decide to consider permitting the closed shop, but demand that the unions be open; in other words, anybody who wants to join a union can get in. Now, do you see much difference between that approach to the subject of a union shop and that presently in existence under the Taft-Hartley Act? In other words, if the union was open, then anybody could go into it who wanted to join it.

Mr. TURNER. I think that is getting a little over my head. I have not worked in a shop, and I would not feel that I was competent to pass expertly on that. I think industry and the labor people and you gentlemen having these hearings will come to the right conclusion. I hope you will. But I do not feel that I am competent to pass on the merits and demerits of the different degrees of closed shop, open shop, and so forth.

Mr. WERDEL. I believe that is all. Thank you very much.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. Jacobs' time has expired.

Mr. JACOBS. I am not asking——

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. JACOBS. I am rising to a point of personal privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. You may state it.

Mr. JACOBS. The reference of the gentleman who just concluded his examination to the witness having been examined by a labor lawyer obviously was a reference to me, for I am the only lawyer on this end that examined the witness. I am stating this for the record.

For the gentleman's information, I enjoyed a general practice of law and did represent labor unions before I became a candidate for Congress. For the gentleman's further information, upon my election to Congress, I not only closed my law business and stated that my only client would be the Eleventh Indiana District, but I likewise disposed of certain stocks that I held because it might create a conflict of interest with my vote in Congress and the interests that I had invested in.

I hope the gentleman has so divested himself of all interest that might affect his vote.

I might go further and say this: that there are two gentlemen who sit to the left of the chairman, both of whom have attempted to make personal attacks upon my integrity in these committee hearings, and I do not know why, unless it is for the purpose of creating a cleavage so that nothing can be accomplished. Now, still on the point of personal privilege, I would like to ask you, Mr. Turner——

Mr. KELLEY. You cannot question the witness again. You are stating your personal privilege.

Mr. JACOBS. I want to ask the witness, Mr. Chairman, whether or not he thought my examination of him was in anywise unfair. And I ask it on the point of personal privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. You may ask that question.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you think that any question or the method——

Mr. TURNER. I have learned to take any question that any Congressman or Senator can shoot at me, and I think you are entirely within your rights if you want to get to the bottom of the thing. I would say that I have no kick coming on anything you asked me.

Mr. JACOBS. You did no think I was unfair at all?

Mr. TURNER. I do not.

Mr. KELLEY. Thank you very much.

The Chair would like to state this, and wishes that the members would try to remember it, that while I am in the chair and chairman of the subcommittee, there will be no reference to a member's background. He is a Member of Congress; he is fully entitled to sit here; he is fully entitled to question witnesses in the proper manner. And I will remind the gentleman that I did call the attention of the gentleman over to my left, Mr. Werdel, that he should proceed in order. And I expect that rule to be carried out, and I will see that it is while I am here.

Mr. WERDEL. On a point of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Go ahead.

Mr. WERDEL. I regret that my directing the witness to the caliber of the men who were questioning him was in any way embarrassing to either the Chair or the members.

Mr. KELLEY. It was not embarrassing to me, I may say.

Mr. WERDEL. If it was embarrassing, of course, I did not intend it to be such. I should like to say further on the point of personal privilege that the gentlemen who are here now would make me feel much better inside if they would also explain their actions in the dark of the night on two occasions when they secretly met on other matters excluding three members of their own party, to undo the actions of the committee that were done in daylight.

Mr. KELLEY. Is that in reference to this proceeding?

Mr. WERDEL. No. That is in reference to the pats on the back that the gentlemen are taking at the present time. I would be very pleased to hear their remarks along that line, and I would be able to proceed a little better today if I had that explanation.

Mr. KELLEY. Let me say this to the gentleman. I do not know to what you are making reference. But there have been no secret meetings of members of this side and anybody excluded in regard to H. R. 2032. Everything is open and aboveboard. Of course, there have been caucuses on your side, which you have a perfect right to have, but there is nothing wrong about that.

Hereafter, the committee will proceed in order.

Mr. JACOBS. Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. A 15-second statement on a point of personal privilege.

If I was to meet with members of my party and select men to meet with in caucus who I think are not going to report to Fulton Lewis, Jr., that is my privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. I will remind the gentleman that the Chair wishes to proceed in order hereafter.

Now, the Chair wishes to say in reference to the statement made by Mr. Werdel, I think it was, when he invited me to make my own statement, which I am going to make, that I understood him to say that 15,000,000 veterans may not belong to unions, or to organized labor. Is that right?

Mr. WERDEL. No. I said there are 15,000,000 veterans, many of whom may not belong to unions.

Mr. KELLEY. That is true. But there are many millions that do. So let us keep that straight.

Mr. IRVING. May I say something, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. KELLEY. That is all, Mr. Turner. Thank you very much.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman?

Mr. KELLEY. Your time has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to state a point of personal privilege.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, let us just withhold that, if you will. We will get that later.

Mr. PERKINS. With reference to the statement——

Mr. KELLEY. Wait a minute. I did not recognize you, Mr. Perkins.

We will proceed with the next witness, Mr. J. T. Sanders, legislative counsel of the National Grange.

Very well, Mr. Sanders. You may proceed when you are ready.

TESTIMONY OF J. T. SANDERS, LEGISLATIVE COUNSEL, THE NATIONAL GRANGE

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, I have a statement, but I shall deviate from it at places.

By way of qualification of myself as a witness, I would like to say that I am legislative counsel of the National Grange. The National Grange is an organization of about 850,000 farmers, and their families, as members. I am not an expert on technical matters in labor and do not appear before your committee as such a witness. My training is that of an economist, with about 12 or 14 years of teaching at an agricultural college in agricultural economics, and some 10 or 12 years of research work with the Department of Agriculture and some of the State institutions.

The Grange is an organization of farmers somewhat similar to a labor union. But the Grange has at all times had a policy in favor of an abundant economy. We, therefore, have at all times since our organization in 1867, opposed strenuously monopolistic practices and restrictive practices of any kind, by industry, labor, or by agriculture.

It has been said that the recent election was a mandate for the outright repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act. We do not believe as a farm organization that the election can be so interpreted. When we state this, gentlemen, we do not have one iota of political implication in that statement. We believe that the farm groups of this land had about as much influence and responsibility for the surprising results of the recent election as any other cohesive group, and we know truthfully that the farm vote did not mean a mandate to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act.

The fact of the business is, we believe it was the direct opposite of that. And in stating that, I wish to emphasize again that we are very anxious not to have our statements interpreted in terms of politics, because the Grange has never taken an active part in promoting any party or any set of candidates, because that is not our purpose.

We believe that the Taft-Hartley Act has many valuable features in it. We believe that the primary purpose of the Taft-Hartley Act was to bring about more constructive, peaceable settlements between labor and capital, and to balance the bargaining powers of both labor and capital, to compel them to negotiate their disputes on a high standard, an ethical standard, with equal responsibility to both management and labor.

Now, we do not claim that the Taft-Hartley Act is a perfect act. We are quite sure that there must be faults in it because it has created a lot of controversy, and a little later on we will do our best to point out some of the faults.

First, we would like to explain why the Grange is opposed to monopolistic, restrictive practices and why we believe that the Taft-Hartley Act promotes the antimonopolistic policies which we have always stood for. Farmers, especially on family farms, operate with a high percentage of family labor, so-called, which is unpaid labor and which goes to waste if they do not use it. They have a lot of other fixed costs. By nature, this family labor is a fixed cost of the farmer. It wastes if he does not use it; therefore, he is going to operate his farm at full capacity. And the average family farm operates at about 75 percent fixed costs. Mechanization does not weaken that position of the family farm; it strengthens it. Therefore, we are sure that the policies of the Grange will prevail in the future in agriculture, namely, the advocacy of an economy of abundance, because we know that this policy is right, first, and, second, that it cannot be avoided by the very nature of the farm business.

We know that industry does not operate with such high fixed costs, that it operates as a rule with about 25 percent fixed costs, and therefore when depressions hit, it is to the advantage of the manager of a business, a nonagricultural business, to stop or reduce his output, throw labor out on the streets, and reduce his costs and save himself from greater loss by that method.

Now, those two clashing interests between agriculture and industry are the basis of all of our philosphy on labor. We cannot see why labor should not primarily fight for full employment and full output, because we know if it did do that, it would harmonize with the nature of agriculture, and that agriculturists would at all times be in favor of such labor policies.

It is our belief that the principal fear of labor unions should be the fear of unemployment. During every depression in the history of this country, since 1800, except two minor recessions, the purchasing power of wages has risen. The man that was employed during depressions, the industrial wage worker that was employed, was receiving more purchasing power income in the depression than he had before the depression came. Therefore, it seems to us that labor itself should insist on stability of employment and the power and right to settle its dispute and remain employed as much as possible.

Now, with that statement giving the background of the Grange, I would like to have the opening part of my prepared statement put in the record, and to read the latter part of the statement, beginning on page 8.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Sanders, you just want to summarize your statement, I take it?

Mr. SANDERS. That is correct.

(The first part of Mr. Sanders' statement is as follows:)

The National Grange is an organization for farmers somewhat similar to a labor union for workers. However, unlike many labor unions, we have always advocated an economy of abundance and have consistently opposed restrictive and scarcity policies in industry, in labor union policies as well as in agricultural policies. In taking this view, we believe firmly we are strong in our friendship for, and long time interest in, organized labor. Unless modern agriculture can operate under a condition of stable full employment and output in industry, no sound solution of the farm problem can be worked out. We, therefore, have a profound direct and continuous interest in your efforts to enact sound labor-management laws.

It has been claimed that the recent election constitutes a mandate to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act. In all humility, may we say that it is our conviction that farmers played fully as decisive a role in the determination of the surprising results of the recent election as did any other cohesive group; and we are certain that no mandate to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act could be read into the farmer vote. Quite the contrary is true.

Our statements in this connection cannot be taken as political in the least. We would like to state also that we care nothing whatever about the name of the act; that we are only interested in preserving in the law its many provisions that are vital to fuller employment and output and to a stabilized industrial peace and prosperity.

We believe that the basic purposes of the Taft-Hartley Act were to bring equality of bargaining powers and responsibility to both labor and management. We are not well informed on labor-management relations and do not pose as competent to judge the weaknesses and lack of clarity of the law. However, we do insist that its fundamental provisions of setting out unfair labor practices for labor and management alike, of democratically determining concert of action, of curbing restrictive policies and promoting peaceful settlement, are all principles that must be retained in our national labor laws. These, we believe, if refined and clarified, will function in the interest of labor and management and in the interest and welfare of agriculture and the nation.

The problem of equitable industry-labor relations as well as the problem of encouragement of strong democratic labor organizations is of great interest to us. We are heartily in favor of them. Likewise, we are strongly in favor of equitable fair rules to guide industry in its efforts to work out peaceable and sound relations with organized labor. But it is our conviction that both labor and management, in dealing with their mutual disputes, need to remember and emphasize more than they do, that each must recognize a paramount responsibility to the general public, since their right to freely bargain is granted and guaranteed to them by a democratic society, a right that must not be abused if that society is to continue.

Labor laws, the National Grange believes, should set up rules that would guarantee to both labor and management fair, equal, and no coercive rights, free from monopolistic advantage, but always limited by the paramount interest and welfare of the public. These are the basic principles and policies that have determined the labor management views of the National Grange presented in this statement.

The National Grange, at its November session, took the following action relative to the subject now before your committee:

"We believe the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act has had a corrective effect on labor and management disputes. We favor such modifications in the act as may be necessary to correct abuses or weaknesses that are shown to exist."

The National Grange, at its last annual session, detailed our labor management policies in ten further specific statements, other than our stand on the Taft-Hartley Act, as follows:

(1) We believe free enterprise and democracy depend upon an economy of reasonably full production, and freedom from monopolistic practices for labor, industry, and agriculture alike; and that there is a sound social, moral and economic basis for these views.

(2) That management of industry should place a policy of high output and reasonably full employment above high prices and profits; and should be prohibited from using coercion and intimidation in its relationship with labor.

(3) That labor unions have a useful place in the nation in order that the combined economic strength of industrial and professional workers may offset the power of organized or big industry and finance.

(4) That organized labor has most to gain by adopting as its primary objective the maintenance of reasonably full employment and an economy of full production, a principal which applies equally to all economic groups and can be made a basis for cooperation between all groups.

(5) That we uphold the right of labor to strike and to organize on an industry-wide basis, especially in industries dominated by a few large units.

(6) That when a strike, or threatened strike, becomes a serious menace to public health, safety and the general welfare, the use of the injunction and compulsory arbitration is justified.

(7) That the Grange does not condone such restrictive practices as the secondary boycott, sympathetic and jurisdictional strikes, slow-downs, any unjustified reduction of the workweek, and feather-bedding by labor.

(8) That mass picketing which results in intimidation is unfair, but that all workers of a struck plant should be protected in their right to picket peaceably.

(9) That a majority of the workers in a plant must vote favorably by secret ballot before giving union-shop privileges to any labor organization; and that we oppose the closed shop.

(10) That we recommend to organized labor, the adoption of a parity wage automatically adjusted semi-annually to the cost of living. By this we do not mean to preclude labor from bargaining collectively through representatives of its own choosing to improve its working and living standards or obtain an increased share of the national income.

These labor-management policy pronouncements of our organization, the oldest general farm organization of this country, are given at the outset because we wish to assert and show in unmistakable terms, that we are not only not opposed to, but are very much in favor of, democratically organized labor; and that we are earnestly desirous that organized and unorganized labor obtain maximum equitable advantages for themselves, so long as these are gained by democratic processes and are not a detriment to the general welfare.

We list these pronouncements of the Grange at the outset also, lest our support of the Taft-Hartley Act be misunderstood as unjustified and hasty opposition to labor, or lack of cooperation with it, in view of the bitter opposition of labor leaders to this law. It has always been our purpose to support democratic and sound union labor and to aid in lifting its lot and the lot of unorganized labor. This is, we think, both enlightened self-interest on our part, as well as interest for the general welfare.

At the foundation of our labor policy are the three Grange guide posts that guide us in nearly all of our economic, social, and political policies. These guide posts will bear repeating over and over again in all our deliberations including those on labor-management problems, for they are also applicable as guides to your task. These three guide posts are as follows:

(1) All prosperity springs from the production of wealth; or anything which retards the production of wealth is unsound.

(2) The compensation of each should be based on what he contributes to the general welfare.

(3) The primary purpose of government is to protect its citizens from agression, both physical and economic.

We believe these guide posts are just as fundamental, sound, and as equitable, for guidance in labor and management policies as they are for agriculture. We know that free labor, independent management, and a prosperous free agriculture working together in such a manner that no one of them can obtain unfair or undue advantage over the other or the public, are basic requirements for the perpetuation of our free enterprise system.

The strength of this system arises out of the fact that each individual is left free, within the limits set by a free society, to exercise his own choice as to employment, religion and philosophy of life. Left thus to his own choosing we believe he becomes a thinking, energized, inventive individual, which results in the greatest possible effectiveness in economic life. Our national policy in regard to labor and management must, therefore, be based on the preservation and the strengthening of our free enterprise system.

Our views on labor-management problems also should be interpreted in the light of a definite understanding of the true economic nature of the average farm unit. This average farm unit is a business concern of relatively small size when compared with the size of other business units. The labor required by this farm unit consists largely of a farmer and his family who furnish about three-fourths of all labor needed, the operator being both manager and laborer in the concern. By nature, this labor is a fixed cost which cannot be reduced by the operator when his output is reduced. He either uses this labor supply or it goes to waste and he loses its value. Furthermore, the more mechanized agriculture is, all over the country, the larger is the percentage of farm labor supplied by the farmer and his family, which is the best index of the family farm; and, therefore, the strength and stability of the family-unit type of farm is not only not weakened but is made stronger and more enduring with the increased mechanization. A relatively large proportion of other costs than labor on the farm are also fixed costs so that at least two-thirds to three-fourths of all the costs of operating the average American farm are fixed costs that cannot be reduced when the volume of output on the farm is reduced. This being the case, it does not pay the farmer to turn himself out of a job in order to reduce his volume of production when prices are falling, since he loses more by reducing than by maintaining his output. Consequently the farm unit is characterized by full production, full output, and full employment at all times, during depressions and during prosperity alike. This obviously also holds true for agriculture as a whole.

But this is not true of nonagricultural industry in general. Industry operates with a large percentage of variable costs, about 75 percent of these being costs that can be reduced easily when the volume of output of the industry is reduced. Two-thirds of these variable costs are hired-labor costs. Therefore, the average industrial concern, when a depression hits, loses less money by reducing its volume of output and turning labor onto relief rolls or out on the streets, than it would if it undertook to maintain full volume of output and full employment. In contrast, the farmer loses less if he maintains full employment on his farm and full volume of output, and is thereby inevitably an abundant producer. He operates a concern that seldom, if ever, reverses its production gears. They are nearly always set forward and in high gear regardless of depression or prosperity. The Grange believes that all labor laws should seek to correct as much as possible this basic defect in our present labor-management economy, the defect of an unbalance of industrial output with the full output of farms. Certainly it is bad statesmanship and unsound economics to pass labor laws that encourage restriction of output and thus accentuates the defect.

To understand the farmers' attitude on labor-management disputes, it is necessary to appreciate this fundamental difference between the nature of the farm unit and the industrial unit as producing concerns. The farm unit being inherently and almost inevitably a full-production unit regardless of depressed prices or good prices, its operators approach labor-management disputes thinking in terms of the same pattern of abundant production under all conditions, and are impatient with labor and management for advocating policies and programs that go counter to a full output. Farmers have a wholesome and hearty dislike for such policies or practices.

Since abundant production in agriculture is almost inevitable, the farmer cannot see why it should not be the first and foremost requirement of both labor and management in their dealing with each other. A lack of appreciation on the part of the farmer of the nature of industrial production, as indicated above, and conversely, the lack of appreciation on the part of labor and management of the true nature of agricultural production is at the root of most of the misunderstanding betwen agriculture, on the one hand, and industry and labor on the other.

This attitude is basic to our support of the provisions embodied in both the unrepealed portions of the Wagner Act and most of the provisions in the Taft-Hartley Act. We believe the unrepealed parts of the Wagner Act and many of the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, in conjunction, operate as vital curbs to restrictive and unfair practices and thus encourage the maintenance of peaceful productive relations and fair settlements of differences between management and labor. We believe that these provisions, if clarified and strengthened, will, in the future, be powerful forces for peaceful stabilization, at high levels of industrial employment and output; and we urge your committee to proceed with grat caution in repealing these vital provisions.

These provisions also are of great importance to farmers in helping to maintain stability of income in farming. They will tend to stabilize full output in industry and to match the full stable physical output that inevitably flows from our farms during both good and bad times. We believe that this balanced stable production is not only a prerequisite to stability of farm income but of the stability and permanence of our democracy also. Sound labor-management laws are as necessary a part of the whole structure as sound agricultural laws.

Our detailed suggestions of needed retention or changes in labor laws are based largely on the labor-management philosophy of the Grange previously presented. In offering the following suggestions we believe that we have not given too much weight to this viewpoint of the great need of placing greater importance on stability of employment. It is our judgment that no labor-management laws are sound if they fail to promote maximum stability of employment, honest full measure of service on the part of the laborer, the payment of wages only for labor performed, fair wage rates, and decent safe conditions of labor. These can be promoted only in an atmosphere of good will, under democratic control, and with an absence of coercion and chicanery by both parties to the conflict. Finally, no laws are sound that do not place the necessities of the general welfare above the wishes of either labor or management.

In substantiation of our contention that greater emphasis must be placed on public welfare and full steady output, we would like to point out that we believe that this is the surest and sanest route for labor to attain a status of equitable and higher wages. High wages arise, we believe, out of relative scarcity of labor for jobs, and not when there is a surplus of labor seeking employment nor by curtailing output in our effort to make work. This is indicated by the fact that history reveals that membership of labor unions has been decimated by depression and greately increased when jobs were relatively sure. On the other hand during every recession or depression since 1800, except two minor ones, the purchasing power of the average wage paid to laborers has increased. In the days of depression labor's main fight should be for a job at a parity wage, not for a retention of wage rate and consequent loss of jobs. Only the laborer out of work suffers from depression; but unions are frequently well-nigh destroyed by them.

We believe that most of the provisions of the Wagner and the Taft-Hartley Acts tend to stabilize employment and constructive bargaining between disputants and thus promotes stability of labor and output. We repeat that only in the atmosphere of security of a job can equitable wage rates best be promoted. With this basic Grange policy as the central background, we would like to point out the main provision of the Taft-Hartley Act which we urge your committee to retain in the law of the land.

Mr. SANDERS. This is our view of specific provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, and I would prefer to read this part. There are about five pages that I would like to read.

Mr. KELLEY. Are they contained in your manuscript?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. That is all right.

Mr. SANDERS. The National Grange believes there must be a reasonable guaranty of full production wherever such is possible without removing or restricting the rights of labor to insure for itself the protective rights granted by section 7 of the Taft-Hartley Act. The right of the individual not to engage in a strike should be conditioned or limited by legitimate union requirements. Coercion by an employer of an individual to limit this right is, we believe, contrary to the individual's rights and also to the right of the public to the benefits flowing from maximum production. We believe that the five provisions of section 8 on unfair practices of employers, namely, (1) coercion or restraint by employers on labor in the exercise of its rights, (2) preventing interference of employer with the administration of labor unions, (3) forbidding union discrimination by employers in employing laborers, (4) preventing discrimination or discharge of a laborer for testimony given or charges filed relative to the law, and finally (5) for refusal of employer to bargain collectively in good faith with a recognized union are all sound and should be retained in labor laws, for they tend to stabilize good relations between management and labor.

The union shop provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act are vastly preferable to the closed shop. The right to a union shop is a special grant of aid to unions against unfair competition. The key advantages of the union shop to labor is limitation of numbers and pressure on workers to join and give their financial support to unions. If these advantages are given unions, the individual worker must be protected in his right to obtain work in a union shop; and the public must be protected at least to that extent against restriction of membership and output. The Grange cannot support the privilege for labor of either the closed or the union ship if the Taft-Hartley provisions on the union shops are to be dropped.

We are strongly in favor of retention of the provisions, permitting an employer to select his workers regardless of union membership or nonunion status if they join the representative union within a reasonable time after employment and if they qualify to reasonable tests of union loyalty and obedience to democratically determined rules. We believe that no laborer should be expelled from the union and denied opportunity to work in a union shop except for failure to pay dues and abide by equitable democratically determined rules of the union.

We are in favor of banning, by law, the highly monopolistic, exclusive, closed shop, since we believe it is neither to the interest of labor in general nor of the general public. The closed shop is contrary to our belief in an abundant economy, to democratic unions, and to our opposition to all monopolistic agencies. We are especially opposed to the charging of excessive initiation fees or dues to restrict union membership and thus to restrict output. We know of instances where these practices are so used that they are nothing less than exploitation largely for the benefit of unscrupulous labor leaders. We would support stronger provisions on this matter than are included in the Taft-Hartley Act.

We believe that it should be declared unfair labor practice for either employers or employees to use coercion or threats in any of their collective bargaining or in dealings with individual laborers; that both labor and management should be allowed freedom of expression so long as their views, arguments and opinions do not carry promises of bribes or threats of reprisals; that it should also be an unfair labor practice for either labor or management to fail to bargain with the other in good faith; and that this bargaining should be on a basis of mutual recognition of equality of rights. We favor and urge the retention of these provisions in our labor-management laws.

We favor a legal ban on all secondary boycotts, strikes to force an employer to recognize a union not certified as a bargaining agent, strikes over interunion or jurisdictional disputes, and all make-work provisions in contract or featherbedding practices. These are wholly and at all times contrary to our philosophy of abundant production, and are, we think, indefensible by labor on any ground except on those of selfish gains to the damage of public welfare and to democracy. We urge the retention of these provisions in our labor laws.

In connection with jurisdictional strikes it appears sound to provide for settlement by mediation or arbitration. We believe the secondary boycott ban should extend to all goods, union made and nonunion made, since not to apply it to all goods, extends the force of its operation into other plants and fields outside those of the union directly involved.

If the non-Communist affidavit is to be required of union leaders, we believe that it is only fair and right that it be required in like manner of management. We can see no valid reason why unions should not be required by law to give a reasonably full accounting to their members and to the Government of their collections and expenditures. Expenditures for political purposes from regular income of unions should be prohibited by law, since such policies are certain to compel some members to support condidates to whom they are opposed. Welfare funds should be adequately guarded from misuse; and should be jointly administered by management and labor if they are jointly contributed or are determined on the basis of the product turned out as in the case of coal mining. We see no valid objection to collection of dues by wage deduction with the annual consent of the individual laborer.

We are in favor of the general principles of the determination of the representative union as provided in the Taft-Hartley Act. Some plan to prevent employers abusing unions by calling for such elections where rival unions are contending for representative status should be worked out.

Although we uphold labor's right to strike as a means of gaining equity; we believe that ultimate resort to a strike should be only by an affirmative majority vote and by secret ballot. Although strikes should be resorted to only after all free bargaining means have failed, we do not believe strikes should legally be the last resort for settlement of disputes.

We are in favor of labor laws that provide an independent public conciliation and mediation body similar to that provided in the Taft-Hartley Act. This agency should be so constituted that the general public, labor, and employers, can have unquestioned faith in its judicial integrity and in its freedom from bias for or leaning to either labor or management.

There is just as little logic and soundness for claiming that this agency should be attached to and under the dominance of the Department of Commerce as to claim that it should be under the supervision of the Department of Labor. We believe it would be a grave error to place the counciliation and mediation agency under either body. We suggest that there might also be added to this agency a national labor-management arbitration court or tribunal available with an adequate staff at any time for call and voluntary use by disputants. No resonable machinery should be wanting to stay off a strike or to end one that already exists as a means to obtaining a fair bargain in labor disputes.

We favor positive means of preventing strikes in industries where public health, safety, and welfare are in danger. The provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act for an 80-day cooling-off period and the use of the injunction if necessary to implement it, is, we believe, justified and should not be repealed. We cannot subscribe to the logic that acknowledges a possibility that need for emergency and extraordinary powers are likely to arise without concluding that such powers should clarly be incorporated in the law of the land. Public health, safety, and welfare, we believe, should be protected beyond a shadow of a doubt.

Both labor and management should be held equally responsible for fulfillment of their contract and subject to liability of damage for violation. This is the only way wage contracts can be made equally binding; and is necessary to develop sound satisfactory contracts that encourage maximum continuity of employment. We are heartily in favor of the provision in the Taft-Hartley Act requiring 60 days' notice, from both labor and management, of desire to change or terminate a labor-management contract.

We believe that it is not a wise and sound policy to unionize foreman and supervisory personnel with the worker force. Foremen carry out orders of management, and in many instances lay out plans for management, and therefore must represent management. To divide their responsibility between management and employees or to aline them definitely on the side of employees deprives management of the right to manage.

As we said in the beginning, we do not pose as experts on the fine points of the law. But we feel that we would be remiss if we did not point out some of the seeming defects on the act as it stands and as it appears to us.

It is our conviction that there are several portions of the law that make it possible for unscrupulous managers to unnecessarily harass labor unions and to undermine their membership. We doubt that it is right to permit, for example, labor employed for replacement for legally struck labor to be retained in employment and to be allowed to vote in subsequent elections for bargaining representatives. This can and probably will be used by unscrupulous management for purposes of union breaking. We see no serious objections if labor is serious in its protests, to dropping the requirement of the Communist affidavit, although it appears to us that this has done much good to strengthen union leaders' hands in clearing communistic influence out of unions. If it is retained it should similarly be required of management.

Possibly the provision in section 2 (13) which makes unions responsible for acts of agents even though the act subject to complaint was not specifically authorized, and other provisions, give opportunities for unjustified suits by management. Such suits can do no good, are destructive of strong unions, and militate against sound peaceful solution of labor disputes. The law, we believe, should be carefully scanned by experts for the purposes of eliminating any such undesirable provisions. It appears to us that the separation of the functions of the general counsel from the work of the National Labor Relations Board is a separation and a concentration of power that is not conducive to efficiency and harmony in the administration of the provisions of the act. However, as previously stated, we believe the conciliation and arbitration work should continue separate. If the injunction is to be used on labor in secondary boycotts, we believe it should be applicable to management likewise. The law it seems to us should be changed to permit free political expression in the labor press; but we do not believe that general funds of labor unions should be contributed to any political party or candidates.

Mr. KELLEY. Is that all, Mr. Sanders?

Mr. SANDERS. That is all, sir.

Mr. KELLEY. Very well. Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. I believe, Mr. Sanders, you will agree with me that the primary function of the National Grange is to look after the affairs and the interests of the farm groups?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, that was the primary purpose for its organization.

Mr. BAILEY. Is it still the primary purpose?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I believe you will agree with me that there were no restrictions against your farm group, or your groups, in the Wagner Labor Relations Act.

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. There are no restrictions against your farm groups in the so-called Taft-Hartley Act. I would like to remind the gentleman that within the last 3 or 4 days, this same committee that he is facing now has written out of the minimum wage and fair labor standards act all of the farm interests of this country. Now, I think the gentleman will agree with me that the only instances that he can cite on which the Grange has come in direct conflict with labor are some instances of secondary boycotts and jurisdictional strikes. If the gentleman has read H. R. 2032, section 106, he will find in this proposed legislation sections tending to take care of boycotts and jurisdictional strikes.

In view of that, I would like to ask the gentleman if he does not think it is somewhat presumptuous on his part to come in and advise the committees of Congress that they should pass legislation regulating everybody else in our society except the farm groups?

Mr. SANDERS. In the first place, Mr. Bailey, if the specific instances that you enumerated were the only direct influence that labor has on agricultural prosperity, probably we would not be here. But agriculture is profoundly influenced by labor disputes.

Mr. BAILEY. I agree with you that you have a community——

Mr. SANDERS. We have just as much interest, almost, as labor does itself in seeing that constructive peaceable settlements of all labor disputes are brought about.

Mr. BAILEY. I agree that you have a community of interests but you do not work at it, you and the labor groups, as well as you should.

Mr. SANDERS. Possibly that is true. But I am not so sure that that is our fault as much as it is the labor union leaders'.

Mr. BAILEY. I think the gentleman will agree with me that if he expects good prices for his farm crops, there must be adequate wages paid to workers. Otherwise, they are not able to buy your products; is that right?

Mr. SANDERS. I would revise that by saying, yes, that if we expect good prices for our farm products, Mr. Bailey, we must have labor on the job turning out a fair, full output of nonagricultural goods to exchange for our goods. We feel, however, that labor should be paid a fair, reasonable wage for that work. I do not want to be misunderstood in my statement. We will thoroughly agree with you that when labor is turning out a full, reasonable and abundant output, such as farmers do at all times, we will have good prices for our products, and we can help to get labor good wages for its work.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Sanders, you referred there to the question that you doubted that the results of the November election were a mandate to the Eighty-first Congress to enact certain legislation, and particularly labor-relations legislation. You mentioned the fact that your group and the farm groups of the country had much to do with the results of the election in November, and I agree with you that they did have a lot to do with it.

Now, does that not stem, and did not that voting on the part of those farm groups stem, from the fact that the Government has been pretty kind to the farmers in the way of 90 percent of parity?

Mr. SANDERS. Well——

Mr. BAILEY. And one other question. As a member of the Seventy-ninth Congress, I supported appropriations to provide for storage for about 400,000,000 bushels of grain. Along came the Eightieth Congress, and I believe they reduced those appropriations so that you could only provide storage for about 50,000,000. Is it not true that some of the farm groups got caught with no place to store their grain, and were forced to sell it at a loss? And do you not think that that has something to do with the voting in the November election?

Mr. SANDERS. The voting of the farmers is very complex, and I doubt whether we could analyze it in a satisfactory way. I doubt very much whether the storage had as much to do with the farmers' vote as you imply by your question. In the first place, I think the farmers voted largely on the basis of a very complex judgment on the individual candidates in their area and voted for those that they thought would support an adequate farm program.

Mr. BAILEY. In other words, my party guaranteed you a return to parity and a removal of the sliding scale of parity as provided by the Eightieth Congress; that is true, is it not?

Mr. SANDERS. I rather prefer not to talk about the political angles of this. I might tell you, Mr. Bailey, that I am from Oklahoma, and you known my politics, probably.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to compliment you——

Mr. SANDERS. So I would prefer not to go into the politics of the election. I would very much prefer to let the statement stand, that we do not believe that the election was a mandate, a clear-cut, definite mandate, for repeal of the Taft-Hartley Act, and we known our membership think likewise. We know farmers, and we know that the farm vote did not have that implication in it.

Mr. BAILEY. You will agree with me that the question is open to argument, of course?

Mr. SANDERS. Oh, yes; I think so. Almost all of these questions are open to argument.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins?

Mr. PERKINS. Nothing, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving?

Mr. PERKINS. I yield to Mr. Jacobs, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. IRVING. Mr. Sanders, to continue Mr. Bailey's questions——

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Irving, a moment, please. The Chair did not get this. But Mr. Perkins announced he yielded his time to Mr. Jacobs.

Mr. JACOBS. You may proceed first, Mr. Irving.

Mr. IRVING. There was no question but that the Democratic platform unquestionably pledged the party to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act, and there was no question but that everyone spoke, even the President, in very outspoken terms that they were going to repeal the Taft-Hartley Act. If any farmer voted for those candidates, he certainly knew that he had promised the people that because that was one of the major issues. So I cannot understand the position that the gentleman is taking. I know that when I voted the Democratic ticket for Mr. Truman that that was one of the things I expected him to do, for he was committed to do that. So I do think that it was a great deal more of a mandate than the Eightieth Congress had to pass such a law, because that was never an issue in the 1946 campaign.

The repeal of the Taft-Hartley law was not an issue in my own campaign. The previous witnesses here concerned themeselves a great deal with racketeering, and so forth, and the implication was that if you did not favor this law, you were a racketeer or a gangster, or something of that sort, by bringing in the fact that if you did not favor a law prohibiting you from murder, you were somewhat of a murderer, at least, in your heart.

I would like to say further that in my campaign I made many a statement—written statements—that I did not approve of and that I would do all I could to abolish racketeering and graft and corruption in labor unions, in business, in Government, and in politics, and that I would do all that I could to eliminate the causes of those things; that I favored laws which, if necessary, would harmonize with the interests of the employer and the employees as against those that would cause friction, confusion, dissension, and discord.

Now, can you agree that those are fairly good things to campaign on?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes. I would say that those indicate that you had a reasonably good platform.

Mr. IRVING. And I am against featherbedding and jurisdictional disputes in Government and Congress, the same as I am in labor unions and other businesses.

Mr. SANDERS. I am glad that you are, because the Grange tries to pitch its testimony on a high, the American, standard that we want labor to have a fair chance to bargain collectively for job security and a fair, decent wage. But we also want to see that labor does not abuse that privilege granted to it by society by racketeering methods, used by organized labor. And you and I admit that there are some racketeering methods. I do not say that that is a dominant characteristic of unionized labor. It is not.

Mr. IRVING. And you do not say that this is confined to labor unions, either, do you?

Mr. SANDERS. No, indeed.

Mr. IRVING. For the sake of the economy that you have raised those things——

Mr. SANDERS. Probably we have that method of operation, or action, on the part of all strata of our society, because we have bad elements in all strata.

Mr. IRVING. Now, you say that you are opposed to monopoly. I want to deal slightly with what Mr. Bailey brought out. Part of the committee was in favor of the minimum wage law and the fair labor standards act for agriculture, particularly where it affected industrial, or commercial-type farms, and where there could be a monopoly existing. But I am under the impression that most of the farm organizations, that is, their representatives, oppose any part of agriculture being included in this act. It does not seem quite consistent, in my opinion; nor does it seem consistent that, as Mr. Bailey brought out, you would want to go along with these restrictive and oppressive measures for one group, or for one class of our society, and not want any type of restriction or legislation for your own group.

Mr. SANDERS. We have 6,000,000 independent units that operate the farms of this country. And you well know that it is utterly impossible to organize farmers so as to control production. The fact of the business is, it is utterly impossible to control agricultural production by law. We did not control it in the early thirties. We reduced the total output of farms by only 2 percent, by our laws undertaking to restrict production.

Now, you do not have to worry much about a 100 percent competitive industry such as agriculture is. It simply cannot enforce restrictive desires, and there is no possibility of their getting together and doing it. We grant labor the right to organize and bargain collectively, and it comes to Congress and asks for certain privileges and rights and protections. But it must recognize that those rights give it a responsibility to society, and that is what we are talking about here. Labor unions should restrict their policies to those things that are not socially injurious.

Mr. IRVING. Of course, I think there are very few people who understand the full impact of the law. There were very few lawyers that understood the law when it was written. I do not know whether there are too many now that fully understand it. There are measures and steps in the law which, in my opinion, would weaken and finally destroy unions. Those are the parts of that law that I am definitely opposed to. I think unions are an essential part of our economy in this free-enterprise system, and I certainly am opposed to anything that would destroy them.

It has been said earlier in the hearings the law was hell for the employer and hell for the employee, and was a lawyer's paradise.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. IRVING. Thank you.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Jacobs, you have 20 minutes.

Mr. JACOBS. Thank you.

Mr. Sanders, in regard to this question of a mandate, a farmer is a sort of a fellow who generally votes for what he thinks is fair. I think you and I will agree to that, generally speaking, would you not say so?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, I believe the farmer probably is one of the most independent voters of the land, because he works hours and hours by himself, and he does his own thinking. He comes sometimes to some very erroneous conclusions because he does not rub his thoughts against a lot of people's thoughts in his daily work, and therefore, does not have them toned down, but he is very independent and votes what he thinks is right; yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. If there is an independent group of citizens left in the country you would say it is the farmer?

Mr. SANDERS. I believe so; yes, sir.

Mr. JACOBS. I think we will agree on that. Of course, there has been quite a change in the thinking on the part of the farmer in recent years in regard to labor matters; we will say in the last 15 or 20 years; you will agree to that, will you not?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, I think the farmer has given a great deal more thought to labor matters than he did 15 years ago.

Mr. JACOBS. Those matters have come to him through newspaper articles, and by radio and by various means of communication, and he probably takes it with him to the field and to the barn, and studies about it considerably. The means of communication has improved his thinking on labor matters, has it not?

Mr. SANDERS. I do not mean to leave the impression the farmer does not have a lot of contact with the outside world. Nearly every farmer takes a daily paper nowadays, and reads his papers assiduously.

Mr. JACOBS. And most of them have radios now?

Mr. SANDERS. But the point I am trying to make is that he thinks independently because he does not have to argue with the other fellow a great deal.

Mr. JACOBS. What you are trying to say, I think, is the farmer probably had thought out all these issues when he voted. I think that is a fair statement?

Mr. SANDERS. I think he did, but, of course, I do think this, that you cannot pick out any one individual issue and say that when the farmers voted they voted for that issue, because they balanced that against a lot of other things, such as the other views of the parties or candidates.

Mr. JACOBS. But we could say this: Do you not think this would be a fair statement, that any commitment in a political platform was not utterly distasteful to the people at large, or else the party would not have been elected?

Mr. SANDERS. I doubt whether that could be applied to specific portions of either platform, because you can take both platforms so far as agriculture is concerned and both had a very reasonable and sound agricultural program in them.

Mr. JACOBS. What I mean by that, Mr. Sanders, is that you would agree that no plank in a victorious platform was utterly distasteful to the people at large; if it had been, that party would not have been returned to power.

Mr. SANDERS. I presume that you might use such logic as that, but I would cross my fingers when I agreed to that.

Mr. JACOBS. We will assume your fingers to be crossed.

Mr. SANDERS. I am thinking how complex it is, the way people vote in this country. If I were to explain why my wife voted the way she did, it would be entirely different from the basis of my vote.

Mr. JACOBS. I presume that is right. Taking an entire cross section, it is hard to determine why any particular person voted as he did.

Let us go to another point. Those are pretty broad questions.

Mr. SANDERS. Quite so.

Mr. JACOBS. I was quite intrigued by one statement in your prepared statement, on page 8, where you say—

> The right of the individual not to engage in a strike should be conditioned or limited by legitimate union requirements.

That is particularly interesting to me, in view of further statements you make on page 13; that is, in reference to employment of replacements of struck labor. That is the background of the question I wanted to ask you.

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. There has been talk of requiring a strike vote before labor can strike. What is your view as to whether or not, if a law would require a strike vote before striking, and if the result of that vote would be in favor of striking, those who voted against it should be bound by the decision of the majority?

Mr. SANDERS. May I qualify my answer to that by saying if the shop were a union shop under the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act, and, therefore, the laborers would undoubtedly, to a large extent, be union laborers and, therefore, the strike vote would clearly represent the majority of the opinion of the laborers. I think that the plant, or the union, certainly the members of the union, should respect that vote, because I believe that a majority should rule.

Mr. JACOBS. That is a moral proposition, I think, that we would all agree to, but would you favor a legal compulsion to that effect?

Mr. SANDERS. To compel them to strike?

Mr. JACOBS. If they participate in the election that they should be bound by the result of the election.

Mr. SANDERS. If they participate in the election certainly they should be bound by the results of the election, because I do not see how you could give labor the right to bargain freely and to democratically determine its bargaining actions without saying a majority should rule.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, what we are arriving at there is that some of the proposals that are made lead to further thinking of those who say there should be a strike vote before a strike is called, and it should be supervised by governmental authority, and the natural implication is that those who participate in the election are going to abide by the results?

Mr. SANDERS. I should think so.

Mr. JACOBS. I sometimes wonder if some of those who have advocated such rules have thought that far.

Let us talk about union security election for a minute. I have correspondence from a rather large union who has requested me to support the continuance of the union security election. Would that sound a little amazing to you?

Mr. SANDERS. Of course—I am sorry, but I do not know your history, and therefore I would not——

Mr. JACOBS. I received it as a Member of Congress. You get a lot of mail from everybody, you know, as a Member of Congress, but I wondered if it sounded a little strange to you that a union would write and ask the union security election be continued. Would that seem a little strange to you?

Mr. SANDERS. We feel there are a lot of unions that might take a broad view of the thing, and ask for that; yes.

Mr. JACOBS. I will tell you the rest of the story. They said that after they won the right to represent the workers in the plant in a representation election then they were required to have a union security election, and that they felt that they were entitled then to have the union security provision in their contract without even bargaining for it. In other words, having held the legal election required by law that the employer would not be entitled to say "no" to the union security provision; how does that sound to you?

Mr. SANDERS. You are getting into some pretty deep technical matters for me. If you could explain that in less technical terms.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us put it this way—it is the same thing we were talking about a minute ago—the law came along and said to the union. "You must have an election before you can be established as a bargaining agent." That was in the Wagner Act. An election established the union as a bargaining representative, and now the Taft-Hartley law came along and said, "Before you can bargain for a union shop you must have another election"—and we will not talk about the fairness of the election, the requirement of the majority of all workers, whether they voted or not—but you must have an election.

These people who communicated with me said, "That is all right; we are willing to accept that provided they say the employers must grant the union shop if we win the election." Do you understand it now?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. In other words, let us clarify it this way, Mr. Sanders. The union security election only grants the union the authority to bargain for a union shop; you understand that?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. What they are saying is, "Let us keep the election, but if we win it automatically that makes the shop a union shop"; what do you think about that?

Mr. SANDERS. If the employer agreed to the election himself, and the election was called for the determination of the union shop or nonunion shop, I think the employer should abide by the results. If he is opposed to the union shop, and the election is against the union shop, he should abide by it.

Mr. JACOBS. Of course, the way the law is now, the law requires the election as to the union shop, and then after the union has the election, if it wins, the employer has the veto as to whether or not he will agree to a union shop; do you think that is fair?

Mr. SANDERS. No, I would think the employer should register his veto to begin with, and say he is against it, and he would not accept it under the law. I do think an employer, if he is a mind to take such serious steps, and is so bitterly opposed to unions—which I do not agree that he should be—has a right to close his plant and lose all of his investment, and keep it closed the rest of the time if he wants to. I think such a man as that is rather reprehensible from the social viewpoint, even if he can financially stand the burden. But I suppose in a democracy we have to grant that right if we respect the right of property; and if he wants to he can close his plant down and stop working.

Mr. JACOBS. You definitely feel that employees have to strike for a unified front when they meet management across the bargaining table, to match the management front?

Mr. SANDERS. I do believe this, that good management should recognize that good labor unions are an asset and not a liability and, I think, that a reasonable manager will recognize that good labor unions are a real asset to him.

Mr. JACOBS. And many business enterprises have done so, and have enjoyed good labor relations?

Mr. SANDERS. Certainly.

Mr. JACOBS. There is one other matter I wanted to ask you about, and that is the matter of featherbedding. I think we are all against it. As I understand the term "featherbedding" it means to ask for something for nothing.

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. JACOBS. And, of course, it contains a good many variations, I suppose. For example, I bought an automobile and I paid a pretty good price for it, and the oil leaked out of the oil pan, and I took it back to the dealer I bought it from and asked him to tighten it up, and the bolts twisted off, and we found the bolts were practically made of pot metal, and we had to go to a junk yard and get prewar bolts before we could tighten the oil pan up enough to keep the oil from coming out. Would you not think that was fetherbedding when the company that put the automobile on the market and sold it with bolts that were made of such inferior metal?

Mr. SANDERS. I do not know, but it certainly is an undesirable thing for a manufacturer to do. However, I do not think you would buy but about two cars of that make after you had been burned that way.

Mr. JACOBS. Unfortunately, I bought two of them at the same time, and had the same experience, but we did get enough bolts out of the junk yard; but, I say, is that not featherbedding, or getting something for nothing? Did I not have a right to assume that the bolts in the car were of sufficient good alloy, and that it would function as a transportation vehicle?

Mr. SANDERS. No, you did not get something for nothing. You thought you bought good bolts to begin with, and you had a right to assume the company would give you good bolts, because that is what you thought you bought. I do not think that would be featherbedding on your part.

Mr. JACOBS. No, I do not mean featherbedding on my part, but on the part of the manufacturer. Oh, no, it was not featherbedding as far as I was concerned.

Mr. SANDERS. I thought you meant you were trying to get bolts for nothing.

Mr. JACOBS. No. I say this, I felt I was sleeping on a bed that had a mattress stuffed with nuts and bolts.

Do you not think the fellow who sold me the car was featherbedding, the fellow who took my money for the car was featherbedding, to some extent?

Mr. SANDERS. You mean the man who sold the car?

Mr. JACOBS. The manufacturer.

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, I presume so, if he did that consciously, but I doubt very much that he intended to do that. I do not know how such an accident could occur in the modern automobile industry but I doubt very much whether the manufacturer ever dreamed of doing such a thing; and if it were taken to him he should certainly try to make it good—and maybe to the extent of giving you a new engine.

Mr. JACOBS. Regardless of that, when you buy something that is of inferior material, or is priced so high that the profit is, say, six or seven hundred percent, do you not feel that there probably is a little featherbedding in that somewhere?

Mr. SANDERS. There are monopolistic prices, and that is just as reprehensible as it can be. I do not believe such can exist under a state of fair competition.

Mr. JACOBS. Do you agree this is featherbedding: A friend of mine, who is a farmer near Evansville, Ind., went in to buy a binder canvas, which had been selling for $5 apiece in the early '30's, and the dealer said, "This is $15." The farmer said, "It was $5, so how did it happen to be $15?"

The dealer said, "Do you not know there is a tax on cotton?"

This farmer friend of mine said, "Yes, I know there is a tax on cotton. It is 1 cent a pound."

So, he said, "Throw that binder canvas on the scales and weigh it, sticks, nuts, bolts, rivets, leather, and all, and see how much it weighs," and, as I recall, it weighed around 25 pounds, and there was a 2-cent-a-pound tax on the dollar. The binder canvas was raised in price $10, but when he weighed the whole thing the amount was not over a half dollar.

Would you not call that featherbedding? Would you say whether you would consider that featherbedding?

Mr. SANDERS. You have asked a question that is very complex, and I am not sure I have gotten all of it. I doubt whether that would be featherbedding. It is not the type of featherbedding we are opposed to. May I say it is not the definition of featherbedding that I am trying to bring out here and that I am opposed to.

Mr. JACOBS. I am not trying to restrict it to one type of featherbedding. We are all Americans——

Mr. SANDERS. I would not define that as featherbedding.

Mr. JACOBS. Would you not say if he was collecting $10 more for binder canvas, because of the 50-cent tax put on cotton, that he was getting something for nothing?

Mr. SANDERS. You said the canvas weighed 20 pounds?

Mr. JACOBS. As I recall, it weighed 25 pounds—let us say 20 pounds.

Mr. SANDERS. You understand what the farmer got for that cotton was 20 cents a pound which would be $4 for his cotton.

Mr. JACOBS. But do not forget there is an awful lot of sticks and leather——

Mr. SANDERS. There are a lot of manufacturing process costs beyond the farmer, and I am not sure there is any featherbedding in that example.

Mr. JACOBS. This was back in the '30's and the canvas had been selling for $5, and all at once it became $15, and he asked why it was raised, and he said because of the tax on cotton, but that could not have been over 50 cents, and yet the price had gone up $10.

Mr. SANDERS. I can easily understand how that merchant would not be able to sell that very long at that price either. He would soon lose his trade.

Mr. JACOBS. Unless they were together on it?

Mr. SANDERS. Certainly.

Mr. JACOBS. What I am trying to drive at is this—and this is the final question—when it gets down to featherbedding, which means getting something easy for little or nothing, are you not getting into a pretty complex question if you try to regulate it by law?

Mr. SANDERS. I do not believe so. Let us take an example of featherbedding—I am not sure of the facts, but it was an advertisement by the railroads recently on the Diesel engine. The advertisement said unions were demanding two crews where one crew could do the work easily, and that there is no reason in the world for two crews on the Diesel.

That type of featherbedding is what I mean, and I think you could regulate that. I think it should be regulated somewhat, and that unions should not have the right to compel an employer to pay the wages of a man who does nothing just because they have the power to get together and compel him to do it. That is the kind of featherbedding we are talking about, Mr. Congressman.

Mr. JACOBS. I am against that kind of featherbedding. Of course, I am against whisky, too, but I would not favor prohibition. I am trying to get the practical side as to whether or not we can regulate it from a practical viewpoint. You do agree that that example of the inferior bolt is in the nature of featherbedding? Are we not going to get into a price-fixing situation before we get through?

Mr. SANDERS. In the case of the bolts, I think competition will solve that easily and, therefore, I do not think it is the same nature as the featherbedding. The featherbedding arises because we protect labor in their bargaining and organizing powers, and with that power goes the responsibility to the general public not to abuse it in antisocial action. We believe that featherbedding is antisocial action.

Mr. JACOBS. Let us examine that point very briefly.

You say we protect labor in its right to organize—is my time up?

Mr. KELLEY. Your time is up.

Mr. Burke, you have 7 minutes.

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Sanders, I would like to say at the beginning that I believe you have arrived at some remarkably fair conclusions from what I believe to be an incorrect premise, to start with, on the purpose and intent of the law. Of course, I believe the purpose and intent of the Taft-Hartley Act was to destroy unions where possible, and to minimize the bargaining powers to the greatest extent possible wherever it was not possible to destroy them.

Mr. SANDERS. May I say in answer to that we would agree if that is the purpose—we do not think it is the purpose, and we do not read it as the purpose—but if that is the purpose we would not support the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to address myself to the question of monopoly. As I understand the definition of the word "monopoly"—and I would like to give it in rather common and you might say venacular English—"monopoly," if I understand it right, is absolute control over any given field of activity, is that not correct?

Mr. SANDERS. You can have degrees of monopoly. I mean you can have perfect monopoly, or you can have a partial monopoly. Either one of them would give you power. Absolute monopoly would be what you describe, as I understand it.

Mr. BURKE. The propaganda on the Taft-Hartley Act in all of the newspaper and radio talks, and so on, during the time the Taft-Hartley Act was going through Congress, tended to show that there was a labor monopoly in this country, is that not right?

Mr. SANDERS. Tended to show there was a labor monopoly?

Mr. BURKE. Yes. That is, they wanted to convince the American public that there actually did exist a labor monopoly.

Mr. SANDERS. I would phrase it to say they wanted to show that labor unions had abused the power that they had attained through organization.

Mr. BURKE. But they used the word "monopoly" to a great extent?

Mr. SANDERS. If they did I think probably that certainly the labor unions did not have an absolute monopoly. I do not know of any that does have.

Mr. BURKE. But they used the word, and at the same time the bill that was going through Congress contained a prohibition against jurisdictional disputes?

Mr. SANDERS. That is right.

Mr. BURKE. How could there be jurisdictional disputes in a monopoly? There could not.

Mr. SANDERS. No; I think the only difficulty there is, is that as I say you can have degrees of monopoly, that is, you can have absolute monopoly or you can have a partial monopoly. That is, you can control a sufficient amount of the goods to give you certain powers, but not absolute power, and with that concept of monopoly I think maybe you could describe that certain unions did have powers that approached upon a relative amount of monopoly.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to pursue that a little further, but my time is very limited.

Mr. KELLEY. You still have two minutes.

Mr. BURKE. I would like to go for a moment into this featherbedding. Mr. Jacobs touched on it, and he was developing the point that it might be a rather dangerous provision in law to just say we prohibit featherbedding. It is a rather difficult definition. Take, for instance, in a mass-production industry, the productive capacity is measured down pretty close to a split-second timing; in fact, they use stop watches. To use an example, on a farm which I know nothing about, we will say that the owner of the farm tells his hired hand, "You have been plowing 1 acre in a given length of time, but I have purchased a new tractor that the manufacturer said will do double work of the former tractor and the plow, and therefore from now on you have to plow 2 acres in the same time."

The hired employee says, "That may be, but I do not think I can do more than an acre and a half in the given time because of other factors, safety, and it may be dangerous for me," and all that sort of thing. Is it not possible that a prohibition by law of the so-called practice of featherbedding might preclude the possibility of that employee saying that to his employer, and carrying it out into mass production, and it is also possible, is it not, that any challenge of the employer's production standards might be considered as featherbedding?

Mr. SANDERS. I would not want the law to be so written as to interpret changes that may occur in productivity, in the failure to use, to the full extent, the machines, as featherbedding, but to illustrate——

Mr. KELLEY. Your time has expired.

Mr. SANDERS. May I finish the statement?

Mr. KELLEY. The committee has adopted a rule, and the chairman cannot override it.

Mr. Wier?

Mr. WIER. Mr. Sanders, I want to ask you one or two questions, and I am going to pick up the featherbedding again, because I am a little skeptical on the statement you made to Mr. Jacobs a minute ago.

You made this statement, that you picked up a newspaper the other day and saw a big ad by the railroads of this country, describing featherbedding, and you went on to say you were against that kind of featherbedding.

Mr. SANDERS. The ad said that there was absolutely no reason, from the standpoint of efficiency, safety, and health of the employees, to employ two complete sets of operators for that Diesel, namely, an engineer and a fireman, but that the union was claiming that the railroads must employ two sets of operators for a Diesel engine.

That we are definitely against, if the railroads' advertisement told the truth of the case; we are against that type of featherbedding.

Mr. WIER. Your presentation here—and I do not think you would use it if you did not have some justification for believing it—is your logic, based upon the ad you have seen in the newspapers; is that correct?

Mr. SANDERS. No, upon the general knowledge that we have that there is a certain amount of that type of requirement in unions. If you ask me for specific cases I cannot give them to you, because, as I say, I do not pose as an expert; but if such featherbedding exists, we believe that the law should prohibit it, if unions do not prohibit it themselves.

Mr. WIER. You recognize, Mr. Sanders, without an explanation that you, to some degree at least, are indicting the railroad organizations rather than the railroad companies.

Mr. SANDERS. Mr. Weir, I specifically did not intend to indict the Brotherhood of Railway Workers.

Mr. WIER. Do you know anything about Diesel engines; that is, the dispute that is going on in Chicago today?

Mr. SANDERS. I used it only as an illustration.

Mr. WIER. I think you should not have said that.

Mr. SANDERS. I did say "for example."

Mr. WIER. But neither you nor I know the real need of the operation of those big Diesel engines, and I cannot pass judgment without having some knowledge.

Mr. SANDERS. I am not passing judgment on that specific case. I am passing judgment on employing two crews when only one could do the job.

Mr. WIER. The Eightieth Congress was under the supposition that because somebody told them something, the general indictment should be thrown on labor.

Mr. SANDERS. I do not believe they placed it for that reason. I believe Congressmen and Senators used more facts than that in their work on legislation.

Mr. KELLEY. The railway employees come under the Railway Act: they do not come under the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. WIER. I did not bring this in.

Mr. KELLEY. We will confine ourselves to the bill.

Mr. WIER. Featherbedding is in this bill, and he described what he thought was featherbedding.

We will pass on from featherbedding so long as you feel you do not know the need on the Diesel engine.

Mr. SANDERS. If you put it that way, I will accept that. I have no direct knowledge of the Diesel engine.

Mr. WIER. Mr. Sanders, are you very close to your thousands of organizations around the country?

Mr. SANDERS. The granges?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS. I do not know how to answer that. I know what they think because of hearing them in their deliberations, and the information I get from them every day: if that is being close, I am close.

Mr. WIER. Do you have what you call the Minnehaha Grange up in Minnesota?

Mr. SANDERS. If you say so. We have 800 granges.

Mr. WIER. That is one of the oldest granges in the State of Minnesota.

Would you be surprised to know that in the main most of the members of that grange supported me for Congress?

Mr. SANDERS. No, I do not have any reason to be surprised at that.

Mr. WIER. I asked you the question because you spoke of the fact that the grange was generally in opposition to the repeal of that Taft-Hartley Act, which you have stated here today.

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, I am sure of that. May I answer that?

Mr. WIER. Yes.

Mr. SANDERS. The basis for that is that the resolution—which I did not read here—says definitely that we favored in our national convention the retention of the Taft-Hartley Act. Our delegates consisted of, I think, 77 votes, and I think there were only one or two votes against that.

Mr. WIER. That was a delegate body?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, sir; and most of those delegates are actually farmers and their wives.

Mr. WIER. Those are the ones I talked to. I wanted to remind you that they called me to a meeting, at which time they were thoroughly familiar with my position on the Taft-Hartley Act, and then they gave me five or six questions they wanted me to support in this Congress in their behalf, which I intend to do.

You made some reference to the open shop here a minute ago, as being opposed to the closed shop. Who voted for these closed shops that the Taft-Hartley Act outlawed? Who votes for them?

Mr. SANDERS. I take it that the union members do.

Mr. WIER. Who makes up the union members, in the main, around in the United States, California to New York; who makes up the membership?

Mr. SANDERS. They are obtained just like we get our membership, by going out and asking a man to join, and where he is qualified, accepting him when he makes application.

Mr. WIER. Would you be surprised, Mr. Sanders, to know that throughout the length and breadth of this country a big substantial part of the membership of the trade-union movement comes from the very people you are speaking of, from the farms and small rural cities?

Mr. SANDERS. No, I am not surprised. I know it is the case.

Mr. WIER. So it is your people that we are benefiting and are helping to benefit themselves?

Mr. SANDERS. You mean unions are benefiting farmers?

Mr. WIER. Farm boys and girls.

Mr. SANDERS. They have previously been farm boys and girls.

Mr. WIER. That is right.

So they come into our unions in the cities——

Mr. SANDERS. If the question you are trying to ask me is that because they were farm boys and girls, regardless of what they do, we should support them, I would say we would not support them on that basis and, therefore, we cannot concede that we should support unions because their membership came from the farm. That is a very spurious reason for supporting them, it seems to me.

Mr. WIER. The very people that were benefited under the Wagner Act are the people that came into the cities without any means, and without any connections, and got the benefit of unions—your girls and boys from the farmers' union.

Mr. SANDERS. We base our support on fundamental principles. We would take the same attitude if they came from New York City that we would if they came from a farm in Texas. We base our opposition on fundamental principles of what we think is democratically right, and what is right ethically, and that is the basis of our support.

Mr. WIER. If your boys and girls are to enjoy the highest standard of living in this country through the entrance into a trade-union through an honest and legal procedure, you are opposed to that?

Mr. SANDERS. No; I would not say so.

Mr. WIER. That is what you just said.

Mr. SANDERS. No, sir; no. You are misinterpreting my statement entirely.

Mr. WIER. I am trying to point out to you it is the boys and girls from all the little towns and the farms and rural parts of our States, that come in and make up the large part of the trade-unions, and they reach the high standard of conditions, wages, and so forth.

Mr. KELLEY. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. Smith?

Mr. SMITH. Mr. Sanders, you were asked over on the other side about your interest in the retention of the Taft-Hartley Act and I believe you stated that your principal reason for the retention of the Taft-Hartley Act was that it meant stability, in your opinion, to the farming industry?

Mr. SANDERS. That is right; yes, sir.

Mr. SMITH. The farmer is a man who is engaged in the manufacturing just the same as the man who has a factory; is he not?

Mr. SANDERS. That is true.

Mr. SMITH. Is it not true on a farm when instability arrives the farmer is the first to suffer, and he is many times forced to sell his capital goods in order to survive; is that not true?

Mr. SANDERS. That is quite true, and add to that, Mr. Smith, he is the only segment that is producing a full and complete amount of goods, or output, but he gets the lowest return for his services, for a complete service.

Mr. SMITH. And when a farmer sells his cows and his brood sows he is in exactly the same position as the manufacturer would be who is selling the machinery?

Mr. SANDERS. That is right.

Mr. SMITH. But in addition he has to compete with two factors that the others do not, and that is weather and insects, which are very hazardous?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. Another statement that you made was that you are opposed to monopolies, and one of the basic reasons you think that the Taft-Hartley Act should be retained is that it has something to do with checking labor monopolies; is that true?

Mr. SANDERS. It does, we think, bring about a better atmosphere for free bargaining for both management and labor, and we believe ultimately, when it is refined, if it has serious defects in it, it will stabilize employment rather than create disharmony and will promote settlement. For that reason we are favorable to a law that makes both management and labor equally responsible to bargain in good faith.

Mr. SMITH. In other words, it is the freedom of the practices on the part of both management and labor?

Mr. SANDERS. That is right—against coercive restrictive practices of both management and labor.

Mr. SMITH. Which, in the ultimate, is the benefit of the whole economic life we enjoy in the country?

Mr. SANDERS. The Grange looks upon an industrial plant as a means to produce and distribute goods that society wants, and, then, secondly, to give the owner of the plant and the labor which works in it a decent, American payment for their services. We feel that both management and labor forget that that is the prime purpose for the existence of such a plant.

Mr. SMITH. Is it not true that the farmers of the country have been very severely handicapped as to production of goods by reason of strikes?

Mr. SANDERS. We quite often suffer due to stoppage of work on the part of labor, whether that is caused by the manager or the labor unions stopping work. We are trying to argue that some way must be found through law that there will be a very minimum of stoppages of work, because the only way agriculture can become prosperous is for nonagricultural industry to produce a flow of goods similar to that of agricultural industry.

Mr. SMITH. But you must have equipment to do that, so far as the farmer is concerned?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. SMITH. That is all, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Werdel?

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Sanders, I heard you mention the figure 6,000,000 in your examination. Did I understand you correctly, that there are 6,000,000 farmers?

Mr. SANDERS. 6,000,000 farm units, yes: farmers.

Mr. WERDEL. Small farms and large farms?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. And I believe you mentioned that your national meeting was held on November 10 to 19 of last year?

Mr. SANDERS. Those were the dates; yes.

Mr. WERDEL. I have here a brochure that is entitled "A Résumé of Agricultural Policy and Program Recommendations Adopted by The National Grange, Eighty-second Annual Session, Portland, Maine, November 10 to 19, 1948," and I will ask you if that is the brochure that was put out by the National Grange after that meeting?

Mr. SANDERS. That is right; yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. The brochure is 20 pages long, and I will ask you if it is the result of studies of committees, having been acted upon by the National Grange at that meeting?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes; we have a rather elaborate set of committees, some 8 or 10 of them, appointed by the National Master to specialize in studying and reporting on certain subjects.

Mr. WERDEL. And those committees report at the national meeting each year; is that correct?

Mr. SANDERS. That is right.

Mr. WERDEL. And then you act upon their reports by resolution?

Mr. SANDERS. That is right. Those committees are similar to this committee here. They hear any and all witnesses who come before them. They are perfectly willing to listen to any witness on any subject.

Mr. WERDEL. Will you tell us just briefly how the Grange is operated? First, does it cover the whole United States?

Mr. SANDERS. We have State organization in 37 States.

Mr. WERDEL. And how many Grange units are there throughout the United States, if you know?

Mr. SANDERS. Something like 700 or 800 local units, and then we have what we call the Pomona, which is a county Grange, or a federation of all the local units in the county. We have a State Grange in each State, and then the National Grange. The voting delegates come from the local units to the Pomona, and the master and his wife in each local unit vote in the Pomona, and vote in the State.

Mr. WERDEL. And those were the delegates who came to the National Grange?

Mr. SANDERS. The delegates to the National are the State masters and their wives. You understand in the Grange ladies can hold all offices in the Grange, any lady above 16 years of age can be a member and hold any and all offices of the Grange.

Mr. WERDEL. And the National sets up a study for the following year as to labor and management problems of the United States?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. Do the State Granges also set up committees to study that problem?

Mr. SANDERS. Most of them do, yes, sir.

Mr. WERDEL. So your report at your national convention was the result of a thorough study in the States and the Nation by your respective committees?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes; that was the basis on which this statement was made.

Mr. WERDEL. As I understand you, there were two votes out of 90 in your National Grange against the policy of the Taft-Hartley Act as expressed by you.

Mr. SANDERS. I think two votes out of some 77. I have forgotten the exact vote we have in our delegate body, but I think it was about 2 votes out of 77, who voted against it.

Mr. WERDEL. Commencing on page 13 and continuing over to page 14 of the brochure I have mentioned, you have set out in that brochure the labor-management and social-security policies of the National Grange following your November 10 meeting of last year; is that correct?

Mr. SANDERS. Yes.

Mr. WERDEL. That, in substance, states concisely part of what you have stated here today?

Mr. SANDERS. That is the basis of my statement here today, and I think all of those provisions are in my testimony here.

Mr. WERDEL. This is rather short, and I will offer it for the record—just the page that I have mentioned—commencing on page 13, under No. 5, Labor-Management and Social Security Policies and Programs, and continuing over on page 14 to the subject Taxation and Fiscal Affairs.

Mr. BAILEY (presiding). If there is no objection the section will be accepted for inclusion into the record.

(The section referred to is as follows:)

V. LABOR-MANAGEMENT AND SOCIAL SECURITY POLICIES AND PROGRAMS

CONFERENCE OF LABOR, MANAGEMENT AND AGRICULTURE ON A BALANCED ECONOMY

We believe that the establishment and preservation of a balanced economy are essential if our free competitive enterprise system is to be preserved. We recommend that the representatives of the great economic groups, business, labor and agriculture, get together for the purpose of trying to develop price, wage and profit policies that will reduce friction to a minimum and stimulate a greater spirit of cooperation and understanding among all of our people.

GRANGE POLICY ON LABOR-MANAGEMENT RELATIONS

We present the following as our statement of basic labor-management relations policy. We believe:

(1) That free enterprise and democracy depend upon an economy of reasonably full production, and freedom from monopolistic practices for labor, industry and agriculture alike; and that there is a sound social, moral and economic basis for these views.

(2) That management of industry should place a policy of high output and reasonably full employment above high prices and profits; and should be prohibited from using coercion and intimidation in its relationship with labor.

(3) That labor unions have a useful place in the Nation in order that the combined economic strength of industrial and professional workers may offset the power of organized or big industry and finance.

(4) That organized labor has most to gain by adopting as its primary objective the maintenance of reasonably full employment and an economy of full production, a principle which applies equally to all economic groups and can be made a basis for cooperation between all groups.

(5) That we uphold the right of labor to strike and to organize on an industry-wide basis, especially in industries dominated by a few large units.

(6) That when a strike, or threatened strike, becomes a serious menace to public health, safety and the general welfare, the use of the injunction and compulsory arbitration is justified.

(7) That the Grange does not condone such restrictive practices as the secondary boycott, sympathetic and jurisdictional strike, slow-downs, any unjustified reduction of the workweek, and featherbedding by labor.

(8) That mass picketing which results in intimidation is unfair, but that all workers of a struck plant should be protected in their right to picket peaceably.

(9) That a majority of the workers in a plant must vote favorably by secret ballot before giving union shop privileges to any labor organization; and that we oppose the closed shop.

(10) That we recommend to organized labor, the adoption of a parity wage automatically adjusted semiannually to the cost of living. By this we do not mean to preclude labor from bargaining collectively through representatives of its own choosing to improve its working and living standards or obtain an increased share of the national income.

TAFT-HARTLEY ACT

We believe the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act has had a corrective effect on labor and management disputes. We favor such modifications in the act as may be necessary to correct abuses or weaknesses that are shown to exist.

UNEMPLOYMENT COMPENSATION

The Grange opposes any increase in unemployment compensation until means are made effective to minimize existing abuses.

SOCIAL SECURITY

Social security should be extended to include the farmer and farm worker, insofar as it applies to old age and retirement benefits, and other benefits should be extended to farm operators if and when a practical means can be found to make it work.

Mr. WERDEL. Mr. Sanders, was that brochure available to all of your membership?

Mr. SANDERS. No, we do not give that circulation because we have about 800 units and, I would say, 850,000 dues-paying members, and we do not have the money to print that for all of them. We send it to the State masters and to the deputies, who are the organizers, the local organizers, of the Grange, and to any local grange which asks for it.

Mr. WERDEL. As legislative counsel for the National Grange, have you had any criticism about the labor-management policy of the National Grange from the local units?

Mr. SANDERS. We have had one letter from some man in California, but I do not remember his name.

Mr. WERDEL. It was not a man from the Tenth District, was it?

Mr. SANDERS. I do not think so, no, sir. He said he thought the Grange should stick to its knitting, and that it should take care of agriculture and leave labor alone. I wrote him about it, that what unions do vitally determines the income of agriculture, and we thought we had a right to try to do something about the labor question. I have not heard from him.

Mr. WERDEL. Have you had any other letters but that one in opposition to this policy?

Mr. SANDERS. Not at all, and we have had a lot of commendatory statements.

Mr. WERDEL. Today, here in Washington, there is a growing feeling about the promises that have been made by the President during the last campaign, which had the country a little bit stumped. I will ask you this, if he got on the train and went out to stump the country again, do you think he would find the Grange people believing in this policy?

Mr. SANDERS. I think the Grange policy would be unchanged if that occurred; I do not think it would have anything to do with our policy.

Mr. WERDEL. You think that the Grange people generally believe in this policy as set out in your brochure, even today?

Mr. SANDERS. I am sure that if the Grange were called on—individual granges as well as the national—I believe we would again pass the resolution which reads that we believe the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act has had a corrective effect on labor and management disputes. We favor such modifications in the act as may be necessary to correct abuses or weaknesses that are shown to exist.

Mr. WERDEL. That is all.

Mr. BAILEY. Thank you, Mr. Sanders.

The committee will stand recessed until 1:45, at which time the committee will be pleased to hear Mr. Haley, of the National Coal Association, and Mr. Moody, of the Southern Coal Operators.

(Whereupon at 12:35 p. m. the committee recessed until 1:45 p. m. of the same day.)

AFTERNOON SESSION

(Pursuant to recess, the subcommittee reconvened at 1:45 p. m.)

Mr. KELLEY. The committee will be in order, please.

Mr. HALEY, of the National Coal Association, and Mr. Moody, president of the Southern Coal Producers' Association.

I think we will have you sit together at the table, and then the members can direct their questions to either one.

Mr. Haley, you are first, I think.

Mr. HALEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. MOODY. I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, but I did not quite understand. You want us both here at the same time?

Mr. KELLEY. That is right, and then when the members are questioning, they can direct their questions to either one.

Mr. MOODY. In other words, he will make his presentation and then I will make mine?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes, that is right, because you both represent coal producers. And am I correct when I say that the National Coal Association embraces also members of the Southern Coal Producers' Association?

Mr. HALEY. That is right. The members of the National Coal Association may also well be members of the Southern Coal Producers.

Mr. KELLEY. That is what I mean.

Mr. HALEY. But there may be coal companies which are members of the Southern Coal Producers' Association and not members of the National Coal Association.

Mr. KELLEY. They are not members of your association?

Mr. HALEY. That is correct.

Mr. KELLEY. Well, the reason is that you both represent coal producers.

Mr. MOODY. I have no objection, sir. I was just trying to understand the procedure.

Mr. KELLEY. Yes. That is what we usually do when members of similar organizations are here.

When you are ready, Mr. Haley, you may proceed.

Mr. HALEY. Thank you very much, Mr. Chairman.

TESTIMONY OF JAMES W. HALEY, SECRETARY AND GENERAL COUNSEL, NATIONAL COAL ASSOCIATION

Mr. HALEY. My name is James W. Haley. I am secretary and general counsel of the National Coal Association. The National Coal Association is the trade association of the bituminous coal producing industry, representing the owners and operators of bituminous coal mines in the United States. Its membership includes segments of the coal-producing industry in each of the major coal-producing States in the Nation and comprises approximately 75 percent of the total commercial coal production in this country.

As one of the spokesmen for the important bituminous coal mining industry, I express my appreciation to the committee for permitting our organization to present the views of the industry with respect to any proposed change in the national labor policy.

The uninterrupted and efficient production of coal is a vital factor in the national economy. Any change in the national labor policy which would affect this factor is at once the concern of the industry and the Nation as a whole.

I should like to say, Mr. Chairman, that while I appear here as a representative of the bituminous coal mining industry, it is my feeling that in this particular problem, the best interests of the bituminous coal mining industry are also in the direction of the best interests of the Nation as a whole.

I will not attempt to read in detail my complete statement.

Mr. KELLEY. We will reproduce your statement in the record, anyhow, so if you wish to summarize it, that is fine.

Mr. HALEY. That is exactly what I should like to do.

(The statement referred to is as follows:)

STATEMENT OF JAMES W. HALEY, SECRETARY AND GENERAL COUNSEL, NATIONAL COAL ASSOCIATION, CONCERNING PROPOSED NATIONAL LABOR LEGISLATION

My name is James W. Haley. I am secretary and general counsel of the National Coal Association. The National Coal Association is the trade association of the bituminous coal producing industry, representing the owners and operators of bituminous coal mines in the United States. Its membership includes segments of the coal producing industry in each of the major coal producing States in the Nation and comprises approximately 75 percent of the total commercial coal production in this country.

As spokesman for the important bituminous coal mining industry, I express my appreciation to the committee for permitting our organization to present the views of the industry with respect to any proposed change in the national labor policy.

The uninterrupted and efficient production of coal is a vital factor in the national economy. Any change in the national labor policy which would affect this factor is at once the concern of the industry and the Nation as a whole. Therefore, the views of the bituminous coal mining industry with respect to H. R. 2032 or any proposed change in the present national labor policy, should be of material assistance to the committee in determining the appropriate policies to be established as a result of these proceedings.

It has been the experience of our industry that the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 has served to balance the relative economic powers of management and labor, thereby bringing about greater equality around the collective bargaining table. There is no question but that the act has been effective in preserving the public interest in settling national emergency strikes.

It is equally true that some provisions of the present law probably should be revised or eliminated.

My statement, however, deals primarily with three matters of special importance to the coal industry. We feel H. R. 2032 should be amended by (1) adding thereto a revised section 302 (c) (5), title III, of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, so as to remove the subject of welfare funds from the field of required collective bargaining, (2) adding thereto sections 2 (11) and 14 (a), title I, of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 with respect to the union status of supervisory employees, and (3) adding thereto sections 206, 207, 208, 209, and 210, title II, of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, with respect to injunctive powers of the Government in national emergencies.

H. R. 2032 SHOULD BE AMENDED TO REMOVE THE SUBJECT OF WELFARE FUNDS FROM THE FIELD OF REQUIRED COLLECTIVE BARGAINING

It is noted that the bill being considered by the committee would repeal the provisions of the 1947 amending act concerning payments into union welfare funds. We believe this subject is of such magnitude and importance as to warrant further very serious study by your committee with a view to recommending that Congress enact legislation which would be an improvement over the 1947 amendments.

Illustrative of the problem in this field is the experience of the bituminous coal mining industry. Since June 1, 1946, the bituminous coal mine operators have paid into the so-called welfare and retirement fund over $150,000,000. Currently the coal operators are paying into this fund more than one-quarter of a million dollars per day. Expressed another way, the coal industry is paying into the fund approximately $1.30 per man per day worked. It should be kept in mind that this $1.30 per man per day worked which employers in the bituminous coal mining industry are today required to pay into the welfare and retirement fund is in addition to contributions which employers in the bituminous coal mining industry must pay into the Federal social security fund.

We think Congress must seriously consider the effect of union welfare funds in connection with the over-all social security program. It must be remembered that payments made out of such funds are for the exclusive benefit of union members. Unless Congress takes appropriate action in the field, it is a foregone conclusion that the central union welfare fund will extend into many other industries, if not in every industry and every plant which is unionized.

If the $1.30 per union member per day worked levy which now prevails in the bituminous coal-mining industry is carried over and applied to union members throughout the country, the result will be an over-all levy on the American people of many billions of dollars annually for the exclusive benefit of the 15 or 16 million union members.

The question for Congress to resolve is: Should the American citizens be called upon to bestow special benefits upon a privileged group? Expressed another way, the question is: Should the American people be called upon to pay for a special social security system for union members which will be in addition to the social security benefits made available to citizens generally under the Federal social security laws? The issue before Congress is all the more important at this time because of the general feeling that the Federal social security program will or should be extended and liberalized.

What Congress should do about the central union welfare fund is indeed a serious problem. Beyond doubt it is so important that I question whether there will be any more important domestic issue before the Congress in the next several years. Obviously a practicable, sensible, and desirable immediate solution would be to amend the law to remove the central union welfare fund from the field of required bargaining under the law. I strongly urge that your committee give most serious consideration to this whole problem and that you recommend, and work for, amendment of the law to make it clear that discussion of such funds is not within the field of required collective bargaining.

H. R. 2032 SHOULD BE AMENDED BY LIMITING THE OBLIGATION OF EMPLOYERS TO RECOGNIZE SUPERVISORY EMPLOYEES FOR COLLECTIVE BARGAINING PURPOSES

Perhaps the most salutary portion of the Labor-Management Relations Act from the standpoint of business, the coal mining industry and from the standpoint of the Nation and the part of the act for which we today most strongly implore retention, is sections 2 (11) and 14 (a) of title I, dealing with the union status of supervisory employees. The importance of this section of the statute, while indicated in all industry and in many other specific industries, is no doubt nowhere so strongly emphasized as in the bituminous coal mining industry. While the coal industry has been the industry in which this problem has risen to most severe proportions, it could and no doubt would in time assume equally serious importance in other particular industries and in industry in general, unless adequate statutory safeguards are present.

The importance of the provisions dealing with union status of supervisory employees is emphasized by the fact that prior to enactment of the 1947 amendments there had been for a number of years almost continual strife, controversy and strikes with resultant impairment of the national economy as a result of issues growing out of attempts or would-be attempts to organize supervisory employees in the coal industry. On the other hand, as the record will show, upon enactment of the amendments in 1947 it was possible amicably to settle this serious controversy to the benefit of all concerned—the public generally, the bituminous coal mining industry, the supervisory personnel, and the production employees in the mines. The long and costly history of this controversy for the last 10 or 12 years is set forth in exhibit B attached to our statement filed with the Senate Committee on Labor and Public Welfare on February 22, 1949.

An indication of the magnitude of the problem inherent in attempting to resolve the controversy growing out of attempts to unionize supervisory employees is shown by the record of cases involving the issue handled by the National Labor Relations Board. From 1944 through June of 1948 the Board processed 688 petitions for certification of units of supervisors. Of these petitions several hundred were pending before the Board when the 1947 amendments to the Wagner Act were adopted by Congress. These cases were dismissed as a result of the 1947 amendments. It should be borne in mind also that the Supreme Court upheld the certification of units of supervisors for the first time on March 10, 1947 in the Packard case. Unionization of supervisors was given tremendous impetus by that decision, and undoubtedly if the 1947 amendment had not intervened, cases in this field which the Board would have been called upon to process would have run into the thousands. It is certainly obvious that if the 1947 amendments are repealed, this controversy will be put right back where it was in 1947 at the expense of labor peace, which is the real objective of management, labor and the public.

In order fully to appreciate the relative importance of supervisory employees to the bituminous coal mining industry, it is necessary to know something of coal mine operations and the duties and responsibilities of supervisory employees.

Generally speaking, coal mines fall into three classifications. In a strip mine the earth and rock lying on top of a seam of coal are removed by shovels and the coal extracted at the surface. In a shaft mine a vertical hole is driven down into the coal seam, and the coal mined by working outward from the bottom of the shaft. In a drift mine, sometimes also referred to as a slope mine, the mine entrance is in the side of a hill, and the coal is taken from the seam inside of the entrance in relatively the same way that it is extracted from around the base of a shaft. While there is no substantive difference in the nature of the duties and obligations of supervisory employees in the three types of coal-mining operations, the references which follow are generally to supervisory employees in shaft and drift mines.

With the exception of hoisting, the plan of operation in a shaft and drift mine is approximately the same. As coal is extracted from a mine the so-called working face or working place retreats, the direction of retreat being determined by what is deemed to be most economical and effective mining operations.

As the working face retreats, when coal is mined it must be taken to the outside or to the bottom of the shaft to be hoisted. For that transportation every mine requires a complete operating railroad system. It might be explained that there are some mines which use belt coal-conveying systems, but the large majority use rail transportation. The point where the actual mining is being carried on is referred to as a section, and a mine may have from one to a score or more of operating sections with many miles between the individual sections.

Each section can properly be referred to as a mine in itself for at each section there are encountered all of the problems inherent in mining and each must be supervised as a complete installation in itself.

Some indication of the size of a relatively large mine can be gained from the fact that it may have 50 miles of working track, and its equipment may consist of 50 electric locomotives and over 1,200 mine cars. The actual mining and high-speed transportation of coal to the surface is a highly specialized and complex operation, one in which the responsibilities of management are absolute and definite.

When development work goes forward, when the coal is undercut, when it is blasted, when it is loaded, when the timbering is done, when fresh air is supplied, and when the coal is transported to the surface, the responsibility of management follows.

Normally every sizable operating coal mine has many necessary adjuncts. The tipple, which is close to the mine mouth, prepares the coal for market by cleaning and sizing it. There may be a power plant for the generation of electric power; a woodworking plant and sawmill; a large blacksmith shop; and a modern machine shop; and, in special cases, a beehive coke plant.

To carry out the responsibilities inherent in such complex operations, management is represented by supervisory employees holding various titles. But whatever the title held by the employee, his duties in the management field are dictated by conditions and the nature of his responsibilities. In the paragraphs which follow I shall set forth the duties and responsibilities of these employees who exercise supervisory and managerial functions.

It can readily be seen that an operating coal mine is an institution of sizable proportion and is a place where the representatives of management cannot be in immediate and close contact with each other and with top-management levels. This is obviously true because of the isolation of their places of work. The conduct of a going mine absolutely necessitates the maintenance of a considerable number of men in the mine to represent the employer in all operating problems, including the preservation of life and health and the protection of property. Men who have charge of the operating facilities and on whose shoulders fall the burdens of management must, too, necessarily represent the employer, with full authority, in all the employer's relations with his employees.

It is now my purpose to present to you a rather detailed account of the responsibilities of supervisory employees who represent and act for management and ownership in the coal industry. As I have told you, the very nature of their duties is such that their authority must be instant and absolute for the mining of bituminous coal does not lend itself to on-the-spot round-table discussions by supervisory personnel. The supervisory employee in the coal industry, and as contemplated in the 1947 amendments to the labor law, has the managerial duty and responsibility to—

(1) Make sure that all ventilating apparatus, airways, etc., are properly constructed and maintained so as to direct fresh air to all the working faces;

(2) Direct and see that the roof of each working place is properly secured and that no person is permitted to work in unsafe places;

(3) Assume responsibilty for a sufficient supply of props and timber;

(4) See that coal is blasted in accordance with State laws;

(5) See that as the miners advance all dangerous roof is taken down or carefully secured and with authority to discharge anyone neglecting to carry out his instructions;

(6) Examine in his section all of the air courses and roads and all of the openings that give access to old workings or falls and make a record thereof;

(7) Visit each working place during each shift, which visit must be while the employees are at work;

(8) Pass upon the competency of persons he has placed to work in his section and truly see that such persons properly perform their work without endangering the lives of coemployees, and if an employee is not competent to perform the duties assigned to him, he must be assigned to work for which he is qualified, or discharged (here it will be seen that the real power of employment and assignment rests absolutely with the man in charge of the section of the mine);

(9) See that there is no accumulation of gas in his section—and if gas is present see that it is removed;

(10) Provide for proper drainage of the working places;

(11) Carefully supervise the approach of employees and active working places to abandoned sections;

(12) See that the fire bosses employed in his section have truly carried out their duties;

(13) See that all safety blocks, safety switches, and other appliances used to improve the safety of the mine are properly used and protected; and when his orders in this regard are ignored he may suspend or discharge offenders;

(14) Truly report at the end of each shift the general condition as to safety in all working places in his section.

Moreover, in most if not all States, supervisory employees are required to pass an examination, secure a certificate, and carry out the laws of the State and be responsible therefor. Also they now must be familiar with the Federal safety code and its application.

Under the wage agreements in force in the industry, the supervisor exercising managerial functions has duties and responsibilities as follows:

(1) He must check the loading of impurities and has complete charge of face preparation.

(2) He has charge of car distribution and is to see that each employee receives his fair share of cars.

(3) He supervises motormen when gathering loaded cars, their assembly into trips or trains and movement to the outside.

(4) He is authorized to make contracts providing the method and amount of payment for work not specifically covered by wage agreements. Decisions as to these contracts must ordinarily be made on the spot and the supervisor carries full responsibility of management.

(5) He represents the operator in the first step of the settlement of all grievances which an employee in his section may have. This is a contract provision and in such case he has full authority to bind the operator.

(6) He has authority to discharge any employee who absents himself from his work two days without permission.

In conclusion, with regard to the above-named duties, it may well be said that such supervisory personnel have full charge of the working forces in their sections. They direct all activities, enforce all rules, and take disciplinary action where necessary. I want, however, to call the committee's attention to the fact that in addition to the duties required by law and by wage agreements, supervisory personnel have many other duties which are performed as a representative of management. Such other duties vary from mine to mine depending upon local conditions and varying policies, including:

(1) Preparing original time record of hourly employees;

(2) Seeing that supplies are used efficiently;

(3) Recovering supplies and other equipment and material from abandoned or worked-out portions of the mine;

(4) Instructing employees as to their duties and responsibilities;

(5) Making of time studies;

(6) General supervision of all items of production cost;

(7) Supervision of all other matters in the section connected with the production of coal and application of the operator's policy.

From the above recitation it would seem to be apparent that it is impracticable, if not impossible, for the owners and operators of coal mines to carry out the many duties and obligations imposed on them by law, by the contractual obligations they have with the union, and by the financial laws of the States in which they are incorporated, if their direct representatives and the persons to whom they have delegated their obligations become a part of the collective bargaining unit of the employees.

It is emphasized that the magnitude, scope, and area covered and functions performed daily in a coal mine require the delegation of operator's responsibilities, duties, obligations, and powers to a sufficient number of men to carry out all of these immediately, as if the owner or operator himself were present to make each decision; that any restriction upon this right will impair efficiency of operations, break down safety rules and regulations, increase fatal and nonfatal accidents, and increase the cost of production of coal beyond proper obligations.

It is also emphasized that dependent upon the size of the mine, location of its production employees above and below ground, necessary auxiliary operations, the proper number of supervisory personnel to carry out the owner's or operator's policies as if he were present must be maintained in a position solely responsible to the owner or operator; and the judgment of such supervisory personnel must not be attacked and weakened by coercion, intimidation, direction or authoritative influence from any outside source or person, including any union, but their loyalty, duty, and fidelity within the law of the land must be solely to management.

On March 9, 1943, in his opening statement to the wage conference, Mr. John L. Lewis announced that he proposed to bargain for and include in the wage contract provisions dealing with the wages, hours, and working conditions of supervisory forces in the coal mines. He demanded that the contract contain a provision that "the term 'mine worker' as used in this agreement shall include all persons inside or outside the mine, except the superintendent."

This demand of the United Mine Workers of America, while not acceded to in the 1943 negotiations, precipitated an intense organizing struggle within the bituminous coal-mining industry. This intense campaign culminated in a general strike in the late summer and early autumn of 1945. Strikes over the supervisory organization issue in the latter part of 1945 caused the loss of approximately 20,000,000 tons of bituminous coal. Certainly if the 1947 amendments to the labor law had been in effect in 1945 this strike would have been averted.

In spite of the long and involved record pertaining to the issue of organization of supervisory employees, it is, when reduced to fundamentals, a relatively simple problem. As you gentlemen well realize, this matter was considered exhaustively in the preceding Congress, and I believe a most realistic treatment of the issue was determined. Actually, I wonder if this controversial issue could ever be resolved around a more realistic definition than the definition which appears in the present statute. It would seem that the definition in the present Act has worked to the benefit of labor as well as management. Certainly it has clarified the issue.

When two parties, labor and management, meet around or across the bargaining table they at that time represent conflicting interests. This principle was early recognized and effectuated in the Wagner Act and in interpretations thereof in the outlawing of so-called company unions. In the practical course of negotiating a wage agreement, as in the coal industry, the two parties meet and effectuate an understanding concerning wages, hours and working conditions. They do not, and cannot, assume to negotiate or legislate or control the manifold other problems and issues involved in the running of a major business. That duty and responsibility is reposed in the directors of the corporation and, by the policies so detemined, are executed by the officers and supervisors of the corporation who are responsible to the directors, not the wage negotiators. The line of responsibility flows through the directors, the officers, and down through the subordinate supervisory officials of the corporation.

Any person who in a substantial degree represents management of a business, including negotiation of the details of working arrangements within the mine, should and must be free from the activity of union membership; he must be free from union domination and control; and he must be free from obligation of obedience to union direction.

At this point your particular attention is invited to the obligation taken by new members of the United Mine Workers of America, which, of course, includes supervisory employees who join the union. The obligation is:

"I do sincerely promise, of my own free will, to abide by the laws of this union; to bear true allegiance to, and keep inviolate the principles of the United Mine Workers of America; never to discriminate against a fellow worker on account of creed, color, or nationality; to defend freedom of thought, whether expressed by tongue or pen, to defend on all occasions and to the extent of my ability the members of our organization.

"That I will assist all members of our organization to obtain the highest wages possible for their work; that I will not accept a brother's job who is idle for advancing the interests of the union or seeking better remuneration for his labor; and, as the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so. And I further promise to help and assist all brothers in adversity, and to have all mine workers join our union that we may all be able to enjoy the fruits of our labor; that I will never knowingly wrong a brother or see him wronged, if I can prevent it.

"To all this I pledge my honor to observe and keep as long as life remains, or until I am absolved by the United Mine Workers of America." [1]

An individual cannot serve two masters. In the conventional American business enterprise where everyone on the pay roll of the company is classed as either management or labor, it is absolutely necessary to distinguish between the two where there is an operative bargaining union. An examination of the above oath required of all union members leaves no room for doubt as to where the supervisory employees' first loyalty is pledged irrespective of fact or circumstances—the union.

[1] Authority: Taken from Constitution of the International Union, United Mine Workers of America, effective November 1, 1948, adopted at Cincinnati, Ohio, October 11, 1948.

In dealings with the employer, supervisory personnel will be either labor or management. Certainly to say that a supervisor could properly function as an agent of management in dealing with subordinate employees and at the same time be a union representative is just as absurd as to say that a lawyer could effectively represent both sides in a lawsuit.

Under the way our management and labor unions have come to operate, the allegiance of the individual must be on one side of the collective-bargaining table or the other. If this is not true, collective bargaining would be a mockery, since the parties could not be adequately represented, particularly in an industry like the bituminous coal-mining industry where the operations and working places are widely separated and involve as a general rule small working crews working independently in places far removed from other units and other management.

For those reasons it is essential that the independence of supervisors in the coal industry as representatives of management must be maintained all the way down the line. The people who make the contract in the bituminous coal mining industry do not conclude and resolve the bargaining process by any means. The contract itself is merely the guiding standard. Bargaining by and between management in the mines goes on daily and even hourly between the supervisors and the members of the union. It is manifest that the supervisors must at all times maintain complete loyalty to management, and they should not be in any union for collective bargaining purposes—to put them in this position is certainly putting them in a position of bargaining with themselves.

If there is a mining town containing 100 men working in a mine and 93 of them are members of the United Mine Workers of America and the remaining 7 supervisory employees are members of that union or any other union, is it not easy to see that the 7 supervisors would be under the complete domination of the union point of view? This would certainly be true if they were members of the same union as the production employees, and it would probably be true if they were members of a different union. Moreover, if they were members of a different union, the seven supervisory employees could effectively strike the mine, and all of the production workers, whether or not in sympathy with the striking supervisory employees, would be required by law to remain outside of the mine; and the production workers thus prevented from work would probably be termed unemployed for purposes of unemployment compensation acts with resultant serious economic consequences to the company, to themselves, and to the public.

H. R. 2032 SHOULD BE AMENDED TO EMPOWER THE GOVERNMENT TO ENJOIN NATIONAL EMERGENCY STRIKES

It is submitted that the record made before this committee, the record compiled in the executive branch of the Government and in the courts, added to the conflicting statements of authorities on the subject, compel a conclusion by this committee that it should recommend retention of the national-emergencies sections of the present law.

So far as I have noticed, no responsible official of the Government has expressed the opinion that the Federal Government should be without the authority specifically spelled out in sections 206 through 210 of title II of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947. The only difference of opinion appears to be whether it is necessary to have the specific language in the statute. I strongly support the view that it is necessary to have the authority spelled out in the statute. I am sure, however, that any reasonable man would concede that whether or not it is necessary, it is highly desirable. The executive branch of the Government should not be put in the position of doubt as to its power to protect the national health and safety.

I am very quick to concede, of course, that the powers of the executive branch to deal with national emergencies are very great, as at least one of our leading law authorities has stated. But any lawyer and any citizen must realize that the power of the executive branch of the Government under our Constitution to deal with any situation is, at least to a certain extent, abridged by intervening action of Congress. The right of the Federal Government, without specific congressional authority, to proceed in the courts in a national-emergency labor strike would not be so clouded if there had not been intervening acts of Congress. Congress, having placed certain limitations on the courts in dealing with labor disputes, must now, in my judgment, in order to protect the national health and safety either (1) withdraw all of the limitations heretofore placed on the courts in this field, or (2) specifically define the various powers and authorities within the statutory framework.

We are not today advocating, and the committee is not considering, a proposal to remove all of the special statutory rights bestowed upon labor by acts of Congress. It therefore follows that the Congress and this committee, if they are to discharge their responsibilities to a great majority of the citizens of this Nation, must protect and spell out the right of the executive branch to act in national emergencies growing out of labor disputes.

The meaning and effect of the national-emergencies section of the Labor-Management Relations Act are nowhere set forth more succinctly or in more meaningful fashion, indicating not only the present purpose of the law but also indicating what the situation would be without the 1947 amendments, than in the following statement taken from the brief filed last year in the United States Court of Appeals for the District of Columbia Circuit in the case brought by the Government against John L. Lewis and the United Mine Workers of America as a result of the 1948 strike in the bituminous coal mines:

"The setting of the national-emergencies provisions of this act is expressly cast in those situations where a strike will 'imperil the national health or safety.' Even in the absence of legislative authorization, courts of equity have the power to issue injunctions under such circumstances. (In re Debs, 158 U. S. 564 (1895)). In enacting this statute, Congress has in effect done no more than reinstate the basic principle of the Debs case, freed from intervening legislative limitations and restrictions." [Italics supplied.]

Is it not significant that the United States Government would, faced with a serious and realistic application of the 1947 amendment, so clearly indicate the true meaning and impact of the statute? Your particular attention is invited to the part of the quotation which I have italicized, reading "freed from intervening legislative limitations and restrictions." This quotation from the Government's own brief clearly points out what is so obviously true—that Congress was merely removing part of the immunity which it had previously bestowed upon labor unions.

We see much in the press and elsewhere to the effect that the national-emergencies sections of the statute reimpose labor law by injunction. Even slight reflection on the factual situation will indicate that this is not so. Under the national-emergencies sections of the present law, it should be ever kept in mind that the injunctive process is available not to any corporation, employer, or civilian, but only to the Attorney General of the United States, and he may proceed only at the direction of the President of the United States.

If ever there were a section of law enacted with due safeguards to all that would be affected by its application, the national-emergencies section of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 is such a section. The United States Government in filing its brief in the Court of Appeals in the 1948 bituminous-coal strike cases referred to above explains the injunctive section of the law as follows:

"Section 208 of the act provides that the Attorney General shall petition for an injunction only upon being directed to do so by the President. The President in turn may determine to give such direction only after convening a board of inquiry in a situation in which in his opinion a threatened or actual work stoppage affecting at least a substantial part of an entire industry engaged in interstate commerce will, if permitted to occur or to continue, imperil the national health or safety. Section 208 further provides that injunctive relief shall be granted only if the court finds that the threatened or actual strike or lock-out '(i) affects an entire industry or a substantial part thereof engaged in trade, commerce, transportation, transmission, or communication among the several States or with foreign nations, or engaged in the production of goods for commerce; and (ii) if permitted to occur or to continue, will imperil the national health or safety'."

In the next paragraph in its brief the United States Government states with reference to section 208:

"The provisions of law are clearly worded, serve an essential purpose * * * are reasonable in nature."

Certainly I am not one to quarrel with the Attorney General and his able assistants in this observation. Nor do I see how any lawyer, or any citizen, can in good logic and good conscience quarrel with the Government's statement. I am merely agreeing with President Truman and his lawyers that the national-emergencies sections of the present law "serve an essential purpose" and "are reasonable in nature." If that is the opinion of the executive branch of the United States Government under fire in an actual case, I do not see any reason in this world why this committee or any Congressman could ever be convinced that he should recommend repeal of this section of the law.

The fact that it is the Government itself which, after elaborate preliminary and safeguarding steps, seeks the injunction, should be sufficient to allay any feeling that the power will be abused. In this regard it is significant to note that no labor leader and no Government official has come before this committee and said that the Government has abused its power under the statute. The reason that no one has ever expressed any such fear is obviously because no one has or could have any fear that such would be the case.

Attached to this statement as exhibit A is a table showing the major strikes in the bituminous coal mines since 1935. One purpose of exhibit A is to show that since the industry has been so completely unionized, major paralyzing strikes take place frequently. Another purpose in including exhibit A with my statement is to demonstrate that the 1947 amendments to the labor law have not unduly impinged upon the economic weapon of the strike available to labor unions, even in a Nation-wide shut-down, since it will be noted from the exhibit that the Nation-wide strike in the bituminous coal industry in 1948 lasted for 40 days before it was terminated as a result of the injunction which was issued on petition of the Attorney General acting at the direction of the President of the United States.

[1] Terminated by seizure of coal mines by U. S. Government.
[2] Terminated by Government injunction.

Mr. HALEY. In my statement, I shall deal only with the three matters which are of the most special importance to the bituminous coal mining industry and to the best interests of the Nation.

We feel H. R. 2032 should be amended by (1) adding thereto a revised section 302 (c) (5), title III, of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, so as to remove the subject of welfare funds from the field of required collective bargaining, (2) adding thereto sections 2 (11) and 14 (a), title I, of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947 with respect to the union status of supervisory employees, and (3) adding thereto sections 206, 207, 208, 209 and 210, title II, of the Labor-Management Relations Act of 1947, with respect to injunctive powers of the Government in national emergencies.

I shall deal first with my suggestion that the present labor act, the Taft-Hartley Act, be amended by repealing the section dealing with central union welfare funds and substituting in lieu thereof a simple provision to the effect that the central union welfare funds shall not be subject to required collective bargaining under the law. I might say in passing that I believe a somewhat similar position, at least in part, was taken by the United Mine Workers before the Senate committee.

It is noted that the bill being considered by the committee would repeal the provisions of the 1947 amending act concerning payments into union welfare funds. We believe this subject is of such magnitude and importance as to warrant further very serious study by your committee with a view to recommending that Congress enact legislation which would be an improvement over the 1947 amendments.

I should just like to call the attention of the committee and the Congress to the fact that since June 1, 1946, the bituminous coal mine operators have paid into the so-called welfare and retirement fund over $150,000,000. Currently the coal-mine operators are paying into this fund more than one-quarter of a million dollars per day. Expressed another way, the coal industry is paying into the fund approximately $1.30 per man per day worked. It should be kept in mind that this $1.30 per man per day worked which employers in the bituminous coal mining industry are today required to pay into the welfare and retirement fund is in addition to contributions which employers in the bituminous coal mining industry must pay into the Federal social-security fund.

The problem before Congress, of course, is coordinating such matters with the over-all social-security program. There are hearings going on now before the Ways and Means Committee looking to liberalization of social-security payment and also toward extending greatly the coverage of the act.

I strongly urge that your committee give most serious consideration to this whole problem and that you recommend, and work for, amendment of the law to make it clear that discussion of such funds is not within the field of required collective bargaining. Of course, if this matter extends into other industries and all industries are required to pay something approximating $1.30 per employee per day worked, it would be a very serious matter from the standpoint of the national economy, and would tend, of course, to set up a special class of beneficiaries under our broad concept of social security.

It should be remembered that the benefits under this are available only to union members, and certainly if private funds of this nature and magnitude are permitted to thrive, it will, perforce, bear unduly on the Federal social-security program.

Perhaps the most salutary portion of the Labor-Management Relations Act from the standpoint of business, the coal-mining industry and from the standpoint of the Nation and the part of the act for which we today most strongly implore retention, is sections 2 (11) and 14 (a) of title I, dealing with the union status of supervisory employees. The importance of this section of the statute, while indicated in all industry and in many other specific industries, is no doubt nowhere so strongly emphasized as in the bituminous coal mining industry. While the coal industry has been the industry in which this problem has risen to most severe proportions, it could and no doubt would in time assume equally serious importance in other particular industries and in industry in general, unless adequate statutory safeguards are present.

The importance of the provisions dealing with union status of supervisory employees is emphasized by the fact that prior to enactment of the 1947 amendments there had been for a number of years almost continual strife, controversy, and strikes with resultant impairment of the national economy as a result of issues growing out of attempts or would-be attempts to organize supervisory employees in the coal industry. On the other hand, as the record will show, upon enactment of the amendments in 1947 it was possible amicably to settle this serious controversy to the benefit of all concerned—the public generally, the bituminous coal mining industry, the supervisory personnel, and the production employees in the mines.

I would like to skip over now. I have dealt quite extensively in my statement with the problem of union status of supervisory employees, and I hope before the union acts definitely on this important problem, it will give serious thought to the problems which I suggest and which I shall deal with in my statement. I have outlined in my statement at some length the nature of the coal mines themselves and the nature and extent of the duties performed by the supervisory personnel on behalf of management.

It is emphasized that the magnitude, scope, and area covered and functions performed daily in a coal mine require the delegation of operator's responsibilities, duties, obligations, and powers to a sufficient number of men to carry out all of these immediately, as if the owner or operator himself were present to make each decision; that any restriction upon this right will impair efficiency of operations, break down safety rules and regulations, increase fatal and nonfatal accidents, and increase the cost of production of coal beyond proper obligations.

It is also emphasized that dependent upon the size of the mine, location of its production employees above and below ground, necessary auxiliary operations, the proper number of supervisory personnel to carry out the owner's or operator's policies as if he were present must be maintained in a position solely responsible to the owner or operator; and the judgment of such supervisory personnel must not be attacked and weakened by coercion, intimidation, direction or authoritative influence from any outside source or person, including any union, but their loyalty, duty, and fidelity within the law of the land must be solely to management.

On March 9, 1943, in his opening statement to the wage conference, Mr. John L. Lewis announced that he proposed to bargain for and include in the wage contract provisions dealing with the wages, hours, and working conditions of supervisory forces in the coal mines. He demanded that the contract contain a provision that "the term 'mine worker' as used in this agreement shall include all persons inside or outside of the mine, except the superintendent."

This demand of the United Mine Workers of America, while not acceded to in the 1943 negotiations, precipitated an intense organizing struggle within the bituminous coal mining industry. This intense campaign culminated in a general strike in the late summer and early autumn of 1945. Strikes over the supervisory organization issue in the latter part of 1945 caused the loss of approximately 20,000,000 tons of bituminous coal. Certainly if the 1947 amendments to the labor law had been in effect in 1945 this strike would have been averted.

In spite of the long and involved record pertaining to the issue of organization of supervisory employees, it is, when reduced to fundamentals, a relatively simple problem. As you gentlemen well realize, this matter was considered exhaustively in the preceding Congress, and I believe a most realistic treatment of the issue was determined.

When two parties, labor and management, meet around or across the bargaining table, they at that time represent conflicting interests. This principle was early recognized and effectuated in the Wagner Act and in interpretations thereon in the outlawing of so-called company unions. In the practical course of negotiating a wage agreement as in the coal industry, the two parties meet and effectuate an understanding concerning wages, hours, and working conditions. They do not, and cannot, assume to negotiate or legislate or control the manifold other problems and issues involved in the running of a major business. That duty and responsibility is reposed in the directors of the corporation and, by the policies so determined, are executed by the officers and supervisors of the corporation who are responsible to the directors, not the wage negotiators. The line of responsibility flows through the directors, the officers, and down through the subordinate supervisory officials of the corporation.

This is the conclusion we reached and the matter which we strongly urge upon the committee.

Any person who in a substantial degree represents management of a business, including negotiation of the details of working arrangements within the mine, should and must be free from the activity of union membership; he must be free from union domination and control; and he must be free from obligation of obedience to union direction.

At this point your particular attention is invited to the obligation taken by new members of the United Mine Workers of America, which, of course, includes supervisory employees who join the union.

I should like to read here the obligation:

> I do sincerely promise, of my own free will, to abide by the laws of this union; to bear true allegiance to, and keep inviolate the principles of the United Mine Workers of America; never to discriminate against a fellow worker on account of creed, color, or nationality; to defend freedom of thought, whether expressed by tongue or pen, to defend on all occasions and to the extent of my ability the members of our organization.
> That I will assist all members of our organization to obtain the highest wages possible for their work; that I will not accept a brother's job who is idle for advancing the interests of the union or seeking better remuneration for his labor; and, as the mine workers of the entire country are competitors in the labor world, I promise to cease work at any time I am called upon by the organization to do so. And I further promise to help and assist all brothers in adversity, and to have all mine workers join our union that we may all be able to enjoy the fruits of our labor; that I will never knowingly wrong a brother or see him wronged, if I can prevent it.
> To all this I pledge my honor to observe and keep as long as life remains, or until I am absolved by the United Mine Workers of America.

Certainly an individual cannot serve two masters. In the conventional American business enterprise where everyone on the pay roll of the company is classed as either management or labor, it is absolutely necessary to distinguish between the two where there is an operative bargaining union. An examination of the above oath required of all union members leaves no room for doubt as to where the supervisory employee's first loyalty is pledged irrespective of fact or circumstance—the union.

If there is a mining town containing 100 men working in a mine and 93 of them are members of the United Mine Workers and the remaining seven supervisory employees are members of that union or any other union, is it not easy to see that the seven supervisors would be under the complete domination of the union point of view? This would certainly be true if they were members of the same union as the production employees, and it would probably be true if they were members of a different union. Moreover, if they were members of a different union, the seven supervisory employees could effectively strike the mine, and all of the production workers, whether or not in sympathy with the striking supervisory employees, would be required by law to remain outside of the mine; and the production workers thus prevented from work would probably be termed unemployed for purposes of unemployment compensation acts with resultant serious economic consequences to the company, to themselves, and to the public.

Mr. Chairman and members of the committee, that completes my statement with respect to the union status of supervisory employees. The third subject in which we express keen interest, that of the power of the Government in national emergencies, I have dealt with at some length in my statement, and do not propose to repeat it here orally unless you should like me to do so.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Moody, you may proceed with your statement.

Mr. MOODY. Thank you, sir.

TESTIMONY OF JOSEPH E. MOODY, PRESIDENT, SOUTHERN COAL PRODUCERS' ASSOCIATION

Mr. MOODY. I would like to say, gentlemen, that we would concur in what Mr. Haley has said, and you will find in my statement, we do not duplicate the comments and the treatment that Mr. Haley has given in his. The main difference in the two associations is, of course, that the Southern Coal Producers' Association is primarily an association for labor relations work. The National Coal Association, of course, has a great many facets to its activities.

My name is Joseph E. Moody, and I am president of the Southern Coal Producers' Association, a position I have occupied since November 1947.

The association, created in 1941, is incorporated under the laws of West Virginia, and is composed of district associations organized on a regional basis and of individual coal companies which belong to the Southern Coal Producers' Association.

One of the principal functions and purposes of the association is to represent the bituminous-coal operators affiliated with it, either directly or by means of a regional association, for the purposes of collective bargaining. Such operators, engaged in the production of coal in Kentucky, West Virginia, Virginia, and Tennessee—produced approximately 139,975,000 tons of coal in 1948—an amount equaling about 32½ percent of the tonnage represented in the last contract negotiations. That conference resulted in a contract with the United Mine Workers of America for the greatest increase in wages ever received at any one time by the union and 100-percent increase in the contribution to the welfare fund. The successful conclusion of the conference was made possible only through certain safeguards in the Taft-Hartley law.

The coal industry faces the prospect of new negotiations soon with the United Mine Workers of America and its president, because the current agreement will expire next June 30. We feel that unless the safeguards in the Taft-Hartley law are incorporated in the administration bill and again become law, which enabled us to reach a contract in 1948, the country will again face a crisis in coal.

It is gratifying to have this opportunity to present information to the committee concerning actual experience under the Taft-Hartley Act.

I am not a lawyer and I am not qualified to discuss legal technicalities, but I have spent the last 20 years in industrial relations work in the front lines, and 20 years goes back before, well, before almost all of the present legislation concerning that most important field of activity in our great American industrial organization. Our success or failure in this effort to write a fair, equitable Labor-Management Relations Act can mean a prosperous economy for the country or confusion, hardship and strife that may eventually wreck our private-enterprise system, which is responsible for the present standing of our Nation as a leader among nations and the chief support of some of them.

I will now present to the committee not generalities, but a specific case, the conditions creating it and its solution and possible future as it was affected by action under the Taft-Hartley Act. This case bears directly on section 8 (b) and subsections (1) (B) and (3) of the act, which reads:

> (b) It shall be an unfair labor practice for a labor organization or its agents (1) to restrain or coerce * * * (B) an employer in the selection of his representatives for the purposes of collective bargaining or the adjustment of grievances; * * * (3) to refuse to bargain collectively with an employer, provided it is the representative of his employees—and section 10 (j):

> The Board shall have power upon the issuance of a complaint as provided in subsection (b) charging that any person has engaged in or is engaging in an unfair labor practice; to petition any district court of the United States (including the District Court of the United States for the District of Columbia), for such temporary relief or restraining order as it deems just and proper.

We believe such provisions should be incorporated in the labor bill which this committee is considering.

The basic issues involved in the case stemmed from an attempt by the union to compel employers affiliated with the Southern Coal Producers' Association to cease dealing through the association, an effort which continued over a period of time and culminated in a threatened shutdown of the bituminous coal industry in the spring of 1948.

It must be noted that for some years following the creation of the Southern Coal Producers' Association in 1941, the United Mine Workers of America recognized the association as bargaining representative for its members and affiliates and contracted with it in that capacity. Thus, the association participated, with representatives of other groups of the bituminous coal industry, in negotiating the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement of 1945.

The association also was party to the bargaining conferences held in 1946 which attempted to write a contract to succeed the 1945 agreement. Those negotiations deadlocked and in May 1946, to avert a work stoppage, the United States Government took possession of the bituminous-coal mines pursuant to the War Labor Disputes Act.

In May 1947, when termination of the Government seizure was approaching, Southern Coal Producers' Association sought a conference with the union for the purpose of negotiating a collective-bargaining contract for its members. The union recognized the association in that capacity and agreed to meet for that purpose. A few meetings were held and the conference was ended without a contract when the representatives of the United Mine Workers of America failed to appear for a scheduled meeting.

From that time until the middle of 1948, when the union was compelled to deal with the association by means of proceedings under the Taft-Hartley Act, the United Mine Workers of America refused to allow the association to act for its members, despite the repeated efforts of the members to secure representation through the association.

The first major union effort to compel them to drop the association as their collective-bargaining representative occurred in connection with the National Bituminous Coal Wage Agreement of 1947.

The terms and conditions of that contract were reached by means of negotiations between the United Mine Workers of America and representatives of a portion of the bituminous coal industry. In July 1947, it was adopted and executed by the remainder of the industry.

At that time Southern Coal Producers' Association was authorized by its affiliates and members to execute the contract on their behalf. In addition, the membership directed the association to attempt to secure from the union a modification of the union-shop provision contained in the contract so far as it would affect mines located in Virginia and Tennessee. This latter action was taken because the laws of those States outlaw union-shop contracts.

A conference was secured with the president of the United Mine Workers of America, at which he refused to deal with the Southern Coal Producers' Association. He insisted that its members and other operators affiliated with it would have to sign the contract individually. He refused to negotiate regarding any change in the contract to make it conform to pertinent State laws and insisted that the operators would have to sign the contract without any change whatsoever. It was made quite clear that the members of the Southern Coal Producers' Association were faced with the alternative of signing the contract individually or having their mines shut down by a work stoppage.

To avoid the threatened interruption of bituminous-coal production in the large southern segment of the industry, it was determined at a meeting of the association to comply with the union's ultimatum and the association members were authorized to sign the 1947 contract individually.

On August 22, 1947, the Taft-Hartley Act became effective, as amended. The act provides, as I outlined in the beginning of this presentation, in section 8 (b) (1) (B), that it shall be an unfair-labor practice for any union to coerce or restrain employers in the selection of their representatives for the purpose of collective bargaining, and in section 8 (b) (3) it is provided that it shall be an unfair labor practice for a qualified union to refuse to bargain with employers' representatives.

In addition, section 8 (d) of the amended statute defines collective bargaining to include the obligation to meet and confer in good faith regarding any questions arising under an existing collective-bargaining contract.

After the Taft-Hartley Act became fully operative the members of the Southern Coal Producers' Association reaffirmed the association as their collective-bargaining representative and notified the United Mine Workers of America that the association would continue to act for them in that capacity.

On March 15, 1948, as a result of a controversy between the trustees of the welfare and retirement fund, established under the National Bituminous Wage Agreement of 1947, a strike took place throughout the industry. As president of the Southern Coal Producers' Association, and chief negotiator for it, I joined with the representatives of other groups of operators and we addressed a letter to the president of the United Mine Workers of America in which we requested a return to work and offered thereupon to negotiate any dispute which might exist regarding the terms and provisions of the contract. No such meeting could be effectuated.

The Director of the Federal Mediation and Conciliation Service attempted to compose the controversy by means of a conference in which I participated as representative of the Southern Coal Producers' Association. Such meetings were equally fruitless.

On March 23, 1948, the President of the United States invoked the National Emergency provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act and established a Board of Inquiry. That Board reported on the last day of that month and on April 3, 1948—the strike still existing—the Attorney General of the United States secured from the Federal district court a temporary restraining order directing a termination of the strike and commanding the union and the operators to proceed immediately to bargain collectively with regard to the dispute existing between them.

Although it is a disgression from the main theme of this statement, it may be noted that the United Mine Workers of America and its president, subsequently were found in contempt of the court's injunction because of failure to terminate the strike, which was ended about April 23, 1948, at the time heavy fines were imposed on the union and its president, as a result of the contempt proceedings.

To resume the main theme, on April 7, 8, and 9, 1948, meetings between representatives of the various groups of bituminous coal operators party to the 1947 contract and the union were held in Washington, D. C., for the purpose of the negotiations directed by the court. Being duly authorized, I attended such meetings on behalf of the Southern Coal Producers' Association, to represent its members and affiliates.

The representatives of the United Mine Workers of America adamantly refused to permit the association to act for its members as their collective-bargaining representative or to participate in any way in the conference. Accordingly, on April 9, we filed a charge with the National Labor Relations Board charging the union and its president with unlawfully refusing to bargain and with unlawfully attempting to coerce and restrain the members of the association in the selection of their bargaining representative.

It is interesting to note that at that time we were under the order from the district court and the same injunction as the miners of southern coal named, and even under this circumstances the miners refused to recognize us.

On April 30, 1948, while that charge was pending before the National Labor Relations Board, the president of the United Mine Workers of America by letter, notified the signatories to the National Bituminius Coal Wage Agreement of 1947 that a conference would convene on May 18, 1948, to negotiate a contract to succeed that one. On the same day, as president of the Southern Coal Producers' Association, I transmitted two letters to the president of the Southern Coal Producers' Association, I transmitted two letters to the president of the union requesting a conference to negotiate a new collective-bargaining contract between the union and the operators represented by the association. Those letters were not answered.

At this point I again want to digress and mention that the letters of April 30, 1948, to which I have referred, were filed in compliance with section 8 (d) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, which requires that when the parties to a collective-bargaining agreement want to terminate or change it, they shall give the other party 60 days' notice so that a period of negotiation without interruption of production may ensue. I mention this point here because of the important role that the 60-day no strike period played in avoiding a work stoppage in the industry.

On May 18, 1948, the conference called by the union notice was convened and called to order. In accordance with past procedure at such national bituminous coal conferences, a committee on rules and procedure and a committee on credentials were selected. Representatives of the union on the credentials committee refused to accept my credentials authorizing me as president of the Southern Coal Producers' Association to bargain for its members and some nonmember companies which had authorized it, although at no time did the union challenge the authority of such credentials. The union representative maintained a flat position that the union would not deal with the association.

Accordingly, the credentials committee could not agree upon a report designating accredited representatives to participate in the conference. The union members of the committee submitted a partial report moving that all representatives except the Southern Coal Producers' Association be accredited and that the conference proceed on that basis. An operator representative on the committee then moved to amend that motion to accredit and accept the Southern Coal Producers' Association as a participant in the conference.

The day following the submission of those motions they were put to a vote and both were defeated. Thereupon, the president of the union declared that the conference could not proceed and was at an end, and the representatives of the union left.

That afternoon, May 19, 1948, we filed a supplemental charge with the National Labor Relations Board reciting the events which had taken place between April 9, 1948, and that date, and again charging the union and its president with refusal to bargain and an attempt to coerce the members of the Southern Coal Producers' Association in the selection of their bargaining representative.

On May 24, 1948, the Board issued a complaint against the union and its president, alleging such violations of the statute, and the Board's regional director, acting pursuant to section 10 (j) of the law, petitioned the United States District Court for the District of Columbia for a preliminary injunction against the violations pending final disposition of the Board's case.

On June 4, 1948, after hearing had been held on a rule to show cause issued in response to that petition, the court rendered its decision. Mr. Justice Goldsborough found that there was reasonable cause to believe that the violations were occurring and that—

> There is imminent danger and great likelihood, from the past conduct of respondents and from the history of collective-bargaining negotiations in the bituminous-coal industry that as a result of respondents' refusal to bargain collectively as aforesaid a new agreement for the bituminous coal industry or the substantial part thereof represented by association will not be negotiated by June 30, 1948, when the present agreement expires. It is reasonable to anticipate from custom and practice of the employees in the coal industry in the past that the coal miners represented by respondents will engage in a stoppage of work and that operations in the mines in which they are employed will therefore cease, on or after June 30, 1948, if no new agreement is negotiated between their employers and respondents, to succeed the agreement expiring June 30, 1948. Such cessation of production of coal not only will result in substantial and irreparable damage to the coal producers affected but may necessitate the closing or curtailment of transportation, public utilities, and other services essential to the public health and welfare, and seriously impede the free flow of commerce among the several States and with foreign countries, thereby causing immediate, substantial, and irreparable injury to the Nation.

Accordingly, the court ordered the union and its president to bargain collectively with the Southern Coal Producers' Association as the representative of the employers who had authorized it to act for them and to permit the Southern Coal Producers' Association in that capacity to participate at any meeting or conference with other employers or their representatives for the purpose of making a collective-bargaining agreement with the union.

Immediately after the court issued the order, the union offered to meet with the representatives of the bituminous coal operators, including the Southern Coal Producers' Association; negotiations then proceeded and on June 25, 1948, a contract was executed with the union, to which Southern Coal Producers' Association is a party on behalf of its members.

You will note that as a result of the proceedings a contract was consummated within the 60-day period following April 30, 1948, and no working stoppage occurred because of the dispute between the Southern Coal Producers' Association and the union regarding the right of the former to speak for its membership.

To conclude the history, as a result of meetings between the attorneys for the association and the union, the case pending before the National Labor Relations Board was settled without any hearing and Board decision. The Board dismissed the complaint because the attorney for the union and its president, acting as their agent, addressed a letter to the Board stating that the union and its president will continue to deal with Southern Coal Producers' Association as the authorized bargaining agent for its members and affiliated operators with respect to matters arising under the contract signed on June 25, 1948, and including matters relating to any extension, renewal, or modification thereof, and the negotiation of any contract to succeed that one.

As I stated earlier in my presentation, I am not an attorney and I cannot discuss the legal niceties of the situation. However, it seems to me that there are several things which are indisputably clear from the history of this case.

First. Only the statutory requirements, compelling the United Mine Workers of America to bargain collectively and prohibiting the union from coercing employers in the selection of the bargaining representative enabled the membership of Southern Coal Producers' Association to choose their representative without any outside influence.

Second. If it had not been for the availability of injunction under section 10 (j) of the Labor-Management Relations Act, 1947, there would have been no mechanism by which the union and its president could have been compelled, short of a proceeding under the national emergency sections of the above act, to accord Southern Coal Producers' Association bargaining status until final disposition of the case before the Board. It is a matter of record by Mr. Herzog before the Committee on Labor and Public Welfare of the Senate, that such cases rarely are disposed of within 1 year and thus the administrative proceedings alone would have been completely ineffective to avert a work stoppage. I need not remind the members of this committee that the United Mine Workers of America has an almost inflexible policy of "No contract, no work."

Third. It should be noted that the injunction issued by the Federal district court in no way directed the union or its president to accept or refrain from demanding any particular wages, hours or other terms or conditions of employment. The injunction merely compelled the union and its president, to sit across the bargaining table from the representative whom the members of the Southern Coal Producers' Association wanted to speak to them and to deal in good faith with that representative.

It seems fundamental to us that if collective bargaining is to work, and our national labor policy is premised on collective bargaining, the parties sitting on each side of the bargaining table must be free to choose their representative and must be under an obligation to deal in good faith with the representative selected by the fellow on the other side of the table. When either party to a bargaining relationship is free not to bargain or is free to bargain only with a person he designates, the system of collective bargaining cannot successfully operate.

It is noteworthy from the case I have related that in the span of approximately 1 year the provisions of the Taft-Hartley Act were effectively utilized to avoid one and stop another work stoppage in one of the basic industries of the country.

The bill which has been submitted to this committee, would eliminate from the Labor-Management Relations Act the union obligation to bargain collectively, would strike out the prohibition against a union restraining or coercing employers in the selection of their representative and would delete section 10 (j) permitting the National Labor Relations Board prompt recourse to the courts in order to avoid disastrous consequences which might flow from unfair labor practices. In short the bill which has been presented to the committee would eliminate all of the provisions which enabled the membership of Southern Coal Producers' Association to negotiate the contract now in effect between them and the union.

The great union organizations of this country have now reached maturity and to quote Mr. William M. Leiserson in the February 6 edition of the New York Times:

> The Wagner Act became law when labor was generally the weaker party, and its success in increasing labor's bargaining power has been spectacular. Sixteen million workers are now in organizations capable of bargaining on an equality with employers, and collective agreements govern labor relations in all the major industries of the country. This makes many employers feel abused, and in some instances their feeling is justified; some of them are now the weaker party.
> The remedy, however, is not to weaken unionism but rather to strengthen the bargaining power of employers in the same way that the Wagner Act did for the employees; namely, by subjecting unions to the same bargaining responsibilities that the law imposes on managements.

It is our firm belief that the Taft-Hartley Act has worked exceptionally well, much better than even its friends had hoped and far better than its enemies had predicted. It has hurt no one—even the labor leaders who cry the loudest and have a hard time pointing to any damage to their operations during its very short span of life. We do not take the position that the Taft-Hartley Act is perfect and we agree that as experience demonstrates the need for changes, they should be adopted, whether this means omission of things now in the law or strengthening of the law by added provisions.

Although our testimony goes largely to the facts involved in the case which I have outlined to you and the need for retaining the sections of the Taft-Hartley Act involved in that case, we would not wish to give the impression that we think other provisions of the act are not of great importance.

We believe experience to date indicates that the requirements for the holding of elections in union shop cases and on the last offer of employers in national emergency cases serves no useful purpose and that it should be eliminated. We also feel that the conciliation and mediation functions might well be continued at all stages of a labor dispute, and our experience indicates strongly that employers will have more confidence in the Conciliation Service, if the provision for its independent status is continued.

We are particularly interested in the preservation of the provisions of the present law with respect to supervisory personnel. We also feel from our own experience that the separation of functions between the general counsel and the Board is an important feature of the Act and should be retained. We further feel that, as already indicated, the provisions under which the General Counsel may, in proper cases, secure injunctive relief, are vital in the effective administration of any law. If these provisions were eliminated it would do employers situated as we were, little good to be told that some time, perhaps many, many months away, the Board might agree with our contentions as to the law. This would be merely closing the barn after the horse was stolen. In our judgment, rights are no good unless the law also provides adequate remedies.

It may not be Southern Coal Producers' Association the next time but the power will be there to use, whoever it may be. In the past, the usual course of events were, a demand, end of the contract, a strike, and then Government seizure. During the period 1939 to 1947 there were 13 major industry-wide strikes in the coal industry, varying in length from a few days to 6 weeks. During most of these times of strife, the supply of coal available for use was so limited that the economy of the country was seriously affected in a very short time. Since the Taft-

Hartley Act has been in effect, there has been but one strike. I will have to amend that. This was written the day before yesterday, and so what happened yesterday is subsequent to the writing of it. Today the country has the best supply of coal on hand in over 10 years, not enough for 100 days, as has been reported, but certainly enough for 40 or 50 days in the basic industries of power, light, and steel, as well as for domestic use.

During the period 1943 to 1947 the Government had to seize the mines four times and some were seized during the strike concerning the controversy over the organization of supervisors for the fifth time. In that period of years, the Government had to operate the mines 865 days, or over half of the time.

It would seem reasonable to conclude that far from having the Taft-Hartley Act precipitate this industry into confusion, it has established, for the first time in many years, an orderly procedure to encourage and develop collective bargaining.

If I can give the committee any further information with respect to any provisions of the act with which we have had experience, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Moody, I take it that you have had quite a long experience in the coal business.

Mr. MOODY. Not in the coal business, no. I very carefully said that my experience in the coal business dated from November 1947, sir, but I have been in other industries.

Mr. KELLEY. You would not remember the conditions that prevailed before the United Mine Workers organized the southern fields, would you?

Mr. MOODY. I was not there, sir. I have no first-hand knowledge.

Mr. KELLEY. I mean, the condition of the miners or even the condition of any of the companies, financially. Do you think the organization, the United Mine Workers, has aided in and assisted in the improvement of the mine workers in the few years?

Mr. MOODY. I do not question that.

Mr. KELLEY. You do not know that?

Mr. MOODY. No. I agreed with you.

Mr. KELLEY. It has done some good, then?

Mr. MOODY. Oh, yes. I did not say anything in my report against the United Mine Workers at all.

Mr. KELLEY. For years, the Southern Coal Producers' Association was a member of the Appalachian Association, was it not?

Mr. MOODY. I think there was an Appalachian Association.

Mr. KELLEY. The agreement of the United Mine Workers was made by the Appalachian, of which the southern and northern coal producers and one or two others—I have forgotten which—were signatories to that contract.

Mr. MOODY. Over the years, there have been various combinations. The Indiana and Illinois were separate, and then the Illinois and Ohio were separate. And then there was the combination of the Appalachian group which took in part of our association. There were several combinations.

Mr. KELLEY. For several years, I know, the Appalachian Coal Association made the contract with the United Mine Workers of America, and the southern coal producers and the northern coal producers were signatories to that contract.

Mr. MOODY. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. Now, I would like to know this. Why did the southern coal producers insist upon breaking away from that? Was it due to the fact that they did not like industry-wide bargaining? The northern coal operators did not have the same difficulty that you did.

Mr. MOODY. I, of course, cannot answer that specifically. I was not in my present position at that time. I have heard considerable discussion of the circumstances at one time or another.

Mr. KELLEY. My recollection is that that——

Mr. MOODY. But I think that it may very well be, as Justice Goldsborough put it in his decision, that maybe the southern operators were a little harder bargainers than some other sections of the industry, but even being harder bargainers did not make them improper for bargaining purposes. I am only offering his comment after hearing both sides of the controversy.

Mr. KELLEY. I think one of the matters in controversy was a differential.

Mr. MOODY. I think that was so; yes.

Mr. KELLEY. A differential in wages between the northern operators and the southern operators.

Mr. MOODY. And an advantage in freight rates that had been obtained at one time or another by Pennsylvania operators, I think, had something to do with it.

Mr. KELLEY. It has been my experience that the advantage in freight rates was an advantage of the southern operators. You could ship to the Lakes right past Pennsylvania at a lower rate than we could.

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to get into a technical argument on freight rates. I do not think it has anything to do with this conference.

Mr. KELLEY. Only in the sense that we are trying to find a reason for the disagreement.

Mr. MOODY. Yes, but it depends a lot on where you are from as to what you think of the freight rates, however.

Mr. KELLEY. I am from Pennsylvania, and I am pretty sure of that.

Mr. MOODY. Well, Pennsylvania has done all right on that.

Mr. KELLEY. I am glad to hear you say that. That is worth something, coming from you.

Were there any other things besides that price differential that caused the break-down in the negotiations with the United Mine Workers? What was it that the southern coal producers requested that the northern operators did not? Do you know?

Mr. MOODY. I think one of the points was a separate contract, a contract separate from the northern operators, which was about the same. I do not have the dates clearly in my mind, of course, not having been in it, but the matter concerned an individual contract applying to conditions in the southern area. And there are some differences in conditions and operational methods, and so forth. So there is a difference of interests in some instances. And they felt that the application of a contract to that area alone would be a more satisfactory contract than to the industry, taking in the very wide areas that are represented.

Mr. KELLEY. Then it was an effort of the southern coal producers to get a better contract than the northern producers that caused the break-down of the negotiations with the United Workers of America?

Mr. MOODY. I cannot answer that question exactly, because what a better contract is—I think that in our negotiations, one of our purposes is to get the best contract that we can. Now, I am not too proud of the contracts that we have been able to get, because of the strength of the United Mine Workers and the control that they have been able to exert. But I think the purpose of any negotiations is to get the best contract that you can.

Mr. KELLEY. How many tons of coal are above ground?

Mr. MOODY. It is reported, I believe, by the Bureau of Mines, and I think—what is your figure on it, Mr. Haley?

Mr. KELLEY. Seventy million?

Mr. MOODY. If I may defer to Mr. Haley, I think his figure would be better on that.

Mr. JACOBS. How much did they say? I did not hear.

Mr. IRVING. They did not say.

Mr. KELLEY. Wait a minute.

Mr. HALEY. Shall I answer the question?

Mr. KELLEY. Yes.

Mr. HALEY. Sixty-seven million tons, I believe, is the figure; approximately 70 million tons.

Mr. KELLEY. Does that come from your association?

Mr. HALEY. That is an official Bureau of Mines figure.

Mr. KELLEY. The Bureau of Mines.

Mr. Bailey?

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Chairman, before directing the question to Mr. Moody I would like to make a statement for inclusion in the record.

For the past two or three days it has been my pleasure, in the absence of our very able chairman, to preside over the deliberations of this subcommittee, and at the urgent request of Walter R. Thurman, who represents himself as Secretary of the Southern Coal Producers Association, I suggested to the clerk of the subcommittee that the Southern Coal Producers Association be permitted to testify. At the time I had no knowledge that the National Coal Association had already been scheduled.

Apparently, Mr. Chairman, my thought on this courtesy toward the gentleman has not been appreciated, and I would like at this time to have the privilege of reading into the record an article appearing in the Charleston (W. Va.) Daily Mail on Wednesday last. The article appears under the caption "Producers denied right to testify at the House committee hearing."

Secretary Walter R. Thurman, of the Southern Coal Producers Association, said yesterday his organization had been denied the right to offer testimony opposing the repeal of the Taft-Hartley law. Thurman said in his statement that it was the first time, to his knowledge, that any party so much affected as the Southern Coal Producers Association, by rightful or wrongful solution of matters, had been denied the right to be heard. Noting that the association represented more than one-fourth of the bituminous coal producers of the Nation, Thurman declared the House Labor Committee's action denying the Southern Coal Producers Association the right to appear was arbitrary, high-handed and despotic. He indicated that maybe the Committee has already made up its mind, and that it only wants to hear witnesses who are in sympathy with its abuse. Such action is entirely at variance with our way of life because, for a little while, yet, at least, this country is still operated under a democratic form of Government.

I would like to make the observation, Mr. Chairman, at this point, that this kind of propaganda does not make for wholesome labor relations. It does not aid this committee one iota in arriving at legislation that would be fair to both labor and management.

Now, a question to you, Mr. Moody: I believe you have already answered, under questioning of the Chairman of the committee, that you have been somewhat of a synthetic coal operator since you have been connected with the business since 1947?

Mr. MOODY. That is correct.

Mr. BAILEY. Do you think that the arbitrary practices that the mandatory injunction which is now in the more or less arbitrary injunctive processes of the Taft-Hartley Act, is fair?

Mr. MOODY. I am not trying to ask you questions, Congressman, but you used the words "mandatory operation"——

Mr. BAILEY. It is mandatory.

Mr. MOODY. I assume you mean it is mandatory on the counsel for the Board to take such action?

Mr. BAILEY. Yes.

Mr. MOODY. I think the mandatory provision probably could be eliminated and make it discretionary on the part of the counsel.

Mr. BAILEY. It is discretionary insofar as the employee is concerned, is it not?

Mr. MOODY. No, sir. I think the application of the injunction——

Mr. BAILEY. Are you sure of that?

Mr. MOODY. In the use of the injunction, as I indicated in my testimony, it ran against the operators as well as the union. In the arbitrary injunction—and in our case, of course, we were the persons asking for relief, and the injunction had no purpose in running against us. However, I believe that in the General Motors case that was against the employer only. I do not believe that ran against the union, so that, not being a lawyer, I do not want to get into the technicalities of the thing. Maybe Mr. Haley could do a better job in answering you.

Mr. BAILEY. I am asking you the question.

Mr. MOODY. But to follow further, you said the arbitrary use of it, and, I think, I pointed out very carefully that in the injunction of last year there was nothing arbitrary about them from the standpoint of being ex parte because there was a full hearing, and the union had all the time in the world to offer any evidence they wanted to, to complete their story in every manner they wanted to, just as we had an opportunity to present our side of the case before any decision was made at all, and I think that is true. I do not know what injunctions you refer to as the arbitrary which, I assume, you are using a synonym to ex parte injunctions.

Mr. BAILEY. That is what I had reference to. Will you agree with me that that particular provision of the Taft-Hartley law has turned the thought on labor relations back more than 25 years?

Mr. MOODY. Mr. Congressman, if I could conceive, or think of—and I have tried—what instrument could be used in labor relations when collective bargaining is gone, and after all, the use of the instrument of injunctive process is pretty rough; it is a rough part of the jurisdictional process, but I do not know of any other instrument that is available, and I know that in the administration bill it provides for a cooling-off period, or status quo period, and it is my opinion the injunction preserves that status quo where there is no other method of obtaining it.

Mr. BAILEY. I would like to remind you that I lived through the situation in West Virginia back in the early twenties, a situation made possible by the use of arbitrary methods of injunction growing out of injunctions issued by Judge J. B. Jackson, and enlarged on by some other judges in southern West Virginia, which caused the coal miners to go out on strike, and eventually led to the armed march of miners, and made it necessary to call out the United States Army at that time. The coal operators were engaged in a campaign at the colse of the war to destroy every local of the United Mine Workers in the State of West Virginia. And you will recall they had been given the right to organize under the wartime powers of President Wilson. And as a result of the armed march, the Army came in and arrested the leaders, but did not give them a trial, as the Constitution guarantees they be given a trial in the territory in which the crime was committed, but they were brought over to Charlestown, W. Va., in the extreme eastern part of West Virginia, and tried in the same court where John Brown was tried for treason. Now, you are setting up under the Taft-Hartley Act a situation that would make possible a recurrence of that kind of incident in the State of West Virginia, and I will tell you the State of West Virginia does not want those days ever to return.

Mr. MOODY. Could I point out there is to my mind a fundamental difference between the obtaining of an injunction by application of an employer and that obtained by application of the United States Government? I think that there is a considerable difference there, and one that I would like to preserve. I think that the use of the injunction by a Government agency at the top of our organization of government certainly takes out a lot of the fears that you have outlined as to a recurrence of the incidents that you claim were caused by, to my mind, maybe a free use of injunctions that should not have been used. I do not know that because I was not there at the time, but you are speaking of a condition that does not exist under the Taft-Hartley Act and coud not exist under the Taft-Hartley Act, and has not existed for some years.

Mr. BAILEY. Just one more question at this point.

Mr. WIER. I will yield my 10 minutes, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. KELLEY. You have 10 more minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. The question I had in mind, Mr. Moody, is this: Do you believe that the provision in the so-called union shop as set up in the Taft-Hartley Act is fair to organized labor or union labor?

Mr. MOODY. Congressman, of course, I cannot answer your question from experience in the coal industry, because we just do not have that situation.

Mr. BAILEY. It could possibly apply to the coal industry in the event that the miners were not working, or did not care to work, and the coal operators would decide—assuming the coal miners had the right of collective bargaining, and had been certified, of course, for bargaining purposes—and the coal operators could bring in replacements, and that under the Taft-Hartley Act they would be recognized as the bargaining agent for the miners.

Do you not think that is carrying it to a point where it becomes a strikebreaking proposition?

Mr. MOODY. I do not quite follow you there, sir. You asked me a question, I believe, as to what I thought of the closed shop section?

Mr. BAILEY. Union shop, I said.

Mr. MOODY. I thought you said "closed."

Mr. BAILEY. The Taft-Hartley Act outlaws the closed shop, and sets up a so-called union shop.

Mr. MOODY. I thought you meant——

Mr. BAILEY. What I said to you was this: That under a recent ruling of the Board in case workmen in the operation of a factory or a mine, go on a strike, they lose their right of bargaining, or they lose their right to bargain through the National Labor Relations Board, and it is possible for the company to bring in replacements, and the Board will then accept the replacements, and they will be in the nature of strikebreakers as to the unit for bargaining; does not that have the possibilities of breaking all unions?

Mr. MOODY. Congressman, if I may ask, to what do you refer, the Cardinal Spellman situation in the cemetery workers——

Mr. BAILEY. No, sir.

Mr. MOODY. I do not know just what you are hinting at, sir.

Mr. BAILEY. I am saying that that could just as well happen in the coal operations as has happened in factories in other sections of the country.

Mr. MOODY. If I may paraphrase to get my proper understanding—I am not trying to avoid it, but I just do not quite get your point—that is, in case of a strike that was declared an illegal strike, that is, a strike for unfair labor practices, and the men stayed out on strike, that they could be replaced after a period of time on certification of the National Labor Relations Board?

Mr. BAILEY. They could be replaced before being certified.

Mr. MOODY. Say they are replaced, then you are asking me under what circumstances I would consider that as a proper procedure?

Mr. BAILEY. I am asking you the question: Do you not think that could be taken advantage of by an unscrupulous employer to break the strike, by bringing strikebreakers in and having them certified, and setting up a new union?

Mr. MOODY. I cannot conceive there of the specific conditions under which that could happen, although, the way you state it, I think technically it would be possible; but I do not think from a practical standpoint you could work it out. At least from my experience you could not.

Mr. BAILEY. That is all.

Mr. KELLEY. Referring to Mr. Bailey's statement which he read from the newspaper article, that here it is assumed that the committee only wishes to hear witnesses who are in sympathy with their views, and indicating the committee had already made up its mind, while I have the opportunity, I want to say this:

As the chairman of this subcommittee, I have instructed the staff of this subcommittee to see that those who are in favor of the bill and those who are against it should have equal opportunity before this committee, and that they should be equally divided so that there would be no criticism; but, on the other hand, if you wish to take everyone who asks to come before a committee, you would never get through with your work. So we have assumed the National Coal Association would speak for the coal industry. There is no intention whatsoever to be unjust or unfair to any group of people.

Mr. MOODY. Thank you.

Mr. PERKINS. For the time being, I will address my remarks to Mr. Haley.

I note you state that the Taft-Hartley Act, dealing with the union status of supervisory employees and the provision dealing with the national emergency situation as to strikes, and the section that you desire to outlaw, that you desire to make it unlawful to permit the welfare fund the subject of collective bargaining, if I have quoted you correctly?

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Congressman, I believe you were two-thirds correct. My position on the welfare funds is that I believe the law should be clarified to make it clear that the bargaining for central union welfare funds shall not be the subject of required collective bargaining, but I did not suggest that they be outlawed.

Mr. PERKINS. I notice you stated—and I quote—

> Should the American citizens be called upon to bestow special benefits upon a privileged group?

And you also state—

> Should the American people be called upon to pay for a special social security system for union members which will be in addition to the social security benefits made available to citizens generally under the Federal social security law?

I come from a coal mining district, and up until the time the United Mine Workers welfare fund went into operation, when an employee was injured the only benefit that he received was under workmen's compensation laws and those benefits were very meager. In my State, I think they now range up to $9,000 for total disability, and perhaps $800 for medical expenses on top of that, regardless of how severe the injury may be.

We know that this welfare fund is taking care of men regardless of the time they were injured, even though they were injured before the welfare fund was established in March 1946, and men who have had their dorsal or lumbar vertebrae broken, and their spinal cord affected, which required the services of neurosurgeons and orthopedic surgeons, that money is being expended from this fund in unlimited amounts trying to rehabilitate those men in order that they may have a few more useful moments in this world. It seems to me that in your proposal here you are wanting the Government of the United States to destroy the economic balance between the operators and the United Mine Workers, in favor of the operators, because if your suggestion were adopted by this Congress, that would be the effect of the law.

Now, I want to go into this welfare fund insofar as my time will permit, and discuss it with you, and see if we can agree with the benefits that this welfare fund has given the public—I mean, has given the miners, all over this country. Do you know whether or not injured employees are allowed to participate in the benefits of the United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund even though they were injured prior to 1946, and to what extent they are eligible to participate?

Mr. HALEY. I can answer that partially. I can say the only information I have is what the Congressman just stated, when he said that prior to 1946—those injured prior to 1946 may participate in it, and I will take his word for it, because I have made no study of the actual working of the United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund.

Mr. PERKINS. There happens to be a man by the name of H. D.

Bentley, who was one of my clients down in the Seventh District of Kentucky, who I think—and I am very confident of this date—was injured in 1944. He received an injury to his spine, as I recall, both to the dorsal and lumbar regions, and his nerves had been affected. He drew, after a lawsuit with the Alcorn Coal Corp., the sume of $7,500, and hospital bills amounting to $400. He was only about 50 years of age. He soon expended his compensation, and he was still in this physically handicapped position, and he went around the community, as I understand, and the locals contributed to his support until he got relief from the United Mine Workers welfare fund. This man is not eligible for social security because of his age and, as I understand it, this fund is established to take care of men, regardless of their age, because they are working in an extra-hazardous field. Do you agree with me that the purposes of this welfare fund are sound?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know. I certainly did not mean to imply in my statement that I am opposed to the welfare fund. My statement only ran to the required bargaining aspects of it, and I do not agree with the Congressman, of course, that to adopt my suggestion would make an economic unbalance in favor of the coal operators. My sole position on the——

Mr. PERKINS. Let us pursue the value of this welfare fund a little further.

Assuming that coal miners are injured many years ago and suffered complete paralysis: is there any existing law on the books from which they could obtain medical relief other than from the United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund?

Mr. HALEY. No present Federal law. There may or may not be in the several States. But I should like to point out this: My opposition to the principle of the central union welfare fund runs to the matter that it sets up a preferred class of citizens and thereby impinges on a field which has appropriately been assumed by the Federal Government.

Mr. PERKINS. Under the State laws, do you not know the only assistance they get is from the workmen compensation benefits?

Mr. HALEY. I know that generally to be true.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you know how many miners now are receiving beenfits from the fund who were injured before the passage of the act in 1946?

Mr. HALEY. No, I do not.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not think the social security benefits and the workmen's compensation benefits are wholly inadequate to take care of these injured employees in this extra-hazardous field in which they are engaged, and especially in view of the high cost of living?

Mr. HALEY. They probably are, and they will be more so for all citizens unless the theory of the central union welfare fund is curbed in some way.

Mr. PERKINS. At what age does the social security benefit accrue?

Mr. HALEY. At the present time, 65 for retirement, but before that age—in fact, at any given age for survivor benefits.

Mr. PERKINS. What provisions are there in the law—I will touch on this briefly—to take care of injured men, men 20 years of age who go into the mines and receive broken bones, or falls that happen suddenly from a horseback or kittlehead from the roof of the mines, other than the welfare fund?

Mr. HALEY. The welfare fund is not a provision of law. I believe the Congressman asked me what provision of law.

Mr. PERKINS. To what other source can they go for aid—I will modify the question and say "for aid"—after their workmen's compensation benefits are gone?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know to what other source they could go. I will say the bill that is being considered by the Ways and Means Committee now says that such workers will be eligible for such benefits.

Mr. PERKINS. That law has never been put into effect, has it?

Mr. HALEY. No, sir; and I fear it will not be put into effect if the central union welfare fund theory is adopted for the benefit of the union members. For our citizens generally, I do not think it will be, unless something is done about the central union welfare fund.

Mr. PERKINS. Let us pursue this policy of the United Mine Workers welfare fund a little further, and see it has well established its value.

Do you realize that we have about 1,000 men who lose their lives through mining accidents every year, and some 50,000 or 55,000 who receive and suffer severe injuries, some of which injuries incapacitate these miners for their entire lives; do you realize that?

Mr. HALEY. I realize the fact without several of the adjectives; you say "receive and suffer severe injuries." Some of the injuries included in that figure, as the Congressman well knows, are not severe, and by removing some of the adjectives I would agree with you.

Mr. PERKINS. Will you admit that they are engaged in a field of work that is extra-hazardous?

Mr. HALEY. Yes.

Mr. PERKINS. And do you not believe that on account of that one fact that they deserve this special treatment that you say they are getting from the United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund?

Mr. HALEY. No; I do not think they deserve it any more than employees working in equally hazardous occupations, nor do I think they deserve it any more than, in a manner of degree, those employees working in less hazardous jobs.

Mr. PERKINS. The retirement and pension funds have been established for other hazardous occupations; am I correct in that statement?

Mr. HALEY. You may be correct in the statement, but certainly not to the extent of a cost on the American people of $1.30 per man per day worked.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Haley, I remember the time in my section—and I will refer you to the organization of the Harlan Coal Mines—when there was 10 cents a ton added on to each ton of coal that was produced, and a portion of this money was disbursed to sheriffs and their deputies for the purpose of working against the organizations of the coal field, and at that time men were drawing about $20 or $21 a week, working in the mines, and when pay day came they did not receive any pay, as a general rule, because that money had been taken up by the commissaries for food. But now the operators are on a much higher plane after the organization of the mines, and after the adoption of the Wagner Act, which gave the right of collective bargaining.

And now you come in here and want to destroy one of the greatest benefits that the miners have today, by legislation.

Mr. HALEY. Mr. Congressman, if a mere recitation of the facts means anything, you will see they have continued to make progress since the enactment of the Taft-Hartley Act.

Mr. PERKINS. I disagree with you on that, but we will pursue this welfare question further.

Mr. HALEY. They doubled the welfare fund.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you know how much higher the insurance rates on accident policies are in these mining fields, in comparison with the same policy on the employee under the Automobile Workers Union?

Mr. HALEY. No, I do not, but I know they are high.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask you if they do not range from 100 to 200 percent higher?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know.

Mr. PERKINS. And that if it is not impossible for these employees to carry accident policies with their income, on account of the high premiums?

Mr. HALEY. I would answer that "No."

Mr. PERKINS. You know that they do not do it, do you not, many of them?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know, but I think some of them do have such accident insurance, and certainly with the last report from the Bureau of Labor Statistics showing average earnings in excess of $1.95 per hour, I do not think——

Mr. PERKINS. But you do not know the variation of the rates, do you?

Mr. HALEY. No, I do not.

Mr. PERKINS. And do you not think, assuming there is a variation in the rate I mentioned, that that signifies this is an extra-hazardous occupation, and that they deserve some special attention from somewhere?

Mr. HALEY. There is no doubt but that coal mining is a hazardous occupation, and certainly if the workers and the employers want to set up a welfare and retirement fund, and agree on it, I am not one to argue with it.

Mr. PERKINS. Let us go a little further: Do you not think that in view of the high accident and disease rate, and especially in view of the extra-hazardous work involved in mining, that all injuries and deaths should be treated as an economic cost to the mining industry and, therefore, should be borne by the industry in exactly the same way that machinery, repairs, and replacements are considered part of the cost of operation, and that such costs should not be borne by the miners and their dependents; do you agree with me on that statement?

Mr. HALEY. You asked a number of questions. If you would leave off the last part of it——

Mr. PERKINS. We will leave off the last part.

Mr. HALEY. My answer to the first one is "No." And the answer to the second part, which asked if it should be borne by the mine workers and their families, my answer to that is "No," also.

Mr. PERKINS. You agree, though, that this is a extra-hazardous occupation?

Mr. HALEY. I agree it is a hazardous occupation, but I do not know the meaning of the word "extra." I believe there are some equally as hazardous.

Mr. KELLEY. Will you yield?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

Mr. KELLEY. What is more hazardous, what occupation?

Mr. HALEY. I had in mind logging, I believe. I think the logging industry is about as hazardous as coal mining.

Mr. KELLEY. Any others? I do not know of any.

Mr. HALEY. The structural steel industry is, probably.

Mr. KELLEY. It is probably about the same as the logging industry. They are all hazardous, and maybe coal is the extra-hazardous one; but on the basis of degree, there are a number of them that are fairly close to coal.

That is all.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to suggest to the gentleman that I disagree with him on the logging industry. I have done a little logging myself, and that occupation does not compare with the hazards that are contained in mining.

Getting back to the point: Inasmuch as you answered my question in the negative, I presume that you believe that these young men, middle-aged men, who go into the mines and suddenly receive total and permanent injuries, and soon thereafter consume what money they get in the way of workmen's compensation benefits, should be turned out on the world, instead of charging that cost to the industry which brings about these accidents? That is your answer, is it not? That is the effect of your answer? Am I correct in that?

Mr. HALEY. You are incorrect.

Mr. PERKINS. Why am I incorrect?

Mr. HALEY. You are incorrect because I distinguish, in the first place, between an industry as an industry, and the individual employers within the industry, and, in the second place, I will state that the Federal Government more than 10 years ago embarked upon a national pool system of social security, and the President of the United States is now urging an extension of that to include just such things so that those people who are in extra-hazardous occupations, or those who meet misfortune in any occupation, will have an avenue of relief and, I think, the promotion of the central union welfare fund is a move contrary to modern social theory and contrary to the policies of the Federal Government.

Mr. PERKINS. You still have not answered the question. Who is going to support these men and care for them when they use up what money they have received from workmen's compensation, when they are not entitled to social security?

Mr. HALEY. That is, of course, indeed, a problem in every industry. That is a problem, I presume, with lawyers.

Mr. PERKINS. In other words, you are wanting to put them in the class with other employees who are engaged in occupations that are nonhazardous, are you not?

Mr. HALEY. I want to put them——

Mr. PERKINS That is the substance of your answer you have given me?

Mr. HALEY. Yes, I guess that is the substance of it, because they should withdraw benefits, the ones who need the benefits should withdraw the benefits too, without regard to their greater numerical indication, just the same as those in less hazardous occupations. I do not think that union members should be treated any differently from nonunion members, and that the industry or the American public should be called upon to set up a special pool, social security, for union members over and above the general theory——

Mr. PERKINS. Let us go a little further.

In the little town where I was reared we do not have any mines, but my county is underlaid with coal of a high quality, and I have mines all around me, and that is the only industry that we have. We can refer to these communities as small, one-industry communities, and many of these communities are isolated. There are perhaps only the freight cars that haul away the coal, and that is the only transportation we have other than automobiles.

Are you acquainted with these isolated conditions in the mining communities which have resulted in miners and their families being deprived of many of the advantages of the modern communities?

Mr. HALEY. I am acquainted, in a general way, with isolated towns in the coal industry, and outside the coal industry.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you know that the majority of these mining towns do not have modern community life?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know, but I would not go so far as to say that.

Mr. PERKINS. They do not have running water or lavoratories in their homes; am I correct in that?

Mr. HALEY. I do not think you are correct.

Mr. PERKINS. I want to inform the gentleman I am correct in my statement to that effect as it applies in the Seventh District in Kentucky.

Mr. HALEY. I have not confined my report to one district, but I do understand that approximately 65 percent of the miners in the United States furnish their own housing.

Mr. PERKINS. We have only a few modern mining towns in my district, and I will say the majority of the other mining towns fall within the isolated communities, and do not have these modern conveniences which I have referred to.

Mr. HALEY. That situation may not obtain in another district; for instance, the district represented by the chairman of the subcommittee.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not think these small, one-industry communities, where they do not have other industries, and the duration of the mining industry is uncertain, that for those reasons, do you not think that that necessitates the need for the health, welfare, and retirement benefits?

Mr. HALEY. No; I would say that indicates just the contrary. That puts an added burden on a community which derives its livelihood from one source, and such community should be, if they are pooled at all, in the general Federal pool so that by virtue of the very theory of pooling, the cost on that community would be reduced, and that is the theory of the Federal social security program.

Mr. PERKINS. I think if the research was made by the witness you would change your views on that.

Do you not think we need some inducement, inasmuch as this is a hazardous occupation, for the younger fellow to take up mining as an occupation, and do you not think this health, welfare, and retirement plan is some inducement for this hazardous occupation?

Mr. HALEY. No.

Mr. PERKINS. Why not.

Mr. HALEY. Because there certainly is not any manpower shortage in the coal industry today and, in the second place, your attention is directed to the fact it is my conclusion that the young people certainly would have very little interest in the health, welfare and retirement fund, and the money does not go to the account of any individual; the money goes into the central fund, and he has no vested right in it whatsoever.

Mr. PERKINS. Then you disagree with the principle that one of the chief incentives for younger workers to enter this industry, the hazardous mining industry, is adequate health and accident insurance and retirement plan?

Mr. HALEY. That may be one of the inducements, but as I have stated, I do not believe there is any manpower shortage in the coal industry today.

Mr. PERKINS. But you say that may be one of the inducements; am I correct in that?

Mr. HALEY. That may be one of the inducements, but it certainly is not a principal one.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you not think such benefits would weigh heavily in such a hazardous industry, in which all of the other unfavorable factors are well known, realizing that if you go into mines today that you may not come back out after you enter? Do you not think that that is more than just one of the incentives or inducements that you have mentioned? Do you not think that is a great drawing card?

Mr. HALEY. I will answer that this way: It certainly would be if the $1.30 per day went to the man instead of to the central union fund.

Mr. PERKINS. How has this money been expended in the past 20 months—if you want to be evasive—how has the $1.30 per man been expended during the first 20 months of the operation of this fund?

Mr. HALEY. For health and welfare and, I believe, some retirement.

Mr. PERKINS. How many have benefited from it?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know, but a great number, I should presume.

Mr. PERKINS. I will ask you whether or not during the first 20 months of the administration of the United Mine Workers welfare and retirement fund, or up until January 1, 1949, the UMWA welfare and retirement fund reported a total of 260,123 beenficiaries receiving approximately $68,000,000?

Mr. HALEY. I saw some figures but I cannot recall that those are the exact ones, but I would assume the Congressman is reading the correct figures. I saw a public statement on it some time ago. I could get it. I believe I have it here, but I will assume the Congressman had made a correct statement.

Mr. PERKINS. And I will ask you if that sum of $60,000,000 was not distributed in the form of disability grants, pensions, death benefits, hospital and medical care for miners all over this country, or to miners all over this country?

Mr. HALEY. To union miners—members of the United Mine Workers of America. Under the same assumptions, I would give the same answer.

Mr. PERKINS. If this fund has benefited 260,123 men who were injured while they were engaged in this extra-hazardous employment, and a great number or a majority of that number are ineligible to draw social security benefits, why is there anything wrong with the principle of letting this industry, which is extra-hazardous, bear the burden of giving those disabled men the kind of welfare treatment that they deserve?

Mr. HALEY. The only answer I would make to that is that the responsibility is spread industry-wide, and it impinges on the national social-security theory.

The Congressman must realize that payments into this welfare fund are as an indirect result of a man's labor, and that the benefits to which he is entitled are in no way related to his labor, and that a mine with an output per man per day of 20 tons at 20 cents per ton, $4 will be paid into the fund as a result of his labors, indirectly, and that, at a mine where the output per man is 30 tons, $6 will be paid into the fund.

Mr. PERKINS. You will admit this is a uniform rate; it is just not localized, and for that reason it does not interfere with the coal associations in the sale of the coal, does it?

Mr. HALEY. I would say it reacts to the benefit of the nonunion mines as against the union mines.

Mr. PERKINS. The whole theory that is involved here, which you have clearly stated to this committee, is that you would like to destroy the economic balance between the coal operators and the United Mine Workers in the field of collective bargaining, over this welfare fund, by asking this Congress to favor the operators as against the United Mine Workers, by legislating on this subject, thereby removing this fund from the field of collective bargaining?

Am I correct in that statement?

Mr. HALEY. No, sir; you are not correct.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Perkins, you have 1 minute left.

Mr. HALEY. No, sir; I fear you are not correct.

Mr. PERKINS. I would like to go into this subject——

Mr. KELLEY. I am sorry, but we are operating under a rule, Mr. Perkins.

Mr. PERKINS. Do you realize that the establishment of this fund has brought about a new industry in the study of diseases in the mining industry, and has already focused public attention upon the need for expanding research in this extra-hazardous field of coal mining?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know it, but I do not doubt it.

Mr. PERKINS. And do you also realize that the centralized administration of the fund makes possible the application of improved medical techniques for the various isolated mining areas all over the country?

Mr. HALEY. Certainly there must be substantial benefits flowing from a fund of $150,000,000. I do not know specifically——

Mr. PERKINS. You do not contend the fund has been expended unwisely to any extent, do you, Mr. Haley?

Mr. HALEY. I do not know, and I do not like to say to any extent. It may have been spent unwisely.

Mr. KELLEY. Your time has expired.

Mr. Lesinski, the chairman of the committee, has some questions.

Mr. LESINSKI. I would like to make a statement.

Mr. KELLEY. Go ahead. You have 10 minutes.

Mr. LESINSKI. Mr. Chairman, although I am a member of this committee, I have never at any time interfered at any of these discussions, but I must support the chairman of the subcommittee on the statement made after questions propounded by Mr. Bailey.

Apparently industry is not at all satisfied to get a 50–50 hearing. In some ways they have lost their field day because they cannot have 95 percent of the time to present their views, as has happened before, and I again must state that the chairman has taken the proper course.

I have one question to ask here of Mr. Moody.

Mr. Moody stated that their association was not organized until 1941, and that is some years after the Wagner Act was effective, when they found themselves where they could not evade the law. They have organized for one purpose, for their own protection. If the goose can organize for protection, so can the gander, and that is why the Wagner Act was passed, to protect labor.

I also want to say that Mr. Moody has made the statement that they have had no trouble under the Taft-Hartley Act. I must remind Mr. Moody that you made your contract with John L. Lewis prior to the effectiveness of the act, which was in October.

I also want to recall to the gentleman that Mr. Lewis has made a statement that the fine levied upon him could well be used for the 112 miners killed in Centralia, Ill. I think that is a thing the gentleman must think of, and that is why I am directing that question directly to you, Mr. Moody.

Do you not think it is fair that that industry protect the miner and his family, after the man spends all of his life working in that industry?

Mr Moody. You are directing that question to me?

Mr. Lesinski. Yes, sir.

Mr. Moody. The reason I asked was because all of the questions have been to Mr. Haley on that subject.

Mr. Lesinski. I made a statement prior to that.
